Owing to pressure on space we have postponed the publication of Dr. Ansari's letter addressed to Mr. Mohamed Ali in which he gives a most interesting account of the work that was being done on board the "Sardagna" and the daily routine of prayers, lectures and recreation.

All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference.*

THE twenty-sixth annual session of the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference opened on the 28th December, 1912, in the Kaiser Bagh Baradari in Lucknow. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor was present during the morning when the President, Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami, M. D., I. M. S. (ret'd.), delivered his Presidential address which lasted over two hours.

Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami commenced his speech by a sympathetic reference to H. E. the Viceroy and a resolution of condolence was passed in silence, all present standing up.

After quoting at length a passage from the reply of the King-Emperor to the Address of the Calcutta University, which the President regarded as "the Magna Charta of the educational future of this country," Major Syed Hasan continued:—

"Let us hope the condition of education in India is not so deplorable as that depicted above. But the picture does not appear to be altogether unfamiliar. Some of its features and lineaments we seem to be able to recognise more or less plainly. With us also when the policy of your King-Emperor's speech has been fully carried out, we shall have no grounds for complaint. But for the moment it would appear that the decision of the Secretary of State, as conveyed in Sir Harcourt Butler's letter of the 9th August last, addressed to the President of the Constitution Committee of our proposed University, has undoubtedly given the coup de grace to our University movement, at any rate for some years to come. Nor has elementary education, which every Moslem state, whether of the West or of the East now regards as a sacred duty, fared any better hitherto.

"No intelligent person can pretend that Sir Harcourt's letter, if intended as an argument in support of the step the Secretary of State for India has been advised to take in regard to our University movement, is at all convincing. On the contrary, it would be legitimate to conclude from its general tone and temper that it was intended to put an end to all discussion and controversy.

"In the course of my future remarks it will be my duty to criticise adversely the conclusions of our Constitution Committee. But in doing so I disclaim the slightest intention of making any reflection on the personal honour of individual members or casting any doubt on their zealous devotion to the difficult duty

The Delhi Outrage.

MR. ACLEAND informed the House of Commons last evening that Lord Hardinge was steadily improving. He added that the indignation created by the outrage throughout India has been re-echoed from the dominions and foreign countries. The Secretary of State in Council had sent a telegram of sympathy to Lord and Lady Hardinge in which he was sure the House would share.

Messages expressing horror and indignation at the outrage are pouring in from every part of India. They include resolutions passed at public meetings held by (1) the Mussalmans of Datanli; (2) the Mussalmans of Jhelum; (3) the Anjum-i-Islamia, Nainital; (4) the Muslim Club, Nowshera; (5) the Mussalmans of Sargodha; (6) the Qasab Brotherhood of Delhi; (7) the citizens of Gorkhpur; (8) the Anjuman-i-Istihad, Pithor; (9) the Mussalmans of Fatehpur Ghri, District Agra; (10) the Anjuman-i-Islamia, Gujrat, and (11) the Mussalmans of Hyderabad (Deccan).

The following bulletin was issued at 8 A.M. on Saturday, 4th January. The Viceroy's general progress is satisfactory. There was a slight decrease in the aching of the wounds all day yesterday and the process of healing is proceeding slowly.

The All-India Medical Mission.

We are glad to announce that we have received from Contantinople a cable, dated 1st January, sent by Dr. Ansari informing us that the All-India Medical Mission had safely reached its destination and that all the Members were well. A later cable from Dr. Ansari states that the Mission has much useful work to do.

* Owing to great pressure on space we have been compelled to postpone the publication of the Resolutions passed at this Conference and our comments on the Session's work. We regret that the same reason has compelled us to withhold a review of the Session of the Indian National Congress also.

—Ed., Comrade.

entrusted to them. In their anxiety for an early settlement they reflected the mood of the Moslem community who at the time were fired by the loyal sentiment and noble ambition of having the foundation of their University laid by the hands of their august Sovereign, then shortly expected in the country. Neither the committee nor the community realised that constitutions cannot be made overnight like fairy palaces. The futility of the attempt is now apparent to all, but it is easy to be wise after the event. When the committee consented to the various vetoes we find in the constitution they were contemplating their exercise by their own Chancellor. Even then perhaps his powers were too comprehensive and practically placed the University under a one-man rule. But in the light of the Secretary of State's latest decision the position is made much worse by transferring the powers of the Chancellor to the Government of India and practically making the university a Government institution instead of a communal one. For instance it is laid down that 'The Chancellor' (now the Government of India) 'shall by virtue of his office be the head of the University'. Again 'The Chancellor' (now the Government of India in Council) 'shall have power to enquire into every matter relating to the University and give such advice to the Court as he may deem fit about the improvement and welfare of the University. It shall be the duty of the court to take such advice into consideration and either act upon it or submit their views for the consideration of the Chancellor. If on the receipt of such report the Chancellor deems it necessary that his advice should be acted upon the Court shall do so' (sic) Let us not be too particular about the grammar of the last line. But you will observe that this statement is slightly altered from an existing rule of the College with the effect of making our 'Supreme Governing Body' that is to say the Court, supremely ridiculous and worthless. I will not trouble you further with the details of this precious constitution. What I have already cited will show you plainly that in the proposed University the Moslem community will not have much power left to their representatives.

"Now, I do not for one moment assert that the university founded on the lines proposed by the Constitution Committee will not be an excellent institution. True, it will be in practice altogether a Government affair, run by experts of the educational department, and hitherto on their own admission and on the evidence of men like Sir Valentine Chirol, efforts in the field of education have proved to be a failure. Their constant complaint is that they have failed to produce men of character, men of firm moral fibre; that they have only succeeded in turning out a number of graduates who have learned their work by heart without understanding it. Let us grant, however, that they are now going to turn a new leaf and succeed in future. But the question is why such an institution, however excellent, should be expected to especially interest the Moslem community and that so deeply as to induce them to sacrifice to it almost every educational asset they now possess and make themselves, as it were, educationally bankrupt for all time. Have we really formed any conception of the sacrifices that we are asked to make for this practically Government institution? Have we realised what it all means? Let us see. It means first of all the handing over to a department of the Government, for disposal at their will, of a few lakhs of rupees recently collected by an impoverished community in an outburst of enthusiastic local fervour, representing the hard earned saving of the poor and middle classes who could ill afford it, as well as the superfluities of the rich who could no doubt afford more. But even this sacrifice would be a trifle when compared with the sacrifice of Aligarh College itself for the glamour of the more name of a so-called university. Here is what we read in a quotation from the proposed Act: 'On and after the date of the establishment of the university the M. A. O. College, Aligarh, shall cease to exist as a separate corporation and shall be incorporated with the university.' 'Cease to exist,' gentlemen, and for such a university as I have endeavoured to give a sketch of for your benefit! To such a university all property, movable and immovable, of every description belonging to the college together with all its rights and privileges, are to be transferred! The work of Sir Syed a lifetime, the tender plant of 40 years' growth cherished by the whole Moslem community, nurtured by the hands of their most trusted leaders, thirty lakhs or so of money (a drop in an ocean when we consider the requirements of a really first class university, but still representing the supreme effort of a community poor in comparison with other sections of the Indian people), all this heritage which we hold as sacred trust, we are asked to sell; and for what? For a morsel of pottage, for a university which we can in no sense of the word call our own. Can the Moslem community accept such a university as the fulfilment of all their hopes, all their aspirations in the direction of founding an autonomous institution, where they could carry on more efficiently and on a sounder basis and a larger scale the work they have begun at Aligarh, an institution enjoying at least the measure of self-government enjoyed by Aligarh College and in its administration free from interference by Government officials? We asked for bread and we are offered a stone.

"It must be said that our Committee were not solely responsible for the proposed scheme. They had to consider what the Government were prepared to offer. It was probably a case of 'Take it or leave it.' The share of the Government in this business betrays in my opinion an amount of suspicion and distrust of our people which is not justified either on theoretical grounds or as a result of past experience and which in my humble judgment is unworthy of an all-powerful central Government such as the Government of India. That Government is the supreme administrative authority for the whole country and can and does exercise its administrative functions whenever and wherever it chooses to do so. Can it be contended for one moment then that—constitution or no constitution—the Government could not at once put a stop to any improper or unwholesome tendency developed by any university to which it had granted independence in the management of its internal affairs—subject only to its supreme control when and if the necessity should arise for its exercise. So much for theoretical grounds.

"Let us turn to past experience. For the last forty years the leaders of the Moslem community have administered the affairs of Aligarh College in a manner which has earned them the well merited commendation of all competent judges, principal high Government officials, Viceroy and Lieutenant-Governors and other high personages. The Education Commission of Lord Curzon which reported against 'denominational' universities spoke very highly of the College and its organisation and management. The College has always taken the lead in all educational reforms such as the residential system and the tutorial method of supervision—reforms to the use of which the official world is only now waking up and which have not yet been quite successfully imitated in Government institutions. The men, graduates and undergraduates, turned out by Aligarh College have received the meed of highest praise from Government officers in positions of the greatest responsibility, some of whom I may be allowed to quote. Here is what Sir Auckland Colvin, Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, has to say of them: 'The popularity which the College has obtained and the men it has turned out are proofs of the wisdom with which it was founded. Although it may not be given to every one to strike as justly the balance between the ideas of the East and the West as it has been to Syed Ahmed with his vigorous understanding and his strong personality, those who are acquainted with the young men who have passed through this college will probably agree with me that they show a markedly distinctive signs of their training as do the pupils of our public school in England and the graduates of our universities. An Aligarh College man has become synonymous with men of liberal views, advanced education, and independent character. He has become, above all, the type of the class of Indian who endeavours to do full justice to English desires, but expects us to do equal justice to his own'. Again, to quote the same authority: 'To have been an Aligarh man is, I have over and over again found, a passport to the respect and confidence both of Englishman and Native. They carry with them the stamp of their training, the impress of the man under whom their training has been accomplished'.

"Another Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, Sir Charles Crosthwaite, made the following observation in the course of his reply to an address of the Trustees: 'What is the reputation of your students? They have the character of being upright and manly, loyal to the Government under whose protection they live, courteous and respectful to all, and fitted by their upbringing for the practical work of their life'. Thus what has been especially recognised, these high officers and many others is that Aligarh has succeeded in forming character and that its alumni are men of integrity, intelligence, and practical administrative capacity.

"It will be observed therefore that the record of the Trustees of Aligarh College is not such as to warrant the sprouts of suspicion that pervades the whole of the scheme before us as modified by the Secretary of State's latest decision. The Government of India having according to their own avowed failed where the management of the College has been so eminently successful, now wishes to take in its own hands the management of the proposed university and assign to the trustees a position of responsibility without power—a most unenviable position to judge by the examples of it one comes across in this country.

"What is more, if you accept the scheme you may find a member of your own staff exercising the veto and assuming full control of the policy of the college, if he happen to have influence in high quarters or a friend well placed in the educational service. Those who have any knowledge of the power of a demi-official or private note in India, cannot possibly remain insensible to this danger.

"It might be said on the other hand that our attitude on this question shows a distrust of the Government which is not warranted by circumstances; that although the vetoes and reservations have been put in the scheme as a matter of precaution they will seldom or never be exercised unless absolutely necessary. But this is not a correct interpretation of our position. It does not signify a distrust of the Government but of a system of constantly changing succession of officers of more or less educational training some of them unacquainted with or unsympathetic towards our national requirements in education, some with fads and hobbies of their own and others full of the ideas just now in fashion of the undesirability of education for any but the nations of the West. Historians have observed that one of the greatest drawbacks of what is known as a 'Benevolent Despotism' is want of continuity in policy and administration. The intrinsic weakness of the system is that it is impossible under it to ensure the permanence of any reform. It is under such a form of Government that we are believed by many to be ruled in India. But, however that may be, we suffer from this particular failing of that system in an intensified form. In the 'Benevolent Despotism' of the latter half of the eighteenth century and the first few decades of the nineteenth, changes in policy and administration followed only on the death of the sovereign or the removal from office of some great minister of state under whose influence the sovereign happened to be for the time being. In India while the administration changes every five years, the official life of administrative officers of departments is very small indeed on an average. This I consider a very important factor in the successful administration of such institutions as colleges and universities. It is to my mind at the root of the success of Aligarh College as an educational institution. We have had here continuity of action combined with a full knowledge of our requirements, and sufficient autonomy to be fairly free from constant official interference. Time and labour have been freely and willingly placed at the disposal of the institution by the best intellects of the community. The administration has been sympathetic. The students have not been looked upon as mere mechanical toys to be made to assume any desired posture or perform any given action by the pressing of sundry buttons or the winding up of certain springs. They have on the contrary been treated as human beings with all their feelings, sentiments and passions, joys and sorrows, virtues and vices, merits and follies. What we wanted was to be able to continue this class of administration in a university which we could call our own. The Secretary of State's latest decision makes this impossible not only by what it offers to us but almost more so by the reservation which it lays down in regard to his future discretion as to the details of the constitution. Therefore we must dismiss from our thoughts, as a bad dream, all that we have hitherto fondly hoped we were going to get. Let us curb our craving for deputations and respectfully inform the Government that we have no use for the kind of university that is offered to us. Let us not forget within a few years of the passing of our great and trusted guide and leader and friend, the founder of all our hopes of advancement as a people,—the illustrious and incomparable Sir Syed Ahmed Khan—let us not forget so soon the one great lesson he taught us, the lesson of self-help. At this critical juncture in our fortunes it is the one quality which is likely to stand us in good stead and to bring us safely out of what I may call in colloquial phraseology a 'tight corner.' "

Major Bilgrami after discussing the affiliation question which he regarded as much less important than that of the supreme control of the University, proceeded to sketch out for the audience the ideal to which the University should strive, and mentioned the affiliation scheme. Continuing he said:—

"It will be more profitable to discuss first what we can do with Aligarh College as it now is and in what way we can make it even more useful for our community over the whole of India than it has been in the past. In other words, how far can we go with advantage in the direction of a charterless University, ready to be converted into a chartered one, if the time should ever come, as no doubt it will come, when some Secretary of State may, by a turn of the political kaleidoscope, change the whole aspect of affairs. But should all Secretaries of State remain forever obdurate we can still have an institution which would subservise the purpose of a national university of a very useful type, in spite of the limitations which will be necessarily imposed upon it by the refusal of a charter by the Government.

"Let us examine then in detail what we can do under present conditions in advancing Aligarh in the direction of a charterless university, to be converted under favourable circumstances into a chartered one, and in other character subserving the purpose of an Educational Establishment for the whole of India based primarily on the special requirements of the Moslem community and managed entirely by their representatives, but open to all classes of people of all nationalities and religions.

"In our quest for such a university it is useless for us to look for models in the existing universities of the world. No single model, such as Oxford or London, Göttingen or Berlin or Paris will answer our purpose. Our requirements are such that we shall have to combine the features of more than one type of university in order to get what we want. The main point is to know what that is.

"A recent writer (President Charles Franklin Thwing, LL.D.) divides the universities of the world into four classes, of which the lines of demarcation cannot be defined with absolute exactness because at many points they run into one another the same university presenting in varying degrees the features of more than one class. Yet the types are sufficiently distinct to be easily recognisable when met with. 'One class, and perhaps the more normal, has for its purpose the discovery and the publication of the truth. The schools of this class are devoted to learning and to scholarship. The laboratory and the library are their tools, and observation represents their method. The universities which are called rather by the social than by the geographical name of German are the more conspicuous members of this class. They represent the most impressive form of the higher education of modern times.'

"The next type, represented by Scottish and American Universities, 'seeks primarily for the development of character through the power of thinking. Scholarship finds its place too in this class, but less dominantly. The aim is rather intellectual and ethical, the aim is personal, directed toward the individual.'

"The third type has for its real purpose the making of the gentleman-men 'in whom' in Dr Thwing's words 'the intellect, the heart, the conscience, the will, and the aesthetic faculty are' so blended and made so harmonious that they become at home in any society.' The type is represented by Oxford and Cambridge.

"The fourth class 'seeks to train men of efficiency, its members endeavour to make graduates who are able to earn their living' just as professional schools of Engineering or Medicine do. 'Universities of this class belong especially to the Far East. They are found in India, China, Japan.' But listen further to the pathetic words of Dr Thwing, 'The reason is not far to seek. The means of subsistence are so small, the margin dividing starvation from bare existence so narrow, that every force must be utilized, every method employed, which shall add a crumb to the food or thread to the garment. The universities of Tokyo, of Calcutta, of Peking represent this type of efficiency.'

"Our University at Aligarh, chartered or unchartered, must combine the features of all these types, and add to them some special feature of its own. And what better guide can we have to our requirements than the noble words of our King-Emperor, when he says 'No university is nowadays complete unless it is equipped with teaching faculties in all the more important branches of the Sciences and the Arts, and unless it provides ample opportunities for research. You have to conserve the ancient learning and simultaneously to push forward Western Science. You have also to build up character, without which learning is of little value.' Again, 'Let your ideals be high and your efforts to pursue them unceasing. If we add to this the necessity for religious education which has been so fully recognised on all hands, which constitutes an essential element in the formation of character we have a complete guide to what the Aligarh of the future is to be.

"In all these directions we can raise Aligarh to a much higher state of perfection, and bring it much nearer to our ideal of a University, while waiting for another turn in the wheel of fortune. But during this interval of strenuous life, our labours and our efforts must not be confined to Aligarh alone, but carried on simultaneously over the whole of India in building up those institutions which if and when your ideal is fully realised, will become legally affiliated to the mother university at Aligarh. But in reality their affiliation must begin from the very first day of their start—an affiliation in spirit and soul, a spiritual affiliation, though not a legal one. They will take Aligarh as their model in every respect, including its residential and tutorial systems, its religious instruction, theoretical and practical, its games and sports and its esprit de corps. Where the teaching of these institutions does not go beyond the Matriculation or the Intermediate stage they will send up their matriculates or their F.A.'s, as the case may be, to the unchartered Aligarh University from the first. If they teach up to the B.A. standard their affiliation must for the time being continue to be spiritual only—but they can send their graduates up to Aligarh for post graduate study and research work, and in many other ways which I will specify presently, take their full share in Aligarh life and tradition. You will of course understand that the affiliation of these schools and colleges scattered over the length and breadth of India must under all circumstances be absolutely voluntary. Even if the Government gave us a charter with full power of affiliation, it will rest with the Schools or Colleges whether they will elect to be affiliated to Aligarh or not.

"Now while the Moslem schools and colleges of India are germinating and ripening, Aligarh itself must not only get more nurture in readiness from them, but must also expand vastly in order to meet her full responsibilities, and that is the work of years even of generations. I propose presently to enter into practical details of work that is before Aligarh, but this I must say here that thirty lakhs or so we have hitherto collected will not go far towards it. We must redouble our energies and never rest until the sum has reached a round crore of rupees. Charter or no charter, we shall want all money we can get to raise Aligarh into a first-class and up-to-date educational institution, a model for the rest of India. But never forget that this can only be done under communal management and never under the hesitating, vacillating, unsympathetic educational policy of a bureau. The first practical step that I wish to propose is only one that will cost little or no money. I propose that the name of our college be now changed to Muslim University College, Aligarh, in token of the determination not to swerve from the purpose of having a Moslem university at some future date. It will also be a shorter and less cumbersome name than the present one of Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College which now is invariably contracted into an Anglo abbreviation of M. A. O. College, a somewhat enigmatic term not understood by public outside India and requiring a great deal of explanation in conversation with the European at the end of which he gives up the attempt to grasp it.

"In order not to alarm you unnecessarily I may say at once before discussing the higher work of our University that the new Aligarh will continue to act as a mill for grinding out the requirements of the various Government services and departments, and at the same time providing a livelihood for a number of our young men to whom no other source of supporting life is open and whose highest ambition never soars higher than the official seat of a Munsiff or Deputy Magistrate. Our University must continue to employ every method 'which shall add a crumb to the food or a thread to the garment' of our impoverished community. This I know is not what the ideal of a University has been in the past nor is it the professed ideal to-day. The doctrine of 'Knowledge for its own sake' is still preached very widely at the inauguration of new universities or at big functions at the old. Newspapers din into our ears and feel very virtuous and very moral for doing it. Men high in the seats of the mighty declaim about it from their sublime heights. We can never hear enough of it in this country. But the truth is that it is now a mere pious aspiration. A formula now meaningless at least in the West that has come down to us as a relic of better times. In the old days it used to be the boast that the very idea of utility was desecration to true learning. We now find the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford making provision for teaching Medicine and Engineering and Agriculture. The Universities of Manchester and Leeds would have received few endowments or donations if they had not undertaken to specialise in commercial and technical education. The truth is that the modern spirit of commercialism in education has destroyed the highest ideals in the field of learning and nowhere is that spirit more rampant than in the England of to-day, in the centre of the world's commerce. The whole of the discussion with regard to compulsory Greek at Oxford is significant of the spirit of the time. At Cambridge it is impossible to induce an undergraduate to take up Arabic unless and until he is first promised a cadetship in the Egyptian service. The College of Oriental learning, which it is proposed to establish in London, has only been made possible because it will have the special function of giving linguistic training for commercial purposes. In England every ounce of knowledge has its exchange value in pounds, shillings and pence, but I shall not waste your time in quoting examples. This spirit of commercialism in education has invaded this country also and is, at least in part, responsible for that decline in the veneration due from pupil to teacher which we sometimes notice nowadays and which we all deplore. In the old days so long as the teacher could support himself or secure patron of learning undertook to find him in food and raiment he expected no remuneration for his teaching except his name and fame. His pupils were to him like so many sons of his own. Thus in the mosques and shrines and private houses of Delhi, Lucknow, and Benares men gave themselves entirely to their pupils, as they do to-day at the University of Al-Azhar in Egypt and as they did in Europe in the days of monastic scholarship. The pupils then looked upon any service, however menial which they were allowed to perform for their teachers as a mark of his special favour and of high honour. In a lesser degree I am glad to say, the spirit still exists in this country under modern conditions, where the right kind of teacher and the right kind of public get together. But to obtain the best result a certain amount of warmth of heart, of genuine interest in the welfare of the pupil, and a little enthusiasm in work are requisite on the one hand, and on the other, a disciplined mind, a mind disciplined both by proper home training and at school. Where strict commercialism in education is the order of the day so much money for so many hours' work done some how, the spirit of veneration is apt to be destroyed. The best people in England complain that it has gone out of Oxford and Cambridge."

He then related the difficulty that educated Indians have in finding suitable profession when their courses of studies are finished. Referring to the Legal profession he said:—

"From the parlours of Whitehall and Cromwell Road to the great centres in India where men of importance and authority among the ruling race and their echos among our own do congregate, the cry is "Down with the lawyers!" I have inquired into the reason for bias against a class of useful men whom the British system of administration of justice has brought into existence. Authoritatively I have only been told of two reasons. One is that they make a lot of money. For this delinquency of course we cannot blame them. There is very little to be made by our people in any other profession. The second and presumably the most important reason is that they encourage litigation by carrying appeals from one court to another as far as possible. I suppose this charge can be brought against certain types of legal practice in any country and we might at once admit the truth of it in a limited sense for ours. But there is another side to the shield. I asked a most loyal pleader, a writer of many loyal pamphlets which he has had translated into English for private distribution. He himself cannot be accused of knowing that language. His view of the matter was that these appeals are not the result of any special vice or perversity on the part of the lawyers, but of very feeble, often fantastic judgments delivered by young gentlemen whose conspicuous ability does not always include a knowledge of the law. So that the only conclusion we can come to is that unless the whole judicial system of the country is changed and every man on the judicial bench made a law unto himself this necessary evil of appeal to higher courts must be continued in the interests of their clients by every honest and honourable lawyer. I have only one more word to add to this part of my subject and that is that the out-cry is loudest against Barristers. Now I have no patience with the men who without any foundation of liberal education to build upon or ability to grasp the meaning of what law they read, get called to the Bar by dint of much cramming and after many failures. Nowhere else have I witnessed such painful and patrimony as among the many all but illiterate and misguided young Indians who in the past have got into the legal profession in that way. We should, therefore, be very grateful to the Council of Legal Education for the regulations which require a fair standard of preliminary knowledge for entrance into the legal profession in England. They should save a great deal of misery and disappointment both to the young men themselves and to their parents out here. But I still adhere to what I said on my return to England from my last trip in India some five years ago at a public gathering in which many young Indian students were present. I then said that the Bar in India is overcrowded but only for fools. That for men of real ability there is room and to spare. To that statement I hold fast still."

The President dealt at length with the various aspects of the Moslem educational problem with special reference to the development of Aligarh. He discussed the need of religious education and laid special emphasis on the importance of scientific training as well as the desirability of the Mussalmans taking more to commerce and industry.

Sir James Meston's Speech.

Sir James Meston, replying to an eulogistic speech of the Raja of Jehangirabad, said:—

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN,

As this is entirely a communal gathering, I feel I have no position except that of a guest and visitor who must feel grateful for the cordial reception given to him. But I cannot allow the few words my friend the Raja Sahib has spoken to pass without any acknowledgment. I cannot lose this opportunity of expressing the pleasure and edification with which I as well as every one else in this room have listened to the eloquent address delivered by the President. There are some things in it with which I cannot profess to agree as there must be some things in what I have said with which the President may not profess to agree. Yet that does not prevent free comment and frank speech. Free criticism is the key note of the President's speech (Hear, hear.) There are words in it of great wisdom which I trust you and the future generations will remember. I cannot hope anything better than that this meeting would be conducted in the same spirit of sobriety, wisdom and moderation in which the President's address has dealt with many topics to-day. The only other thing which I wish to say is to refer to an important paradox in the address—not the paradox to which the learned President has himself referred, but to the paradox in the last para, and the earlier portion of his speech when he refers to the relations between the Government and the community. All that I have to say is that whatever might have happened in the past, now there is no suspicion between the Government and the people. (Loud cheers.) I firmly hope and believe that as long as you speak freely and frankly to Government and as long as the Government speaks freely to you there will be no cause for this. Mr. President and gentlemen, it is not my intention to inflict a speech upon you, and I shall say no more except this that I hope your conference will end in success. (Loud and continued cheers.)

The Comrade.

The Blank Cheque.

THIS Christmas week which brought to a close the eventful year 1912 would long remain memorable in the history of the Mussalmans of India. Although the year has been strangely eventful in the Moslem world, the "leaders" of the Moslem community in India were determined to impress on the world its significance in a still more strange fashion. The All-India Moslem League was to be choked with pathetic subs and smothered in crapo; and the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference was to commemorate the only sessions in which the Moslem University of its annual resolutions was an absorbing topic of discussion by ignoring it altogether. It is true that a special meeting had been called by Khan Bahadur Nawab Mozammil-ullah Khan, the officiating Secretary of the Foundation Committee of the Moslem University, to deal with the situation created by the decisions of the Secretary of State for India and the opinion thereon of the Constitution Committee. But there was no guarantee that anybody would respect the conclusions arrived at by a body of delegates for whose election no rules were prescribed and whose delegation nobody was likely to scrutinise. The gentleman who had invited the delegates seems himself to have put a value on the significance of their delegation by absenting himself as usual from the deliberations of his community. But the week that brought an eventful year to a close proved in the end to be no less eventful. The Council of the League took a most significant step in amplifying the political creed of the League in a manner that is certain to have far-reaching results, and the spirited Presidential Address of the Conference, with its refreshing candour and its unhesitating desire to face facts and find a solution, made ample amends for the dullness of a Conference, in which the Joint Secretary had to make more speeches than all the other members put together for want of others inclined to speak.

When on the 10th and 11th August the Constitutional Committee passed its resolutions and adopted the draft of a letter in reply to that of Sir Harcourt Butler, there was no room for doubt that it arrived at these conclusions not only because its members were left unconvinced by the arguments of the Secretary of State, but also because they knew that outside its President's Kaiserbagh residence, too, there was a community which would not approve of any other settlement of the question. The proper course for the "leaders" to pursue after this was to fix a convenient date and place for a meeting of such members of the Foundation Committee as cared enough for the future of the Moslem University to attend and record their votes. In our opinion Lahore was the most suitable place and a suggestion was privately made to Mr. Shafi to arrange for the Foundation Committee's meeting some time in September. We regret that this suggestion was not acted upon, and that the same fate was in store for another private suggestion that the Dasera holidays should be utilized for such a meeting in Lucknow. Much valuable time was lost, but is it not worth enquiring, why? The "leaders" had to choose between Government and their own community. Not that the Government of India were opposed to the views and the wishes of the community. That is a suspicion as mischievous as it is unjust. On two distinct occasions that Government had approached the Secretary of State and supported the series of compromises embodied in the final draft of the Moslem University Constitution. But it is no secret that the Hon. the Member for Education, who had prevailed in the Executive Council of the Viceroy at an earlier date, had now turned his persuasive powers towards the Mussalmans with a view to bring round the community through its "leaders" to accept the Secretary of State's decisions.

The "leaders" were, therefore, in this predicament. They approved at heart the conclusions of the community but did not relish the idea of speaking out their mind boldly and frankly to Government. On the other hand, they were willing enough to submit to the Secretary of State, but had not the courage to face the community and openly advise it to submit. We are conscious that this generalisation is somewhat inapplicable to one or two prominent men who perhaps never liked the idea of affiliation. But even if they had accepted affiliation silently they had accepted it all the same, and, what is more, they had knowingly profited by their silent consent in collecting the University Fund. Faced by the alternative of winning the approval of the Secretary of State or retaining the confidence of the community they followed the tactics of the weak: they delayed their decision and as a consequence now find that perhaps they have lost both. One of the "leaders" made a halting effort to persuade the community against its better judgment, and led up to this in a series of articles in the Aligarh Institute Gazette. His "excellent second" in every controversy, who had opposed him in the Constitution Committee in a moment of unusual "self-assertion," soon returned to the meek ways of an "excellent second" and sent round a "Confidential Circular Letter" supporting his principal's views. And finally came the famous dialogue between "Mateenullah" and "Josh Muhammad"—printed and published perhaps at the cost of the Conference—proving the superiority of his own cold reason over the effervescent emotions of his community. But so little confidence had these cold reasoners in the persuasiveness of their eloquence and arguments that even after this circularising and pamphleteering they did not dare to leave the final decision in the hands of their much circularised and pamphleteered community.

When the members of the Constitution Committee met at Lucknow last August, they had to face a somewhat delicate problem. The Government of India had received probably in the previous March an intimation of his views on the Moslem University from the Secretary of State, and as he was for giving away powers on which the Government of India had stubbornly insisted, and yet demanded a radical alteration of the Constitution such as the Government of India felt it would be most unreasonable to demand, specially so late in the day, they wrote back to the Secretary of State trusting that he would reconsider his decision. The only result of it was that Lord Crews, instigated no doubt by some members of his Council, declared that his decisions were final. A Press communiqué was issued from Simla, but as it left it doubtful whether the Government of India were the original sinners or only the reluctant messengers of evil news, they became involved in much of the odium resulting from the Secretary of State's decision. In fact to this day the Government of India have to bear the castigation for more than one sin of the Home Government without having themselves enjoyed the pleasure of sinning. After all that they had done in the matter of the Moslem University, they felt the pain of their castigation doubly, and issued another Press communiqué pointing out the sinner for whom they had vicariously been punished. But like disciplined people they loyally tried to carry out the bidding of their official superior, and the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler used his great talents in trying to make out as good a case as possible for the Secretary of State and his Council. Had this been all there would have been little to complain of; but the fear is that Sir Harcourt has been using his still greater talents in trying to win that case also.

When his letter of 9th August 1912, was received by wire on the same day at Lucknow, the members of the Constitution Committee, who had assembled to discuss the situation created by the Press communiqué of the Government of India, knew well enough their own minds and the mind of their community. They could have easily rejected the proposals of the Secretary of State contained in the letter of Sir Harcourt Butler without much debate. But they realised soon after their arrival in Lucknow that such action would not fit in with the difficult position of some of the members, and they were even invited to consider a postponement of all actions till the return of H. H. the Aga Khan to India. That meant the postponement of the expression of a clearly indicated, united and strong public opinion for nearly half a year. This suggestion was, therefore, instantly rejected, and it was pointed out that H. H. the Aga Khan had already expressed his views clearly enough by asking for subscriptions on the distinct understanding that affiliation would take place, and also after the issue of the Press communiqué by his cable desiring that Government should be requested to reconsider its decision. This cablegram had strengthened the hands of the Hon. the Raj Sahib of Mahmalabad, and it was suggested to him that as his Committee was only constituted to frame a Constitution, it could well avoid the responsibility for rejecting a university such as the Secretary of State was willing to permit but could discuss his decisions merely as suggestions for the modification of the draft Constitution. The Foundation Committee, which was comprehensive enough to include practically all the educated men in the community, and was formed on a very broad basis could well take the responsibility of facing the "final" decisions of the Secretary of State with a final decision of its own. These suggestions were heartily accepted, and for obvious reasons, and a firm but courteous reply was sent to Sir Harcourt Butler. It now remains to explain the efforts that have since been made—for equally obvious reasons—to deprive the Foundation Committee of the power to frame its final decision while accepting the full responsibility for that decision.

A plan was improvised whereby instead of the Foundation Committee declaring its opinion itself a small body of delegates were invited to do so vicariously on behalf of the Foundation Committee. But it is easier to improvise such electorates than to make their elections practicable, and we have no means of knowing whether even in a single instance a delegate was returned by these hastily improvised electorates in what we can call a reasonably regular manner. It is, however certain that a very small minority of the District Committees and Associations returned a delegate, and although they were not sufficient to falsify our prophecy of empty benches, even they were sufficient to falsify our predictions of a "show of loyalty." In view of this, no less than of the clamour of those who had not been sent as delegates but felt they had much to say about the future destiny of the Moslem University, the powers that be tore into shreds their own hastily improvised constitution for a committee of delegates, and granted to the Mussalmans then present at Lucknow something even more Radical than a Manhood Suffrage.

When the meeting commenced on the 27th, the Baradari was packed with everyone who chose to come in, including the much maligned students of our colleges and schools. But instead of an omnibus resolution supporting the conclusions arrived at by the Constitution Committee last August, the meeting was provided with an agenda in which was included a resolution tamely accepting the Secretary of State's decision on the subject of affiliation of outside colleges. Such a naked submission was judged to be too unattractive for the community, and it was clothed with a show of much disapproval and a request for permitting the recognition of outside schools. Naturally the first two resolutions based on those of the Constitution Committee were unanimously passed in a few minutes. But this unanimity disappeared when Major Syed Hasan Dilgrami, the President-Elect of this year's Conference, threw a bomb in the assembly in the shape of a resolution protesting against the Constitution Committee's compromise which gave the Viceroy-Chancellor the last word in all matters relating to the internal management of the University. It was here that it found an occasion to assert itself, and it did so in no uncertain manner. The "leaders" made every effort to break down the opposition of the meeting, and failed—for the obvious reason that the community even as represented in that meeting distrusted them. They had accepted compromise after compromise in the hope of getting the Government to permit the establishment of a tolerable Moslem University. But it was clear that in spite of their pliability and complacency they had failed in their object and what was offered to them was a University which the Moslem community could under no circumstances tolerate. The resolution placed on the agenda of this meeting was the last straw, but instead of breaking the camel's back it only made the camel inclined to throw off the whole of its heavy load.

Those who were present at the meeting, and those who heard of the proceedings subsequently, have described it in various manners. But to our mind all that happened was exactly what any body of people, who were genuinely anxious to safeguard the vital interests of their community, would do in a condition of intense emotion, when they were being fooled or bullied into a tame submission to the will of one whose anxiety for their welfare and knowledge of their requirements were in no way comparable to their own. The scene enacted was certainly far more dignified than the rowdiness into which even the top-batted and frock-coated assembly of 670 stolid and generally middle-aged Britons, truly representative of the culture and commonsense of their country, sometimes breaks when its feelings are roused. But for our part we must frankly confess we have no desire to see even such mild sensations repeated as were noticeable on the 27th December in the Kaiserbagh Baradari. Nevertheless, with all its sins on its head, we value the meeting greatly, because we trust it has convinced the "leaders" that it is hopeless to control the community without first winning its confidence by a consistent pursuit of its ideals and interests, and that democracies can be persuaded even to folly and ruin but cannot be bullied into the most virtuous and most profitable submission.

When all efforts to pacify the audience on the 27th December had failed, and it was apparent that not only unity was impossible, but that in such an atmosphere as had been created by the blundering repression of the "leaders" it was doubtful if even a most reasonable solution which savoured of submission to the will of the Secretary of State could be made acceptable to the assembly, the meeting was adjourned until the 29th December. The interval gave the "leaders" time, as the meeting of the 27th had provided them with food for reflection. What the result was became apparent when the adjourned debate was resumed and within an hour unanimity was practically restored. In a small conference overnight it was decided to pass an omnibus resolution embodying the wishes of the community, among others, on five important points, as expressed by the Constitution Committee last August, and in the course of discussion on the 27th December, and to appoint a small committee, representative of the different shades of public opinion in the various provinces, authorised to wait on His Excellency the Viceroy in the form of a deputation to represent the wishes and requirements of the community, and, after all necessary representations, to act and finally settle in a manner it considered proper in the best interests of the community all matters relating to the Moslem University. If the committee appointed can be considered a fairly satisfactory microcosm of the Moslem community and truly representative of the different shades of opinion and occasionally conflicting interests, then we think the solution arrived at on the 27th December is under the circumstances the only practicable alternative. We would have preferred a series of representations to Government based on the wishes of the community followed by a final referendum to the community itself. But in view of the fact that nearly half a year has been wasted through the vacillation of the "leaders," and every moment's delay is dangerous, it appears to us inadvisable to postpone matters much longer, specially when we know well enough even to-day how the community feels and what it thinks on the subject of the Moslem University. Moreover, in all such controversies the holding of meetings and public discussions in the press only weaken the chances of the people's success. Governments differ among themselves just as frequently and as violently as the people, but in all negotiations for a workable compromise they possess the inestimable advantage of having a complete machinery of Executive Council meetings with closed doors, secret despatches and telegrams and cables in cipher. For instance, all that we know of the mind of Government on the subject of the Moslem University itself is that in the middle of May, 1911, it held certain views which it expressed with perfect unanimity through some Members of the Government of India; that in September, 1911, it held somewhat different views, but held them unanimously and expressed them through the Member for Education; and, finally, that on the 29th August, 1912, it held totally different views in deference to the Secretary of State, and communicated them to the Moslem community with the same unflinching unanimity in the letter of Sir Harcourt Butler. As a matter of fact, Government has indicated that although in some matters the last word has been uttered on the subject, in others it reserves to itself the right of expressing any opinion that it chooses to have, and to impose it on the Moslem community. On the other hand, whenever the Moslem community has discussed a matter, whether in committee or a public meeting, its differences and dissensions have been there like an open book for all to read. Even when it sat with closed doors it failed to exclude the agents of Government from its councils for Iqbal's complaint is only too just.

کیا قیات ہی کہ خود بھول میں غار چمن

Quite early in the discussions about the Constitution of the University, Government knew even better than the Mussalmans themselves what opinions His Highness the Aga Khan had on the subject of the Government control in the Senate, what views were advanced once more by the Oligarchs of Aligarh on the subject of the community's representation among the Trustees, and how far these opinions were at variance with those of the community at large. Again, when the Constitution Committee met in September 1911, at Simla, the Member for Education knew well enough even the names of those who would oppose the new condition sought to be imposed by Government as regards the appointment of Professors. Similarly, when the Constitution Committee met in August, 1912, at Lucknow, there was not a single expression used in the meeting, much less a broad divergence of opinion, with which Government was not acquainted soon after the meeting was over. And, finally, after the meeting of the 27th December last at Lucknow, Government knew well enough how the community was divided between those who were anxious to have a "row" those who were prepared to negotiate within certain reasonable limits, and the "humile obedient servants" who were prepared to accept every thing dead beat.

Now we ask, how long is this game to go on in which the Moslem community has to play the dummy and lay down all its cards on the table, while the Government refuses to disclose its hand and is even unwilling to declare that it has no other cards to play except those in its hand? It is for this reason that we support the decisions arrived at on the 27th December appointing a committee to be the plenipotentiaries in the negotiations that must take place before the University is finally established. But although we are opposed to further open discussions likely to turn the hand of the Mussalmans, we are equally opposed to the line of policy suggested to us by the "leaders" of offering more concessions to Government. The community has been beaten back from its Kirk-Kilossa; it has retired from its Tchorin and Lile Burgas; it hopes to retain anything of importance surely must discover its Tobatalja Lines behind which it can stand up and maintain its honour and dignity. Concessions coming from the stronger side are signs of magnanimity; concessions coming from the weaker side are signs of even greater weakness, and give rise to demands for more concessions. That is why it is necessary that the Moslem community must wait and see what the Government is prepared to concede out of its plenty before it offers concessions out of the little that it possesses.

In recommending to the community the granting of a blank cheque to a small committee we took care to add an important proviso: the composition of the committee must truly represent the composition of the community. That is no easy matter in itself; but on the whole we are satisfied that every view and interest is now properly represented, and although no doubt opinions will differ as to the qualifications of this or that individual, as they always differ according to the different estimates which different people form of their neighbours, and it is certain that hardly two persons in the whole community could draw up an identical list of 24 representatives of the community, we believe that on the whole the composition of the committee is fair and just.

What was, however, of no less importance is the procedure which was agreed upon before this blank cheque could be applied for and gained from the community. Knowing well enough the feelings of the community on the various points embodied in the resolution, the members of the committee have bound themselves to make every endeavour to have those feelings respected by Government, and while the representation on each of these points will be made by that member of the committee who is credited with being the most ardent advocate of that opinion of the community, the entire committee will offer him its support when dealing with Government. But when Government makes counter-proposals, the committee will retire and discuss among its members fully and frankly the situation created by such proposals, and although its final decisions will be based on the opinion of the majority, it is agreed that no concession will be made until and unless a substantial majority supports it, and the most ardent advocates of the popular view on that point are persuaded that it would be in the interests of the community to make that concession. These restrictions qualify very materially the expression which we have used to indicate the result of the Lucknow meetings, viz., the granting of a blank cheque to a small committee. In reality, while the committee is the plenipotentiary of the community, it has received explicit instructions as regards the terms it should make every effort to obtain, and we hope the members realise the full significance of their responsibilities.

It is a matter for no little gratification to us that it should have been the Comrade which was selected in the person of its editor to appeal to the Moslem community for the blank cheque which the committee has now obtained. This journal is hardly two years old to-day, and the success it has achieved and the circulation which it has obtained throughout the Moslem community of India, not to mention the respect it commands in other circles also, is best illustrated by the success of what was in reality a personal appeal. As Mr. Mohamed Ali said at Lucknow, no business man can carry on his business without having to apply some time or other for an overdraft, and the response to his application indicates the credit he has established for himself in the business world. Ours is a business established only a little while ago, and we have been loth to apply to any section of our countrymen for an overdraft on the strength of our credit. Nor have we ever found ourselves in a position in which an overdraft was indispensable to meet our liabilities. But at Lucknow it was the "leaders" that stood face to face with bankruptcy and we were asked to accept an overdraft of theirs which without our acceptance had no chance of staying off the impending disaster. We did so for reasons which we have mentioned above; but although it is no little gratification to us to find even proud Antonius appealing in their hour of need to a Shylock whom they never spared, the greater gratification is that in appealing to us they have recognised the power of the community for which we have so often pleaded. Ours is not going to be a cruel bond like Shylock's forced by malice out of vanity and over-confidence. But we trust the men whose face has been saved by us remember that they pledged to us something dearer than a pound of flesh nearest the heart. It is nothing less than the honour of more than a score of Mussalmans to whom their community has often looked up, and that is no little matter. Governments change and ministers and high dignitaries of State follow each other in a continuous succession. But a community lives for ever, and there is not one member of it who can dispose with its blank cheques at all times. Whether such blank cheques will be offered to them again depends altogether on the figures which the committee appointed on the 23rd December fills in the blank cheque which it obtained on that day through our instrumentality. We appeal with every hope to the honour of each and every member of the committee and we trust we do not appeal in vain. But if any of them fondly hopes that he has discovered in us a cat's paw useful enough to draw his chestnuts out of the fire of his community's wrath, let him not forget that even the harmless necessary cat has at times other uses also for the paw.

The Creed of the Moslem League.

ALTHOUGH the Council of the All-India Moslem League had decided, as we had announced, on the suggestion of His Highness the Aga Khan and the Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali, to hold no session of the League this year, it was subsequently resolved to convene a meeting of the Council of the League on the 31st December, 1912, and to permit such members of the League as had previously announced their intention of attending the meeting to do so and to take part in its deliberations, though not in the voting. When the meeting was actually held a further concession was made to the popular demand in permitting non-members also to express their opinions on the subjects under discussion as if they were ordinary members of the League. Whatever may have been the motive of those who agreed to hold no session of the League this year, it is certain that they form a very small minority of the community whose destinies they desire to shape. In this respect the Council of the League has proved no better than other committees of the Mussalmans, which are composed of the holders of different opinions in quite a different proportion to that of the holders of similar views in the community at large, and often provoke a quarrel with the community with results very different from those on which they calculate. In fact, it is coming to be noticed that these bodies have got a psychology and an ethics much the same as the psychology and the ethics of the House of Lords in England, without its justification in an ancient tradition, and it will not take many years before they come to realise that in every quarrel which they provoke with the community they are likely to come off only second best.

The meeting of the Council held on the last day of the eventful year 1912 was practically in all respects a much curtailed session of the All-India Moslem League, except that the members of the League who were not permitted to vote returned home with a grievance, while the original purpose of displaying the customary suit of solemn black and maintaining a funeral demeanour was altogether frustrated. As for the vanity of human wishes, the meeting was as lively as it well could be imagined and its temper had become unusually Radical on account of the unnatural restraints which the Conservative majority of the Council at the suggestion of two distinguished leaders of the community had decided to impose upon it. The Council certainly missed a well-prepared Presidential Address redolent of the fragrance of the midnight oil. But some important speeches which came straight from the heart and sincerity of the soul compensated the audience for the absence of greater elaboration and cleverer political rope-dancing. It is true there were no new resolutions nor the repetition of some hardy annuals which mostly serve the purpose of advertising the lesser known member of the League as proposers and seconders. But in the political creed of the League, which was formulated anew, this memorable session held within it the significance of a hundred resolutions, for it gave expression to a solid fact which no Viceroy or Secretary of State can unsettle.

Those rash generalisers who show in their actions even more than in their words that evolution is an abstract expression only to be found in books on science but never in real life have not hesitated to accuse Sir Syed Ahmed Khan of having been opposed for all time to Moslem participation in the politics of the country, to the National Congress and to the Hindu community. Those who knew the man in real life are the only true judges of his feelings towards his Hindu brethren, and we only wish that some of our Hindu and Moslem Nationalists could count as many true friends in what is often regarded as the rival community as Sir Syed Ahmed Khan possessed. In his writings and speeches there is ample enough proof of his genuine desire to treat Hindus justly and co-operate with them for the creation of an Indian Nation. But his opinion on the Congress needs no intimate knowledge of the man himself, for it is manifest enough from his speeches and writings; and if due allowance is made for many speeches having been made impromptu, and for the occasions on which they were made, as well as the ardent temperament of the speaker himself, it would be apparent to all who read them that their author desired at best a temporary separation of the Mussalmans from the Congress rather than their permanent abstention from political discussions or refusal to co-operate with other communities. We deem it a high honour to consider ourselves to be among the disciples of the Sage of Aligarh in political as well as religious and educational ideals, but we felt it no inconsistency in welcoming and even taking our humble part in bringing about the advent of the All-India Moslem League six years ago. And to-day, when that body has formulated self-government suitable for India as its political creed, we have no hesitation in saying that we have assisted in the matter in a way that would have met with the approval of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan and his cordial and active encouragement had Providence spared him to guide to-day the policy of his community and his country.

When the officiating Honorary Secretary sent round the agenda of the Council meeting, the chief item of which was the consideration of a new draft of the League's rules and regulations, little did the members imagine that they were asked to consider one of the most vital questions concerning their community. But so it was. Hitherto the League had confined itself to the maintenance and promotion of feelings of loyalty in the Moslem community, to the advancement and protection of the interests of the Mussalmans; and, without detriment to these two objects, the cultivation of harmony and good relations between the Mussalmans and other communities. When these objects of the Moslem League were formulated the community was going through a time of considerable uneasiness caused by the political affairs of the country. The Partition of Bengal had been carried out only a year ago, and had created among the Hindus of Bengal an unrest which had no parallel in the political life of India. The Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal felt, and rightly felt, that the Partition would do them immense good, and that the Hindu opposition to the Partition was to a large extent based on this very reason. They had, therefore, thrown in their lot with the Administration of the new Province, and the Mussalmans of other parts of India felt bound to lend their moral support to their brethren in Eastern Bengal when the Congress took up the cause of the Hindus of Bengal as if it were a national cause and deserved the support of the whole of India. Moreover, soon after his arrival in India, Lord Minto took up the question of a reform of the Legislative Councils, and the Mussalmans knew that the system of representation in legislation, and to some extent in the general administration, would probably be extended. Hitherto they had left their communal interest in the hands of the Government, but with the weakening of that bureaucracy it became necessary for them to rely on their own efforts, and having had no chance of representing the views of their community in the legislatures of India under the system of election then prevailing, they found it necessary to appeal to Lord Minto's Government, through the famous Simla Deputation, for the modification of the system under which they could no longer hope to have their interests properly represented until and unless an Indian Nation, which then appeared almost as far as ever, came into being. The recovery of the Mussalmans from their political coma was hastened by the clearly indicated liberal intentions of the Government itself. But the first political acts of the Mussalmans after a long period of suspended animation were bound to be intensely communal, because when the Moslem League came into being one fact was patent, that strong and self-asserting communities were claiming rights and privileges in the name of the Nation when they really meant to benefit only a community or even a caste. It was also apparent that at least a certain section of Hindus in Bengal, the Punjab and the Deccan entertained towards Muhammadan feelings that can hardly be described as loyal. It was, therefore, necessary for the Mussalmans to express their own feelings of loyalty somewhat ostentatiously, not only with a view to impress Government with their firm intention of offering it their support, but also in the interests of the younger members of the community some of whom were liable to lose their balance through the intoxication born of the heady wine of politics of which they were taking the first copious draught after a long period of political torpor. This accounts for the fact that when the creed of the Moslem League was formulated for the first time six years ago both loyalty to Government and the protection of the communal interests of the Mussalmans found a prominent place in the Moslem programme. No doubt the promotion of harmony and concord with other communities was mentioned as another object of the League. But it was necessary to add the saving clause that these feelings were to be promoted without prejudice to Moslem loyalty and the advancement of Moslem interests. Such was the creed of the League when it was founded and those among the Mussalmans who may now snort at what was done six years ago would do well to remember that this creed was formulated by some of them and some of the most prominent men who share their views to-day.

In the matter of the electoral reform of the Legislative Councils the Mussalmans succeeded well enough, although they have yet to achieve success in the matter of the electoral reform of local bodies which is extremely essential. But on the 13th December, 1911, the Partition was annulled when least expected, and it was annulled without any compensation being offered to the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal. That momentous announcement is destined to have far-reaching results on the political growth of India some of which are no doubt well worth learning for the Mussalmans even at the cost of a majority in a province, although there are some lessons to be learned which we trust Government will not now be late in persuading the people of this country to unlearn. But the despatch of the Government of India which moved the Home Government to authorise the changes it proposed would long be memorable for the bold plunge that the Government of India made into the political future of the country. However hard and subtly Lord Crewe may now try to explain away paragraph 3 of that despatch, it is certain that self-government came large before the vision of the Government of India, and be it said to their credit that they welcomed it like statesmen and indicated their desire to hasten its approach. In view of the momentous change foreshadowed in that despatch, it has once more become necessary for the Mussalmans to examine their political chart, and while avoiding the submerged rocks in the perilous seas around them, they must turn the head of their ship towards the new haven. Eight hundred years of practical administration of a country is bound to create in any community a distaste for mere theorising and a practical instinct which is generally found to be much safer than the faculty of subtle reasoning. It was this instinct of the Mussalmans that led them to work for their educational swaraj before they formulated their claims even to a moderate participation in the administration of the country. But if the period of thirty years which intervened between the foundation of the Calcutta University and the establishment of the National Congress was just long enough for the new generation of Hindus to develop into manhood and strive for rights and privileges of at least political adolescence, the Muhammadans can neither be blamed for tardiness nor for undue haste if they too come forward to take their proper share in politics after the same interval after having established the nucleus of their future university, for exactly 30 years intervened between the foundation of Aligarh and the establishment of the Moslem League. To-day, when the Moslem League has placed self-government on its programme, it is true it has done so much earlier in the process of the political evolution of the community than the Hindus did. But it must be acknowledged that the Congress has done a good deal of pioneer work for it, and even travelling at the same pace as the Hindu community the Mussalmans were bound to come to the half-way mark from which their ultimate destination is clearly visible after a lesser interval than those who had to hew down the wood and clear the way.

But even now when the Mussalmans have accepted self-government to be their ultimate destination they have not done so through a love of meritless theories. Their practical instinct has once more come to their assistance, and that at a time when it was most necessary. We recognise that it would not do for any community in India to sink in its tents because the world is moving at a faster pace than it can cope with. It must either induce others to slacken their pace or make efforts to come into line with them. In the creed which has just been formulated by the League we see a welcome indication that Mussalmans are not going to let the part of King Canute and imperiously command the rushing tide to recede.

But they are not negligent of the proper safeguards against the flow of the tide which not only brings rich cargoes to the shore, but sometimes deals destruction also. In the first place, we are glad to note that they have no desire to play the redulous ape in asking for a particular form of self-government because somebody else enjoys it in the British Empire or some one in India has made it the ultimate ideal. The world has considerably changed even for the British Empire since the Allahabad Convention of the Congress when the Colonial Form of self-government became the creed of the Moderates. Ireland is today to have self-government much sooner than it was considered at the time, and other parts of the United Kingdom are not likely to remain always without their own Parliaments. At the same time, just as the form of self-government suitable for the Colonies has not proved suitable for Ireland, the forms of self-government now familiar to the British Empire may not suit India. Who can say that the same conditions as prevail in other parts of the Empire exist even to-day in this country? To take only one instance, are we to forget the Native States for ever, and may not the German Confederacy provide some political lessons for us when we turn our attention from British India, which is an artificial creation, to India as a whole which her geographical outlines and historical associations have made a compact integer? It is, therefore, a matter for extreme satisfaction that the words "suitable for India" qualify the system of self-government which is to be the ideal of the Moslem League.

In the next place, the framer of this important object of the League has gone beyond the commonplace phrase "through constitutional means" in giving an outline of the methods by which self-government is to be attained. It must be remembered that it had become necessary to qualify the methods of attaining self-government in this manner by the Moderates of the Congress because there was such a party as the Extremists who desired no such restrictions to fetter their political liberty. The Muhammadans have no such need to define the character of the methods which they desire to pursue in order to attain their object, for there are no divisions among them like the Moderates and the Extremists, and if true moderation comes to exist among their "leaders" we have every confidence that they would avoid one more pitfall into which the political pioneers of India unfortunately fell. What is, however, necessary, not only for the Mussalmans but for all the communities that have new bottles into which the old wine is being poured, is an indication that the goal is yet very distant if not dim, and that the way is long and wearisome. Idealism by all means, but not without patience, is the advice that the young need in every emotional community, and the Mussalmans owe it to the Hon. the Law Member, who in his freer days delivered the most remarkable Presidential Address of the League, that the Honorary Secretary in framing the creed of the League wisely included "a steady reform of the existing system of administration" as an indication of the slow process of attaining the quintum bonum. Indian administration is far from perfect to-day, but the progress made during the last seven years has been so rapid, that even if the pace is not accelerated it will not take long for the country to reach its destined goal.

But it is not so much on the reform of the administration by the administrators and those to whom they are responsible, nor even on the relationship that comes to exist between the rulers and the ruled that the attainment of self-government depends. Self-government is the necessary corollary of self-realisation, and India as a whole has not yet realised herself. Once her conflicting interests, warring creeds and rival communities not only conceive that India can be one in her soul as she is in her body, but feel her unity as an individual feels the unity of his individual self in spite of the diversity of the various members and organs of his body, and the varying moods of his intellect and soul, there is no power in the world that can deny her self-government. But we would warn our countrymen against playing the sedulous ape in their methods of nation-making as we have warned them in the matter of their choosing their political goal. Every country has within itself both centripetal and centrifugal political forces, but the powers of each of these differ according to the circumstances of each. In India political unity can be achieved not so much by annihilating smaller units that may appear to conflict with the ultimate scheme of unity, but by recognising their force and inevitableness. If we could choose a motto for a society of nation-makers in India we could suggest nothing better than what the United States of America have adopted. India is to be a pluribus unum. Its unity would come out of its differences, but it must be remembered that unlike America the lines of cleavage in India are not territorial but communal, and those who have seen the extra-territorial patriotism of the Mussalman during the present crisis will do well to remember that without ceasing to be Mussalmans they cannot merge their communal identity in their territorial patriotism of province or country. All that we hope is that in adopting self-government as their goal with an astonishing unanimity, the Mussalmans of India have not acted like the astronomer who fell into a well because his gaze was too intently fixed on other planets than his own. Disillusion will soon overtake them if they have forgotten their own political situation in this country in remembering too well the sad plight of their co-religionists in Tripoli and Morocco, in Persia and Turkey.

We have not spared the officiating Secretary of the Moslem League when to our mind he has been weak; but to-day we can find it in our hearts to forgive him all and to thank him not only on behalf of the Moslem community but of the whole country and of the Nation in being for providing them with a political creed which is destined to affect the beliefs and convictions of the men of to-day and of generations yet to come.

We also offer him here, as Mr. Mohamed Ali did in the course of discussion at Lucknow, our cordial support in maintaining that loyalty should be placed in the forefront of the objects of every political organisation in the country, and we have no more faith in the diagnosis of those who think that the differences between the Hindus and the Muhammadans are the outcome of what they call the Moslem parade of loyalty and the Gate-keeper's claims than we find any justification in their taunts that the Mussalmans have been shouting their loyalty from the housetops. A few calculating men have no doubt harped on loyalty too often just as they have made much personal capital out of the protection of communal interests. But that is no more reason for giving up the profession of loyalty than for discarding the declaration that the League shall advance and protect communal interests. The loyalty of the Mussalmans is a well established fact and we shall not pause to make invidious comparisons, for we have no desire that other communities should lag behind them in this respect. We trust that in course of time the loyalty of the whole of India would become so real and well-grounded that a declaration of loyalty in the political creed of any association will merely pass for a polite convention not unlike the oath of allegiance which the Members of Parliament in England and our own Councillors in India are required to take. So long as the political relationship of India to England is unique among the nations it is necessary to keep the loyalty of India to the British Crown in the forefront of India's political creed, but even when this unique character ceases to exist we trust the dignity of the Indian Nation would not be so delicate as to be unable to bear the weight of the convention of loyalty. And dignity should not be proclaimed from the housetops any more than loyalty. To-day it is necessary to work for the creation of a nation by promoting unity between the various communities of the country and fostering a public spirit which would refuse to tolerate the self-aggrandisement even of the community that is most numerous and most powerful, and it is our firm belief that whatever may be the policy of this or that ruler of India it is the connection of India with Great Britain which has made it possible for an Indian Nation to come into being. A nation would be the greatest blessing that England would confer on India, and those who work for it and hasten its advent, whether Indian or English, are deserving of our eternal gratitude.

The Moslem University.

THE following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the Mussalmans held at Lucknow on the 27th and 29th December, 1912. At first H. H. the Nawab of Rampur and subsequently the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad were in the chair:—

1. The name of the University should be "The Moslem University, Aligarh, and not the Aligarh University."

2. The Moslem community is not prepared to invest the Governor-General in Council with those powers which it was proposed to vest in His Excellency the Viceroy as the Chancellor of the University, and expresses its regret at the disapproval of His Majesty's Secretary of State of the appointment of His Excellency the Viceroy as Chancellor of the University and pray for a reconsideration of this decision.

3. Proposed by Mr. Mohamed Ali and seconded by Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami.

This meeting views the decisions of His Majesty's Secretary of State as contained in the letter of the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler, dated Simla, 9th August, with profound disappointment and regret. Having regard to the views expressed by the Constitution Committee and in this meeting in the course of discussion, among others,

- (i) that the name of the University should be "The Moslem University, Aligarh;"
- (ii) that with regard to the control, the powers proposed to be vested in the Chancellor should not be vested in the Governor-General in Council;
- (iii) that the power mentioned in clause 5 of chapter III of the Statutes should be the same as that conferred on the Patron under section 41 of the Rules and Regulations of the Trustees of the Aligarh College;
- (iv) that with regard to affiliation, the Statutes should remain as proposed; and
- (v) that the provisions in the Constitution relating to the powers of the Court, the Council and the Senate should not be modified; and further, having regard to the momentous issues involved therein, this meeting appoints a Committee of the following gentlemen with full powers and authority to act and finally settle all matters relating to the Moslem University in such manner as may seem proper to them in the best interests of the community, and to wait in deputation on His Excellency the Viceroy and to make all necessary representations in this behalf.

EX-OFFICIO:—H. H. the Aga Khan, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., President of the Moslem University Foundation Committee.

The Hon. Raja Sir Ali Muhammad Khan, K.C.S.I., of Mahmudabad, President of the Moslem University Constitution Committee.

Nawab Muhammad Ishaq Khan, C.S., Secretary-Elect of the Board of Trustees of the M. A. -O. College, Aligarh.

UNITED PROVINCES:—Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, Sahebzada Aftab Ahmad Khan, The Hon. Khwaja Ghulam-us-Saqlain, Mr. Nabullah, Mr. Wazir Hasan.

PUNJAB:—Dr. Mohamed Iqbal, K. B. Mian Mohamed Shafi, Capt. Malik Muhariz Khan, Khan Bahadur Sheikh Rahim Baksh, C.I.E., Mr. Fazle Hussain.

BOMBAY:—Mr. M. A. Jinnah, Mr. Fazalbhai Currimbhay.

BENGAL:—The Hon. Mr. Justice Hasan Imam, Mr. Sultan Ahmad.

BEHAR:—Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haq, Mr. Fakhruddin.

CENTRAL PROVINCES:—Khan Bahadur H. M. Malik.

DELHI:—Mr. Mohamed Ali.

ENGLAND:—Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Dec. 26.

A CONSTANTINOPLE wire says that the Government yesterday telegraphed the counter-proposals of the Porte to be submitted to the Peace Conference.

A Sofia wire says that political circles declare that the cession of Adrianople is a sine qua non for peace.

The semi-official Mir publishes an article warning the governing classes of the Allied States of the dangers which may arise from the insulting anti-Bulgarian diatribes appearing in a portion of the unofficial Press of the Allied States.

A message to the Times from Salonica says that in view of the determined stand of the Turks at Janina, where they are estimated to have 40,000 men, another Greek division is embarking for Prevesa.

London, Dec. 27.

A Constantinople wire says that according to the newspapers the Turkish counter-claims to the terms of the Allies include the retention of Adrianople and Salonica under Turkish sovereignty. They concede to Bulgaria a port on the Aegean similar to that conceded to Servia on the Adriatic. They refuse to entertain the idea of a pecuniary indemnity.

The delegates of the Allies express amazement at the Turkish counter-proposals as published, and emphatically declare that they could not be seriously discussed at the Conference. Meanwhile the Powers are earnestly counselling moderation in Constantinople.

The Allies declare that they will never agree to Adrianople remaining Turkish, and any serious proposal to that effect would wreck the Conference.

London, Dec. 28.

Renter understands that the Turkish counter-proposals will be submitted to-day to the Peace Conference. Both parties are presenting their maximum demands with a view to mutual concessions. A compromise is therefore likely. Reshid Pasha presided to-day and is thus advantageously placed for defending Turkish claims. A lively debate is certain.

Later.

The Peace Conference met at eleven o'clock to-day and adjourned at 15-25 until four o'clock on Monday afternoon. Reshid Pasha presided. He submitted the Turkish counter-proposals which proved to be unacceptable, whereupon the Turkish delegates declared they must communicate again with Constantinople.

At the Conference to-day the Turkish counter-proposals were, firstly, that the vilayet of Adrianople should remain Turkish. Secondly, that Macedonia should be converted into a Principality with Salonica as a capital under the sovereignty of the Sultan and under the rule of a Protestant prince from a neutral state chosen by the Allies and nominated by the Sultan. Thirdly, that Albania should be made autonomous under the sovereignty of the Sultan and under the Prince Imperial of the Imperial Ottoman family chosen for five years with possibility of renewal. Fourthly, that Crete was not a matter for the Conference, but between Turkey and the Great Powers.

A general discussion took place at the Conference of the Ottoman proposals. The Allies emphasized that the Turks did not recognise the facts of the situation, particularly in regard to Macedonia. They requested fresh Turkish proposals, which would take into consideration the terms of the Allies. The Turkish delegates refused to give a definite answer as to whether to-day's proposals were their last word. The Allies pointed out that the discussion of Macedonian reforms was quite unacceptable at this stage.

London, Dec. 29.

Renter learns that the representatives of the Balkan Allies at the Conference are of opinion that the proceedings at yesterday's Conference have weakened the original belief in Turkey's sincerity. It is now felt that Turkey is seeking to gain time in the hope of something turning up to her advantage. Some of the delegates are convinced that the time has come for the Powers to speak plainly and put an end to Turkey's tergiversations. There are hints of a Balkan ultimatum if the Turks prove uncompromising. The Albanian circle disapprove of the Turkish idea of an Ottoman prince for Albania. They want a European prince with European advisers.

Turkish delegates, in an interview with Renter's representative, admitted that their counter-proposals embodied more than they expected to get, but they were only following the example set by the Allies. The Turks remain apparently adamant on the subject of Adrianople, which they declare is indispensable to the security of Constantinople and European Turkey. Nevertheless, in spite of the 'Turks' outward firmness, it is expected that they will submit an amended scheme to-morrow on which it will be possible to negotiate.

London, Dec. 30.

A Constantinople wire says it is stated that as a result of a prolonged meeting of the Council of Ministers instructions have been sent to the delegates in London to propose that the differences be referred to the Conference of Ambassadors.

A semi-official note was issued at the conclusion of the Council stating that while Turkey is animated by a conciliatory spirit, and is desirous of the success of the negotiations, she can in no circumstances assent to the cession of Adrianople.

A Constantinople wire says that most of the Ambassadors have advised the Porte to endeavour to come to terms with the Balkan States. The warning of the Russian Ambassador of the danger of delay owing to the situation in Asia Minor has disagreeably impressed official circles, in view of the agitation in the army, which is believed to be fostered by the Committee of Union and Progress, in favour of the resumption of hostilities.

An Athens wire states that fighting continues at Bizani, which commands the road to Janina. Several Turkish attacks on the Greek positions have been repulsed.

London, Dec. 31.

The Conference met again to-day when Dr. Danoff presided.

The Turkish delegates said that their instructions were incomplete and further reference to Constantinople was necessary.

The Conference adjourned until Wednesday. Both sides continue to show the greatest determination regarding Adrianople.

The delegates of the Allies, interviewed by Renter, said the Turks at the Conference announced that it was the opinion of the Porte that the majority of the disputed questions should be submitted to the Powers, excepting the question of the Turco-Bulgarian frontier, which should be settled between Turkey and Bulgaria.

Renter understands that the steps which the representatives of the Balkan States will take at the meeting of the Peace Conference on Wednesday, should the Turkish proposal again prove unacceptable, will partake of the character of an ultimatum.

The Powers have decided nothing concerning Turkey's proposal that they should take some action to promote peace. Meanwhile the Ambassadors in Constantinople are urging moderation and they emphasise the necessity for Turkey recognising the present situation.

London, Jan. 1.

Renter learns that Dr. Danoff and Reshid Pasha met privately on Monday and discussed the whole situation earnestly attempting to arrive at an understanding.

It appears that the Turkish attitude is influenced by the attitude of the army, which demands the retention of Adrianople.

Bulgarian circles in the London declare that there have been many desertions from the garrison of Adrianople recently.

It is understood that immediately peace is concluded Austria and Italy in the name of Europe will invite Servia to withdraw her troops from Albania.

It is reported in Vienna that Rumania wants the cession of territory on the Danube amounting to about 1,150 square miles.

The Peace Conference sat for four hours on Wednesday and adjourned until Friday. It is believed that much progress was made. It is officially stated that the Conference discussed the Turkish counter-proposals and that an agreement was reached on certain points. The discussion of others was adjourned till Friday.

London, Jan. 2.

The Turkish counter-proposals were to cede all occupied territories westward of the vilayet of Adrianople which would remain Turkish subject to the rectification of the Turco-Bulgarian Frontier to be negotiated between Turkey and Bulgaria alone. Albania to be autonomous, the Powers settling its boundaries and political organisation. As Crete was en dépôt with the Powers the latter must be consulted before any decision was taken in regard to it. As regards the Aegean Islands they belonged to Asia Minor, and it was impossible to cede any, but Turkey was prepared to discuss questions concerning them (apparently meaning reforms) with the Powers. The Allies replied that the cession of territory to the westward of Adrianople must comprise all and not only occupied territory. The Turks yielded on this point. The Allies refused to admit separate negotiations with reference to Adrianople. All negotiations must be with the Allies as a whole. The Turks again yielded. The Allies objected to the ratification of the frontier proposal as too vague, and asked the Turks to submit a definite boundary with a map at the next sitting. The position of Crete was a matter between Turkey and the Powers, and the Allies said they would possibly approach the Powers later, but Turkey must relinquish all rights to the Island forthwith. The Allies insisted on the cession of the Aegean Islands. In regard to the points which they had not yielded, the Turks finally stated that they would ask for fresh instructions from Constantinople. The Balkan Allies have assented to the Turkish proposals regarding the autonomy, boundaries and political organization of Albania. It was generally noticed that the language of the Ottoman delegates yesterday was much more conciliatory regarding Adrianople. The talk of the autonomy of Macedonia with Salonica as capital has been definitely abandoned. The Balkan delegates recognise that much progress has been made. The advice given at Constantinople has already had a good effect, which is reflected in the more moderate attitude of the Turks. The utmost friendliness prevailed at yesterday's sitting, though occasionally there was a sharp discussion. It is stated that the Conference yesterday proved that the union of the Allies was closer than ever.

The report that Austria may oppose the cession of Scutari to Montenegro has excited general resentment at Cetinje.

In an interview with Renter's representative Dr. Danoff said that the position of affairs had not improved so much as some imagined.

"We expect," he said, "the new map of the boundary respecting Adrianople at to-morrow's sitting. If we find to-morrow that the map does not accord with the Allies' terms negotiations will be broken off. We shall also insist upon our terms regarding the island."

The Peace Delegates.

TURKEY.

MUSTAFA RENDID PASHA.

One of the most experienced Turkish diplomatists. Has had some service in the Balkans, where he was Secretary in Charge of the Imperial Ottoman Commissionership in Bulgaria from 1890 to 1898, and Minister in Bukarest from 1894 until the beginning of 1896. He was promoted to be Ottoman Ambassador in Rome in April of that year, and was soon raised to the rank of Pasha. He remained here for many years until 1908, when he was transferred to Vienna, an appointment which he took up in January 1909, and retained until October, 1911. In the summer of the present year he entered Ghazi Muktar's Cabinet as Minister of Mines and Forests, and his activities in connexion with Turco-Italian peace negotiations at Ouchy in September and October last can be regarded in the light of a special qualification for his present appointment.

GENERAL SALIH PASHA.

A cavalry officer, he was at one time in disfavour under the Hamidian regime and was exiled to Erzurum. In 1906 he was for a time Vali of Scutari, and in August, 1908, shortly after the re-establishment of the Constitution, was appointed Assistant Chief of the General Staff under Izzet Pasha. Next year, on the advent of Hilmi Pasha to power as Grand Vizier in May, he entered the Cabinet as Minister of War, but retired with his chief in December and was appointed Director of Cavalry in 1910, under Mahmud Sherket Pasha, who had succeeded him at the Seraskierate. After this, on the outbreak of the war with Italy, he became Minister of Marine, but went out of office with Said Pasha in July of the present year. He has recently been appointed Minister of Public Works in Kiamil Pasha's fifth Cabinet, which was constituted only last October, and in addition to this he is also acting as Minister of Marine ad interim.

OSMAN NIZAMI PASHA.

A Soldier-diplomatist, partly of German origin, he resided in Bulgaria for some time as a member of the Commission of Enkaf, and in 1896 was appointed Secretary of the Cretan Reform Commission. In 1905 he became Assistant Chief of the General Staff, but three years later deserted war for diplomacy and was appointed Ambassador in Berlin in September, 1908. On the occasion of the presentation of his credentials shortly afterwards the German Emperor took the opportunity of making an emphatic manifestation of good-will towards Turkey. At one time it was believed that he was to represent Turkey at the negotiations for the Tchataldja armistice, and he left Berlin for Constantinople, but did not actually take part.

GREECE.

M. ELEUTHERIOS VENEZELOS.

Was born in Cerigo in 1864, after its cession to Greece, of one of the oldest and most distinguished families in Hellas. The Venezeloi trace their origin to the Florentine Dukes of Athens in the Middle Ages, and can claim an authentic patron saint in St. Philothea Venezela, who was beaten to death by the Turks in 1589, and was subsequently buried in the Cathedral of Athens. Eleutherios, whose father was expelled from Crete by the Turks, studied law at the University of Athens and in Germany, and after the establishment of Cretan autonomy he, although an Hellenic subject, became Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Island Government in May, 1899. In September, 1901, his policy no longer coincided with the wishes of the High Commissioner, Prince George of Greece, and he resigned office, becoming for a time unpopular. In Opposition, however, he achieved a considerable reputation, and soon after the resignation of M. Zaimis from the High Commissionership (in which he had succeeded Prince George in October, 1908) M. Venezelos became the leading man in Crete. In January, 1910, in the middle of the politico-military crisis in Greece, he was invited to Athens in order to advise the Ministry, and when a National Assembly was convoked for the purpose of revising the Hellenic Constitution he headed the poll in Attica, although he was at the time (September, 1910) absent in Crete. On the fall of the Dragoumis Cabinet in October in the same year M. Venezelos became Prime Minister, and has since then devoted his whole energies to the rehabilitation of Greece in every way. He is responsible for the inauguration of those measures and reforms which have proved so effective in the army and navy, and under his Administration the finances of the kingdom have been greatly improved.

M. SKOULOUDIS.

A Chiote, formerly a banker in Constantinople, who, after retiring from business, settled in Athens and was elected several times to the Greek Parliament. In April, 1897, he joined M. Ralli's Cabinet and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and by his ability was able greatly to mitigate the terms of peace which were imposed on Greece by the victorious Turks after the war of 1897. He retired from office in October of the same year.

M. JOANNES GENNADIUS.

He was born in Athens in 1847 of an Epirote family, and early entered the Diplomatic Service of his country. Appointed Attaché in Washington in 1871, he was promoted to be Second Secretary in Constantinople (1873) and First Secretary in London (1875). After acting as Chargé d'Affaires in London from 1876, he attended the Berlin Congress in 1878 as a member of the Hellenic Mission. On his return to London he succeeded in rehabilitating Greek finances to such an extent as to secure the quotation of Greek securities on the Stock Exchange for the first time for 50 years. In 1880 he went to Constantinople as Chargé d'Affaires, but shortly afterwards returned to London in the same capacity before leaving in 1882 for Vienna as First Secretary and Chargé d'Affaires. In March, 1886, he became Resident Minister in London, and was sent to Washington in connexion with the tariff of 1888. His special mission was successful for Greek commerce, as were also his efforts for a treaty of commerce with this country in April, 1890. After this he was promoted to the full diplomatic rank of Minister and retained the position until the retrenchments of 1892. Being out of sympathy with the Greek policy after 1897 he lived in retirement until August, 1910, when he returned to London once more as Minister. M. Gennadius married an English lady in 1912, and is an Hon. D. C. L. of Oxford and an Hon. LL. D. of St Andrews.

M. GEORGE STREIT.

The grandson of a German who went to Greece in the time of King Otto, M. Streit is the son of a former Governor of the National Bank of Greece who was Minister of Finance in the Zaimis Cabinet of October, 1897. He is a member of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague, and for a time was Legal Adviser to the Hellenic Foreign Office and Professor of International Law at the University of Athens. In September, 1910, he was appointed to the position which he now holds—that of Greek Minister in Vienna.

The Hellenic Delegates are assisted by a Legal Adviser, by two Military Commissioners, and by a special Cretan Representative. PROFESSOR POLITIS.

A Corfiote who has devoted himself to the study of International Law. After studying for some time in France he was appointed to the Professorship of this subject in the University of Poitiers, and subsequently to the same office in the University of Paris—a rare distinction for a foreigner.

GENERAL DANGLIS.

An Albanian from Epirus who before the present war was in command of the Athens Division of the Greek Army. He is the inventor of an improved form of mountain-gun, and was Chief of Staff to the Crown Prince Constantine throughout the recent successful campaign.

COLONEL METAXAS.

Has studied in the Berlin Military Academy, and as a member of the Hellenic General Staff is credited with the preparation of some of the chief lines of the Northern advance.

M. ALEXANDER RHANGABES.

Was Private Secretary to M. Zaimis during his tenure of the High Commissionership of Crete from October, 1906, until August, 1909, and had considerable influence upon the affairs of that island during the régime of the Provisional Government. He attends the Delegation at the special request of M. Venezelos.

BULGARIA.

DR. DANOFF.

From 1894-1897 he was Vice-President of the Sobranye, and in March, 1901, became Minister for Foreign Affairs in M. Karaveloff's Cabinet. In January, 1902, he succeeded his chief as Prime Minister, but resigned office in May, 1903. After this he became Professor of International Law in the University of Sofia, and represented Bulgaria in the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague. In September, 1911, he was elected President of the Sobranye, and subsequently, as President of the Grand Sobranye, was largely responsible for the revision of the Constitution carried out by that Assembly. In November of this year he went to Vienna on a special mission to Count Berchtold in connexion with the Austro-Servian difficulty, and afterwards was a Bulgarian delegate at the recent negotiations for an armistice at Tchnaldja, where he presided at the sessions. He has just visited Rumania, being charged with a special mission to King Charles and his Cabinet.

GENERAL PAPRIKOFF.

During the Servo-Bulgarian war in 1886 he served as Assistant to the Chief of the General Staff, and in 1889 was Commandant of the Military Academy in Sofia. In 1891 he was attached to the General Staff as Intendant, and became Chief of the Administrative Department of that body in 1888, finally becoming Chief of the General Staff in 1897. In January, 1899, he joined the Cabinet of M. Grekoff as Minister for War, a position which he retained under that statesman's four immediate successors—M. Ivantchoff, General Petroff, M. Karavcoff, and Dr. Danoff. In April, 1903, he resigned his portfolio in favour of General Sayoff, and was appointed to the General Staff as Inspector of Infantry. This he relinquished in order to go to St. Petersburg as Bulgarian Minister in January, 1907. On the invitation of M. Malinoff he returned to Bulgaria and joined his Cabinet as Minister for Foreign Affairs in January, 1908. In this capacity he did much to preserve the peace of Europe during the crisis which ensued on the proclamation of Bulgarian independence and the Austro-Hungarian annexation of Bosnia and the Herzegovina. In November, 1910, he was once more sent to St. Petersburg as Bulgarian Minister, and retained that position until October in the present year, when he returned to Sofia, only to be appointed Bulgarian military representative with the Montenegrin Army.

M. MICHAEL MAJANOFF.

Born in 1854, he was educated at Robert College, near Constantinople, and became a member of the High Court of Eastern Rumania. In 1882 he became Comptroller-General of the Finances of that province and Director of Finances in 1885. In February, 1896, he became Minister of Public Works and Communications in M. Stoiloff's Cabinet, a position which he retained until January, 1899. In September, 1911, he was elected Vice-President of the Sobranye, and in January of the present year was appointed Minister in London. He has been editor of the Mir and other publications.

The Bulgarian Delegates are assisted by a Diplomatic Adviser and a Military Commissioner.

M. MILTCHOFF.

Has been Chief of the Protocol at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Sofia since 1907.

COLONEL JOSTOFF.

SERVIA.

M. STOYAN NOVAKOVITCH.

Has had a long and varied Ministerial and diplomatic career in the service of his country. In October, 1881, he took office as Minister of Public Instruction and Worship in the Protchanski Cabinet, and retained the position until October, 1883. He accepted the Ministry of the Interior in the Garachanin Cabinet in October, 1884, but went out of office in the next year. In September, 1886, he was appointed Minister in Constantinople, and continued to represent Servia at the Porte until 1891. In 1894 he became President of the Council of State, and in July, 1895, took office as Prime Minister, and at the same time directed the Foreign Affairs of the country. He resigned in December, 1896, and in January, 1898, returned to Constantinople as Minister, remaining there until 1900. He next went to St. Petersburg in a similar capacity and was Servian Minister in that capital from February, 1901, until 1903. For a few months in 1909, from February to October, M. Novakovich was once more Prime Minister, but did not retain for himself any Ministerial portfolio.

M. ANDRA NIKOLITCH.

In 1890 he joined the Cabinet of General Grouitch as Minister of Public Instruction and Worship and retained that position under M. Pashitch in his 1891-92 Cabinet. In April, 1893, he entered the Dokitch Cabinet as Minister for Foreign Affairs, but retired from office in 1894, at the same time relinquishing his membership of the Council of State, which he had held since 1890. In December, 1896, he resumed the portfolio of Public Instruction and Worship under Dr. Simitch, retaining it until October, 1897. For a few days in May, 1902, he was in M. Pashitch's short-lived Cabinet as Minister for Foreign Affairs, and again in the same capacity in the Grouitch Cabinet of October, 1903. He returned to the Council of State in the same year, but when the Cabinet was reconstructed in February, 1904, the Foreign Office was undertaken by M. Pashitch, and M. Nikolitch retired. The attempted reconstruction in the December of the same year, in which he was once more in charge of Public Instruction, failed, and he immediately accepted the same office in the Cabinet of M. Pashitch, who was General Grouitch's successor. This Ministry went out of office in the following May, but M. Nikolitch returned to power with his chief in April, 1906, still in the same capacity. When M. Pashitch, after twice reconstructing his Cabinet, resigned in June, 1908, the Minister of Public Instruction retained his portfolio under the new Prime Minister, M. Velimirovitch. This Cabinet went out in February, 1909, and M. Nikolitch did not again take office, but in October of that year was elected President of the Skupstina, a position which he still retains.

DR. MILANKO VESITCH.

Was appointed Servian Minister at Rome in June, 1910, and remained there until the beginning of 1903. In July, 1904, he went to Paris as Minister to the French Republic, an appointment which he still retains. He is a member of the Institute of International Law, and is a Servian representative in the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague.

MONTENEGRO.

M. LAZAR MIOUTCHKOVITCH.

Was Montenegrin Consul at Scutari from 1899 until 1901. Next year he became President of the "Cour des Comptes," and afterwards Minister of Finance from 1903 until 1905. In that year, on the proclamation of the Constitution in Montenegro, he was selected by Prince Nicholas, as he then was, to be the first Prime Minister, and took office in December. He also took charge of the Foreign Office. In April, 1907, he retired, being succeeded by Dr. Tomjanovitch, and became President of the Council of State until 1909.

M. POROVITCH.

Acted as Chargé d'Affaires for Montenegro in Constantinople from 1910 until the beginning of October in the present year.

COUNT VOJKOVITCH.

Was in charge of the Ministry of Justice in Montenegro from 1900 until 1902, and has more recently been acting as Private Secretary to King Nicholas.—The Times.

The Conferences in London.

SIR EDWARD GREY was able on the 11th December to make in the House of Commons the statement in regard to the meeting of the delegates of the belligerent States in London.

Mr. Bonar Law (leader of the Opposition) asked whether the Foreign Secretary had any further statement to make in regard to the diplomatic situation in regard to the Balkans.

Sir Edward Grey said: I promised yesterday, in reply to a question put to me respecting a prospective meeting of Ambassadors, to make a fuller statement on Thursday. As I am in a position to make the statement to-day, I will ask the House to allow me to do so.

As the House is aware, the five belligerents are sending their respective delegates to London to negotiate a peace. The King has placed rooms in St. James's Palace at their disposal, and His Majesty's Government will do every thing in their powers to promote the convenience of the delegates. The choice of London was made by the belligerent States on their own initiative. It was in no way prompted or suggested by us, but we are sure the House will agree that their choice is very agreeable to us—(cheers)—and their presence very welcome, and we believe that they will find the conditions here favourable to the conduct of their negotiations and the conclusion of peace, which we all earnestly desire to see secured. The Great Powers, who are neutral and signatories of the Treaty of Berlin, have now all agreed that their representatives in London should meet together for informal and non-committal consultation. The object will be to facilitate an exchange of views, especially on those points which may most directly affect the interests of any of the Great Powers concerned. These conversations will begin as soon as all the Ambassadors in London have received their instructions from their respective Governments, we hope next week. They will not constitute a conference, and in this connection I would recall that the first suggestion of a formal Conference came from Monsieur Poincaré, and Paris will therefore presumably be the first place to be considered should a formal Conference be found to be opportune and necessary.

"At this moment I do not think that I can with advantage make observations at any length on the European situation. Hopes and anxieties have varied from day to day, and may continue for some time to vary, and it is difficult to say anything without the risk of causing undue pessimism or raising hopes that might be subsequently disappointed. The relations between the Governments of the Powers are amicable and the diplomatic situation is favourable, and if there is anxiety it is lest some untoward and unforeseen incident should occur and cause an unfavourable change in the diplomatic atmosphere. The consultations of the Ambassadors are to be informal and non-committal, and this is, of course, an indication that the Powers are not yet sure that a solution of all difficulties is in sight. On the other hand, the fact that the Powers agreed to come to closer quarters have all in discussion may be taken as evidence that there is no one of them who believes that such solution is impossible, or that agreement is not more probable than deadlock. And when once the conversations in London have begun and the representatives of the Powers are in a position to discuss questions with each other round a table, the Powers will by this means be in closer touch, and there should be less danger of any of them drifting apart from the others should unforeseen points of difficulty arise. We trust, therefore, that these conversations may begin as soon as possible.

"In the interval I wish to refrain from any further comments of a political nature on the situation, and, indeed, the fact that London is the meeting-place for the conversations and for the peace negotiations imposes on His Majesty's Government a special obligation to be reserved in making such comments, but we desired that the House—whose forbearance and restraint all through this time of great interest and delicacy His Majesty's Government most fully recognize—should be informed as soon as the matters to which I have referred were sufficiently definite for this statement to be made."

The Porte and Peace.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Dec. 9.

As Tawfik Pasha has persisted in his refusal to accept the post of first Turkish plenipotentiary at the Peace Conference in London, the place will be filled by Rashid Pasha. The second plenipotentiary will be Osman Nizami Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador in Berlin. The third, General Salih Pasha, formerly Minister for War and Marine, and now Minister of Public Works.

With the Ottoman delegates on their way to London the conclusion of peace would seem to be inevitable. Yet there are indications that the London Conference may be but an interlude between two acts of the Balkan tragedy. The language of a section of the Turkish Press, and the excited declarations of subordinate officials may be largely discounted; but it is, to say the least, disquieting to find that while on the one hand the conditions of the armistice are not made public here, presumably on account of their stringency, on the other hand, the more or less officially inspired Agence Ottomane continues to regale its readers with highly-coloured descriptions of Ottoman successes in Chios and of the pitiable plight of the armies of the Balkan League. Even Nuraudughian Effendi, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, himself appears to have supplied the correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt with a most roseate picture of the Ottoman military position and with a statement that the Porte does not contemplate the cession of either Adrianople or of Salonica, or even, indeed, of Macedonia to the Balkan States.

Perhaps, however, the real explanation of his statements is to be found in his undoubted desire of the officers and men of the Syrian and Eastern Anatolian units now at the front to continue the war, and to the rumoured revival of the Committee propaganda in military circles. That there has been some sort of revulsion of feeling with regard to the recent arrests of the leaders of the Committee is indicated by the subsequent release of nearly half of the persons arrested and by the publication in the local Press of statements that many of those released had been victims of delation.

Whatever may be the currents now at work beneath the surface, there can be no doubt that the Government will have to manoeuvre very cleverly if it is to satisfy at once the appetites of the Balkan League and the amour propre of the Ottoman public. Even in Turkey conciliation of the irreconcilable is not too easy, and those who hope and anticipate that the Turkish Army and the educated civilian classes will accept the logic of accomplished facts may prove to have overestimated the military knowledge of the former and underrated the capacity of the latter for changing their whole political attitude with disconcerting speed and frequency.

Turkey Misled by the Powers.

Dr Hans Baath, of the Berliner Tageblatt, has had an interview with Kiamul Pasha, in the course of which he put to him the question, "Is it true that the Great Powers assured the Porte that there would be no war in the Balkans?" The Grand Vizier replied, "Perfectly true only that took place before my Cabinet came into power. Turkey, harassed by the Italian war and by a thousand and one domestic troubles, dismissed at that time all the reservists, relying upon the assurance of the Powers that no war would take place. We were thus surprised and defeated before we could organise effectual resistance. With all that there is no reason for being anxious about the future. Our military position is very strong to-day, and in desiring to make peace we obey no compulsion."

The Population in Adrianople.

THE Friends' War Victims' Relief Fund has received an interesting letter on the condition of the population shut up in Adrianople from Mr H. M. Wallis of Reading, who, with Mr J. B. Crossfield, is representing the Society in Bulgaria. Mr Wallis says:—

"Our new headquarters will be at Mustapha Pasha, where we are to warehouse our flour and await the (imminent) fall of Adrianople.

"Now comes the gravamen of the situation. It is believed by the Queen and Prime Minister that the non-combatants inside Adrianople number from 50,000 to 60,000—the Times correspondent discussing it with me admits 70,000, local Bulgarians of education put it at 85,000 and up to 100,000. But General Dimitreff, Chief of the Commissariat, plainly told us yesterday that there are from 110,000 to 120,000 after deducting 25,000 troops and 10,000 civilian deaths in the four weeks. He said this deliberately as the outcome of some pencilled calculations as to the weight of the flour required, and said 60,000 ordinary civilian inhabitants plus 60,000 driven in from the surrounding country, by the turning movement of the Bulgarian armies, minus deaths, would leave what I give you. So it is probably approximately true, and Crossfield and I are up against a calamity unparalleled in our time, for all food has been taken up for the garrison, and though some distribution is made to Moslems, none is given out to Christians, and there are many Armenian Christians and very many Hebrews. What can we do with our beggarly £1,000? As the General said you can feed the lot for three days. He too, is greatly impressed by the approaching calamity, but his job is to feed the army. He is a remarkable man, who deeply impressed us and is giving us every possible help. Remember that when the place falls the trouble is only begun. There is not even a rug left in a house, or a morsel of food within a radius of 12 miles of the besieged town."

The Russian Advance in Asia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN."

SIR,—In Saturday's issue of the Manchester Guardian I read the following ominous news which, judging from antecedent evidence, appears, to my mind, to represent a true state of facts. It says:

"It is stated that the Russian Consuls in Armenian vilayets have made it known that Russia is prepared to protect the Armenian population in case of disorder."

In drawing the attention of the British public to this report I trust it is permissible to me to ask—Is England so enmeshed in the coils of her understanding with Russia or so busy with "Te Deums" over the collapse of Turkey in Europe as to have neither time nor inclination to consider what this new development of Russian political activity means to British dominancy in the East? England and Russia represent two different ideals diametrically opposed to each other; one stands, with all her mistakes, for the progress of free and self-governing institutions among subject nationalities; the other for reaction and repression. I am convinced that any weakening of British influence or power in the East in the face of her great rival—any setback to England due to whatever cause—would be disastrous to Asiatic nations. I believe there is in this country absolute consensus of opinion on that point. I trust also there is the same unanimity regarding the vital necessity to England of her Asiatic Empire.

That being so, may I call attention to some of the salient features of recent Russian movements which, but for the preoccupations of the last few months, I feel certain would have created more than excitement among the public? Whilst our eyes have been fixed on the North Sea Russia has strengthened her grasp irrevocably on Northern Persia. No amount of polite protests are likely to induce her to loosen the hold she has acquired; all pledges and promises for the withdrawal of troops are courteously but coolly put aside by a declaration of impossibility in view of mythical disorders. Her road to the Gulf is now assured. Herat is open any day to a coup de main. From Herat to Chaman and to Cabul the advance is not difficult. The Afghans are no fools; the fact that one Asiatic Power moves with a fixed determination for a definite purpose whilst the other is always giving way is not without its effect on their minds.

That is the position in Mid-Asia. The news to which I have referred shows that the process which has succeeded so admirably in Persia is about to be repeated in Armenia. "Russia will give her protection in case of disorders." You may rest assured that, in spite of all dements, there will be disorders which, as in Azerbaijan, will afford the pretext for the advance of troops. Once there, they will not be withdrawn for "fear of a renewal of the disorders." If the question were put to the Armenians themselves whether they would be happier or freer under Cossack domination there would be no doubt as to the answer.

But what of the effect on British dominancy in Asia? The occupation of Armenia would only be a prelude to the absorption of Asia Minor and an advance to the eastern shores of the Mediterranean. Is England prepared to give up her Asiatic Empire? With Russia dominant in Persia and Western Asia there can be but one result.

When Liberal England again begins to see things straight, I feel sure she will realize that a strong Turkey is a vital necessity to her Asiatic Empire and to the uninterrupted continuance of her work in Asia.—Yours, &c.,
AMEER ALI.

San Stefano Hospital.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Nov. 29.

THERE has been among the conflicting and so often vain rumours of this changeable city a great deal of talk about cholera here lately. I have had the opportunity of observing on the spot during the last week the result of the disease—whether it be cholera or not—at San Stefano. This is a small suburb of Constantinople, whose name has been written in history. Possibly some day Clapham Junction will be equally famous if there is ever a Treaty of Clapham; subsequently renewed by a Congress of Constantinople. It contains a number of elegant houses inhabited by the well-to-do during the summer months. San Stefano—why or how I know not—has become one of the smaller centres of the sick, in other words, a cholera camp.

A DESERTED SUBURB.

But the first question is, is it cholera? The disease here manifest—and terribly manifest—does not include all the best known symptoms of cholera. On the other hand, we know that the sick soldiers have suffered as much as men can suffer from exhaustion, exposure, and starvation. So, until medical diagnosis has been made, we shall not know whether the sick at San Stefano are suffering and dying from cholera or from the results of disorganized war. But from the human, not from the scientific, point of view the question is indifferent. The fact, from the human point of view, is that some of the Turkish soldiers at San Stefano are sick and dying from a disease that in many points resembles cholera and others are probably dying from cholera. San Stefano is deserted. The elegant summer "residences" are empty; only every now and then in the silent street you hear the tinkling stale music of a faded pianoforte, which plays an old-fashioned—not an old—tune. It was here on the railway embankment, and under the outside wall of the town, that the dead and dying were lying like crushed insects. This was about a week ago, I suppose, but the week has appeared long.

Then somebody had the idea of making a deserted Greek school into a hospital, and when I first visited this spot I found it under the charge of a Turkish medical officer assisted by a small group of Europeans. Two ladies and three men of different nationalities. There are in the Greek school eight rooms altogether. There are five rooms occupied by patients, one which forms a sort of kitchen and store room and two rooms occupied by the medical staff of the Turkish Red Crescent. Besides this there is a compound roofed over in the open air, and there are a certain number of tents. In this house and in these tents there are (or rather were until to-day) about 350 men, all in various stages of sickness. Is it cholera? They are in any case very ill. So many die every day; but less and less every day; only five last night, compared with 15 the night before.

When you think of a hospital you think of all the luxury of modern science, of clean beds, a supply of sterilized water, antiseptics, lemonade, baths, etc. Here there are no such appliances. Mattresses on the floor, crowded rooms, no means of washing and dressing or bandaging. A hospital such as the hospitals in the Middle Ages must have been.

The men suffer from a multitude of other diseases than cholera, even if it is cholera. One has got mumps. Many have got gangrened feet and legs, which are blue and stiff and numb, as if they had been frost-bitten. Their limbs must either be amputated or the men must die. And an amputated Turk has no future. Some have sores and holes in their limbs, although none are wounded, and all are unwashed. There is one room, where the worst cases are—these are the dying and the dead. The sick are all soldiers, most of them Turks; some of them Greeks.

THE MANNERS OF THE TURK.

Even in their agony the Turks never lose one particle of their dignity, and never for one moment forget their perfect manners. They die as they lived, like nature's noblemen they are, always acknowledging every assistance and, when they refuse a gift, putting into the refusal the graciousness of an acceptance.

Nobody who has never been to Turkey can have any idea of the politeness, the innate politesse du cœur, of the Turk. Only this afternoon I was coming back from San Stefano on board a Turkish Government launch and, together with an English officer, I was talking to the Turkish naval officer, who was in command of the launch. The Englishman offered a cigarette to the Turkish officer. He accepted it, and lit it. The Englishman then offered one to the officer's younger brother, who was there also. "He does not smoke," said the officer, "and I do not either." "He has lit and smoked the cigarette so as not to offend me," said the Englishman to me.

Equally polite are the soldiers dying in great pain of a horrible disease amidst awful conditions. They never forget their manners or their dignity. They are childlike and infinitely pathetic in their wants. One man in a tent, where some of the convalescent were assembled, cried out in Turkish his need, which was interpreted (to a third person) by a Greek. He wanted a candle, by which a man might tell stories to the others. There was no candle in the place. But I am not ashamed to say that a small lamp was stolen and given to the man to afford illumination to that story-telling. Another man wanted a lemon. There were then no lemons; the man produced a five-piastre piece (a franc, nearly a shilling) and offered it to one of the assistants if he would get him a lemon.

The Turkish medical authorities have taken steps in the matter of this little hospital. Although it is impossible to persuade any of the owners of the deserted homes at San Stefano to let them be used as hospitals, a home has been found for the medical staff of the English contingent of the Red Crescent, which has opportunely arrived here, and which has already done excellent work, on condition that no patients, not even the owner's own father, be introduced into it.

Also wooden barracks are now being built for the Egyptian contingent of the Red Crescent. The ruling spirit of the Greek school of San Stefano is a lady, who would much dislike her name to be even mentioned. But it has been mentioned, and it may perhaps be permitted to an eye-witness of her untiring and pious work, and of her angelic goodness, to say that Miss Alt came to San Stefano like an angel to hell, and she could have said, like Beatrice,

"In con fatto da Dio, sua mercè, tale,
Che la vostra miseria non mi tange,
Nè fiamme d'esto incendio non m'assale."

The Occupation of Salonica.

(PRESS ASSOCIATION WAR SPECIAL.)

In view of the report by the Bulgarian General Theodoreff on the capitulation of Salonica, the report of General Daghia.

the chief of the Greek General Staff, sent to the Minister of War here on November 11 has been published. From this it appears that after its defeat on October 19 and 20 at Yenidjeh the Turkish army was incapable of offering serious resistance, and when the Greek army appeared before Salonica on the 25th the military governor of the town offered its surrender and that of the army conditionally. As the conditions were not acceptable to the Greek Crown Prince preparations were made for a general attack on the morning of the 26th. Thereupon Tahn Pasha accepted the Greek conditions before the battle began. Shortly afterwards information was brought to the Crown Prince that Bulgarian cavalry had made their appearance 39 kilometres from Salonica, and that a Bulgarian division was 15 miles behind. The same night a protocol for the surrender of the Turkish army was signed, and part of the Greek troops occupied the railway station. The Crown Prince also warned the Bulgarian commander by letter that it was useless for him to advance on Salonica, the army there having capitulated.

On the morning of the 27th, while the disarmament was in progress, the Bulgarian army was advancing, and eventually, as it was evident that they were forming for battle, General Theodoroff was warned in writing to halt, as the Turkish army had surrendered. In spite of that the Bulgarian troops fired five or six shots at the Turkish troops who were disarming, and it was not until another communication had been sent that the Bulgarian army halted at Aivali.

The disarmament was completed and Salonica occupied by the Greeks. The Bulgarians continued their advance, and on the 28th General Theodoroff sought an audience of the Crown Prince. The audience was granted, and on a formal declaration being given recognising the occupation of the town by the Greeks, that there was no question of a joint occupation, and that hospitality was asked for two battalions which had suffered severely from bad weather, the Crown Prince assented to the request on condition that he referred it to the Greek Government. M. Stantsieff, who accompanied General Theodoroff as interpreter, begged the Prince, if the Greek Government did not agree to the two Bulgarian battalions staying in the town, to communicate this to the Bulgarian General, giving ten hours for a reply. Simultaneously General Theodoroff informed the Crown Prince, through M. Stantsieff, that the two battalions during their stay in Salonica would be under the orders of the Greek commander of the Salonica garrison, and would send an officer to receive his orders.

Insecurity at Salonica.

The Rome correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung transmits a message from the director of a Salonica bank which has been received in the Italian capital. The message states:—"Salonica is at present in more serious danger than before the entry of the Greeks. Not only do the latter indulge, under the very eyes of the officers, in the grossest acts of violence and immorality, but their presence encourages the local Greek residents to commit all sorts of outrages—chiefly against their Jewish business rivals. Already more than a dozen well-known Jewish business men have been killed. The banks are greatly perturbed. The rivalry between the Greeks and Bulgarians threatens to degenerate at any moment into a street battle. Sanguinary conflicts have already occurred in the suburbs, and the other day there was one in one of the chief cafés. The insecurity is so great that the European residents are about to attempt to organise joint measures of defence, while the Jewish population is keeping as much as possible indoors."

Kiamil Pasha's Sneeer.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung reports a rather unkind remark of Kiamil Pasha about the quarrels between the Greeks and the Bulgarians. "The aged statesman observed that the Turks would have to play the same part towards the Balkan States as they did with regard to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem. Had not Turkey stood with fixed bayonet over the holy tomb the various Christian faiths would have massacred each other long ago. In the Balkans, too, the Ottomans would have in the future to fulfil a similar mission."

Disorders.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, Nov. 14.

To-day, as King George's charger pranced over the badly-laid granite pavings of Salonica's streets, another chapter was opened in the history of the Macedonian capital. It was an event of vast political, historical, and sentimental importance. But few of the onlookers remembered they were celebrating a victory over the Turks. The thoughts uppermost in their minds were that, once again, the Greeks were masters of Salonica, that a long exile was ended, and that a dream had been realized. The imagination of the King, too, must have been fired as he entered, conqueror, into this town, where ancient walls and churches tell of Byzantines, triumphal arches stir up memories of the Roma conquest, and the white circular tower on the sea front speaks of the Venetians.

The roads out to the marshes which lie to the west of the town were alive with Greek enthusiasts on their way to greet the victors. Here as I gazed upon the camp of the 7th Division under General Kleomous (the men who have borne the brunt of the fighting) and saw their trim Creusot artillery lined up along a road flanked on either side with V-shaped khaki tents almost undistinguishable among the rushes, the Greek Army made a good first impression. The men were in excellent condition, well clothed, booted, fed, and equipped, and ate ravenously of the raw cabbages they had plucked from the vegetable gardens which dot this district of the town. Amidst the everlasting brown of the khaki clothes and the Schneider guns of the army, the sun-baked grass of the fields, and the muddy tracks which serve for road, the landscape was gladdened only by the thousands of red fez which denoted the Ottoman nationality of the majority of the visitors. A comparison of this picture with that of the weary, demoralized, and undisciplined Turkish troops, tentless and starving within sight of Salonica, went far to explain why the Greeks have been able to reach their goal in a hop, skip, and a jump.

It was well into the afternoon ere a detachment of cavalry led the Evzones through the streets and gave the Greek population of the Macedonian capital their opportunity to "demonstrate." The Star and Crescent had disappeared as if by magic, and in its place flew the blue and white flag of Greece, and fair damsels showered roses upon the warriors until they marched over a flower-carpeted street. It was as though a victorious Hellenic army was returning to its native Athens from a successful campaign abroad. It seemed incomprehensible that a Turkish defeat could thus be celebrated in a Turkish town. In effect it was more than the celebration of martial victory: it was the deliverance of the Greek population from the bondage of Turkish rule.

TWO ROYAL PROCESSIONS.

The King's entry to-day with the Royal Princes and Princess Alice (who has worked heroically with the Greek Red Cross throughout the campaign) was comparatively tame. The drenching rain was sufficient to damp the most ardent patriotism. Apart from this, the show was badly stage-managed. There was an entire absence of martial display, and it seemed to me that a great opportunity of impressing the Oriental mind was thrown away. Albeit the King and his sons were affectionately welcomed. Even the Bulgarians, who after days of forced march and a night previously spent with mud for a bed and rain for a cover, owing to their having been kept outside the town for 24 hours by the Greeks, managed things better. At least they had a band, dirty and weatherworn it is true, and a torn banner to add a touch of military colour to the proceedings, and as the young Princes Boris and Cyril followed a detachment of business like cavalry and led in three regiments of mud-died soldiers we felt that victorious troops had really arrived. On the day's showing the Bulgars had the best of it. The demonstration would have been more effective, and the cause of the allies would have been better served, had some attempt been made more definitely to combine the two processions. As it was, this very day was sown the seed of discord between the Greeks and Bulgarians.

THE DISARMAMENT OF THE TURKS.

It is regrettable that one cannot so highly compliment the Greek upon their occupation as upon their conquest of Salonica. Admittedly the Hellenes were set a difficult task, but they might have accomplished it more creditably. While the Turkish flag still floated over the Konak the inhabitants of Salonica, Christian and Moslem, enjoyed perfect security. I have been unable to trace a single instance of any attempt on life or property. Now, unfortunately, all this has changed, so changed that a complete record of all the cases of wounding, pillage, and looting of the last few days would fill pages of the Times. The Greeks probably committed an initial error in agreeing to the Turkish stipulation that Hassan Tahn's army should be disarmed by its own officers. Intentional oversights were bound to occur, and though I have been unable to obtain direct proofs, I am quite prepared to accept the assertion that Turks, presumably disarmed, were afterwards found to be in possession of implements of warfare. This was made the excuse for searching all Moslems entering the town, and the signal was thus given for the exhibition of a considerable excess of zeal on the part of the Greek soldiery.

I do not propose to enter into the rights or wrongs of the case or to judge the conquering army for the manner in which this second disarmament has been carried out. I merely wish to record some of the scenes I have myself witnessed in various quarters of the town where the searching of Turks has taken place. The examination was thorough and not confined to Turkish soldiers. Turks generally, and numerous Ottoman Jews were subjected to the same process. They were rigorously searched from head to foot and their baggage was minutely examined not once, but, in many cases, half a dozen times.

Nor were arms the only object of the search, for I have seen numbers of Moslems robbed of their watches, purses, and similar objects of value. Any attempt at resistance was met by personal violence. I saw one bald-headed "Mustafiz" cuffed and kicked, his fez torn from his head and trampled in the mud, because he protested against the determination of a Greek soldier to relieve him of a pocket knife worth at most a few piastres. On another occasion three Greek soldiers and a civilian were violently attempting to rob a Turkish soldier of his ass when a Bulgarian officer rode up and wielded his riding whip in such effective fashion that he sent the Greeks whining away and took the Turk on with him to a safer sphere. Every fez-capped passerby of obviously lowly birth was similarly arrested, and the civilian Greek could always count upon armed assistance in the case of difficulty with his victim. Greek officers were eye-witnesses of these incidents and raised not a hand to curb the zeal of their men. On three occasions only did I see Bulgarian soldiers molest a Turk, and it may have been and doubtless was a coincidence, but in every case a passing Bulgarian officer sent the would-be thief sprawling in the mud with a well-directed blow for his pains.

ROBBERY AND OPPRESSION.

It is a disagreeable duty to have to record such actions on the part of an army which has fought valiantly and well, and in the ranks of which I counted many close friends, and I may, therefore, in passing to other matters, be allowed to state that I have mentioned only instances which have come beneath my personal notice and that I have, if anything, distinctly understated the importance of the outrage which have been perpetrated under the cloak of disarmament. Robbing the beaten Turk of the few piastres on which he must exist till the war is ended and he is translated to his Anatolian home, outraging the religious susceptibilities of a defenceless Muhammadan by chalking a cross upon his fez are not acts which one expects from Christian conquerors. At nightfall the soldiers of the two armies have given themselves up to wholesale looting. There are hundreds of well-authenticated instances. Houses have been looted and shops ransacked, and the privacy of the home has gone absolutely unrespected. One rich Donmeh Turk, from whom £2,000 was demanded at the point of the bayonet by Greek soldiers, handed over his wife's jewelry, in lieu of cash, and amongst others the house of the British Consular Cavanis was sacked and objects to the value of £110 stolen. The customary procedure has been for suitable houses to be indicated to bands of soldiers or irregulars by the lower-class Greek of the town who subsequently shared in the plunder.

The principal sufferers have been the Jews. Inaugurated by the local Greek Press a crusade of anti-semitism has spread over the armies, with the result that the unfortunate Israelites have been pillaged and mercilessly ill-treated.

These facts are in the highest degree regrettable. The Bulgarians, perhaps not without reason, throw the whole responsibility upon the Greeks on the logical grounds that the Hellenic Army, being the army of occupation, is responsible for the safety of public life and property. Whatever excuses may be put forward on one side or another, the fact remains that the existing condition of the town is intolerable and that more serious developments may be awaited unless disorder is suppressed with a much firmer hand than has been shown up to the present.

Greek Administration.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, Nov. 30.

It is now three weeks since the Greek Army, after practically a promenade from the frontier, made hurried terms with the Turkish troops before this town and hastened in to force all the Bulgars, who had fought their way down, so making things easy for the Greeks. Already we have had for over a fortnight a Greek Minister of Justice, who is also "representative of the Hellenic Government in Macedonia"; a mayor, a chief of the postal and telegraph administration; a learned professor at the head of a new sanitary service, and divers other officials, of course all Greek: while to assist in maintaining order and tranquillity some 600 trained Cretan gendarmes have been imported. All this has a very cheering sound about it, and when our Minister of Justice assures us that he has come here "to put an end to the tyranny and disorder that reigned in the country, to assure absolute liberty to all the elements of the population without distinction of religion, to treat all nationalities with equality and justice, to respect the rights of individuals, and to work for the welfare of all the inhabitants of the country, such being the general principles dominating and guiding the administration in Greece," one at once grasps the fact that the millennium is about to dawn.

It is an old saying, however, "the darkest hour is that before the dawn," and our present experience is amply proving the truth of it; for never has your correspondent witnessed such complete anarchy, confusion, and disorder in any town in which he has ever dwelt; he has lived long in Turkey, but never in Greece. His Excellency tells us that to assure public order he has brought these 600 gendarmes—and there are more to come—who, helped by soldiers, are patrolling the town and maintaining order. But where is the order? There have been more street robberies, housebreaking, harassing of Jews and Turks, molestation, and other abominations during the last three weeks than were ever known before. In fact, for women it is now impossible, and even for men risky, to be out in the streets after sunset. The tram service is completely disorganised, and on the upper line to the railway stations it has had to be entirely suppressed because the Greek soldiers crowd into the cars, often refusing to pay the fare, disregard all rules, and otherwise abuse their position, their officers, even when on the same tram, taking no notice, and letting them do just as they please. The idea of military discipline seems quite unknown, at least so far as any consideration for the general public is concerned. But, in all fairness it must be said, the Bulgarian soldier seems much more under control than the Greek.

His Excellency likewise tells us what he is going to do to safeguard the public health. Meanwhile our streets are one mass of mud and filth; for we have lately had much rain, and they have not been cleared or swept during the three weeks of the occupation. The whole length of the quay and on to the railway stations is a slough of despond; while beyond the Custom House, in the same direction, the carcasses of dead and rotting horses and other animals are poisoning the air of the whole neighbourhood. No! the millennium has certainly not yet dawned for us. And judging from what is seen, one is disposed to wonder whether after all, and making due allowance for the difficulty of the situation, the Greeks are really equal to the task of ruling such a mixed population as that existing here and in this region. The only contented fraction, so far, is the lower Greek element, which just now does much as it likes, while villagers coming in with their produce and paying no dues, in consequence of the Turkish collectors having been terrorised and driven from their posts, are also naturally happy for the time being. That anybody else enjoys the change is exceedingly doubtful.

The deporting of prisoners of war, military and official, and of refugees is steadily proceeding; while this week a great number of officers, officials, hojas, etc., were suddenly shipped off on the plea that they were implicated in some plot. The refugee problem is a very hard one to solve. Rumour says the Bulgarians are wiping out the whole Muhammadan population of Macedonia—men, women, and children being massacred without mercy; so these refugees cannot be sent back to their ruined villages; but what, then, is to be done with them? We can only trust these rumours, like so many more, are false. In fact, we cannot bring ourselves to really believe them; for such vengeance would be an everlasting blot on the escutcheon of Christendom—even when one remembers all the unspeakable barbarities allowed under the Turkish Government of recent years and for centuries.

The Provisional Government of Albania.

Rome, Dec. 8.

A SEMI-OFFICIAL telegram received here last night from Avlona states that the Albanian Provisional Government has been constituted as follows:—

Ismail Kemal Bey.—President and Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Mgr. Baccioni.—Vice-President without portfolio.

Mohmed Pasha Berealla.—Minister for War.

Mufid Bey Libohova.—Minister of the Interior.

Abdi Bey Toptan.—Minister of Finance.

M. Pietro Poga.—Minister of Justice.

M. Guraucchi.—Minister of Public Instruction.

Midhat Bey Frasheri.—Minister of Public Work.

M. Lefnoei.—Minister of Posts and Telegraphs.

Pandelita Ali.—Minister of Agriculture and Commerce.

A Senate, which is to consist for the present of 18 members, has been established under the presidency of Zeynel Bey of Ipek. Issa Boletinat and Riza Bey of Djakov have been appointed commandants of the National Militia. All the foregoing appointments were made by the General Assembly. (Herald.)

The Albanian Tribesmen.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Foderissa, Nov. 24th.

THE flood-tide of war has swept over Turkey in Europe more rapidly than even the most sanguine believers in "the Balkans for the Balkan people" anticipated. As it subsides, leaving desolation and chaos behind it, a mass of questions must needs arise; and of these the most pressing, and in many ways the most interesting, is the Albanian question. Of all the Balkan peoples, the Albanians alone have now presented no solid front and struck no united blow for freedom. In a former article it was suggested that in the event of war the Moslem Albanians would side with the Turks, not because they desired a continuance of Turkish rule, but because they believed that, together with the Turks, they would be able to conquer any foreign invader and also evict the Greeks and Slavs from "Greater Albania." The victory, however, would, they believed, cost the Turks so dear that the Albanians would be able to demand and obtain terms that would be equivalent to autonomy. The Christian mountain tribesmen of the North, on the contrary, were determined to get rid of the Turk at any price, and, with the exception of Mirdita and the tribes allied to it, were likely to throw in their lot with Montenegro. This prophecy has been accurately fulfilled. The five large tribes of Malissora, by rising before the proclamation of war by Montenegro, attacking and evicting the smaller military outposts from their territory, and repelling the reinforcements which endeavoured to come from Scutari, opened up the way for Montenegro and greatly facilitated the capture of Detitch, Tuzi, and the other frontier fortresses.

In acting thus with Montenegro the tribesmen aimed primarily at freeing their own territories from Turks at any price, and not merely from Turks, but from all Moslems who were pro-Turk. Such Moslems as formed part of the tribes in question—there are many, for example, in Kastrioti—have remained neutral with very few exceptions. But all other Moslem villages were attacked and destroyed with fire, for their inhabitants had last year acted as Bashi-Bosozuks against the tribesmen when in revolt. Thus the path of Montenegro was opened to within about an hour and a half's march of Scutari.

Difficulties, however, speedily arose. The tribesmen considered that, instead of being treated as allies they were being treated as conquered. The Montenegrins already, it is complained, regard the territory they have entered as exclusively Montenegrin. Much friction and misery have since the beginning of November, the tribesmen returned to their mountains, the Montenegrins having decided that they could take Scutari unaided. The Dukagui and Mirdita tribes have meanwhile remained quite neutral awaiting the fortunes of war. They would not aid the Turks, and they appear not to have decided not to aid the Montenegrins. In fact, the bulk of the Albanians of the North are anxious that in some way or other their national rights should be safeguarded.

The neutrality of Mirdita may possibly be due to the fact that its chief Prekë Bib Doda was well received in Vienna just before the outbreak of war.

A brief sketch of the events that have led to the present complications may be of interest. Ever since the Turkish revolution of 1908 the Turks have made successive violent attempts to "Ottomanize" Albania. This produced various revolts. Had it not been for the lamentable fact that Albania is divided by three religions it is probable that by now a form of autonomy would have been extorted from the Turkish Government. The rising last year of the five large tribes of Malissora and, together with the two Dukagui tribes Shala and Stroshe, was the most important. It was, indeed, the beginning of the present war, for the help then promised, and in part given, by Montenegro to the insurgents brought their friendship. It was hoped by the insurgents and by their friends that the revolutionary movement would spread throughout Albania and that European intervention and a recognition of Albania would result. The Moslems of Kosovo and the Albanians of the South had both promised help. Throughout the broiling summer news came daily, "The Moslems begin tomorrow," "The South rises next week." But no help came. The lamentable truth was that neither Moslem nor Orthodox wished the glory of a successful revolution to fall to the Catholics.

Ismail Kemal, a leader of the South, appeared in Montenegro. He was quite unknown to the Northern tribesmen, but his advent brought hope that the South was about to rise. Ismail Kemal, however, did not contribute even a piastre to the cause. As a Moslem he had no desire for an Albania in which the Catholics should play a prominent part. And he is reported to have restrained the South. Another prominent leader, also a Moslem, who urged that such an opportunity of presenting a solid Albanian front must not be missed, replied:—"Let the Catholics have a thrashing. It will do them good." The insurgents were thrown back to Turkish rule without any guarantee of protection and the Turks continued their policy of "Ottomanization."

Further insurrection was discussed all the winter and a united rising of Moslems and Catholics planned. The Kosovo rebellions began, and, as they marched upon Uskub, the Catholics were to attack in the direction of Scutari. The Catholics duly started and successfully attacked and captured the smaller military outposts in their tribal lands. Then suddenly and without consulting the Catholics at all, the Moslems, having forced the dissolution of the Turkish Parliament, made peace. The Catholics were bitterly disappointed. They wanted no more Turkish promises, so they sought other help. A delegate from Malissora hadhe attended the Eucharistic Congress at Vienna and there presented an ultimatum to Austria. "You are the protector of the Catholics of Albania. You have again and again promised us help. The present state of things is intolerable. Do you mean to help us—Yes or No?" "Wait," said Austria, "do nothing yet." "We have waited too long already," was the reply; "this is our last appeal. We shall turn to Montenegro." He left, and the chief of the five tribes called on King Nikola for help.

The Outlook in the Near East.

For El Islam.

THE problems offered for solution by the population of the Turkish Empire are too various and intricate to be disposed of in a book, much less an article. The most that one can do is to lay stress on factors of importance and warn the student against certain pitfalls. Some leading factors in the present situation, as well as its most crying danger, seem to be ignored.

What is the cause of the Muhammadan fanaticism, expressed in brutal massacres of subject Christians, which was unknown before the nineteenth century? The Muhammadans of old were not inhuman. Compare their conquest of Jerusalem, for instance, when the Holy Sepulchre and all the churches were respected, with that of the Crusading armies with its awful massacre; their treatment of the subject Christians with that endured by heretics and Jews in Europe, and it will be evident that the religion of the sword in those days was more tolerant than that of peace and love. In the Bulak edition of the Arabian Nights, in the fourth volume, there is a story different from every other in the book, having in every word the air of truth. It is of a merchant who repaired to Acre at a time of truce, and while there became enamoured of a Frankish woman, the young wife of a Crusader. In the Crusading era he was excused from wronging her by thoughts of God. Afterwards he came across her as a captive, and, as she was then lawful to him, married her. The story, told with absolute simplicity, with no aspersions on the faith or customs of the Crusaders, is an odd contrast to the Frankish stories full of 'the foul Paynim,' 'the false perjurious Mahound,' etc. Yet that the Crusaders recognised the honour of the Moslems, esteeming them above the Eastern Christians, can be shown from history, as also that the Eastern Christians loved them better than the Frank.

'Secure under the Mahomdike sceptre,' says Gibbon, writing of the schism of the Eastern Church: 'the three Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem' (the Patriarch of Constantinople, not yet fallen, was intimidated by the forces of the West), '... condemned the creed and council of the Latins.' Far from crushing out the Oriental churches, Moslem rule preserved them. By the Europe of the Middle Ages they would have been persecuted to extinction for their slight divergence.

When Constantinople fell at length, the conqueror divided the city and its churches equally between the two religions, and though the edict was rescinded half a century later, the principle of toleration still endured. Through Turkey in the eighteenth century, like Lady Mary Montagu, sprang the moderation of the Turk as something unexpected, a most strange discovery. Every male Christian paid a tax (the mellet tribute) annually for his life, which was technically forfeit to El Islam. In return he was exempt from service in the wars which swept off thousands of the Moslem population. The penal laws against him much resembled those which formerly prevailed in England against Roman Catholics, with the exception that his faith was not proscribed. Those laws were often unenforced for years together. They are now abolished. All recent changes have been favourable to the 'Nazarenes.' Never, so far as I know, in history of El Islam have subject Christians suffered persecution for their faith. What, then, is the cause of those 'atrocities' which have shocked the world from time to time in the last century?

I believe the answer to be foreign interference, of a particularly intimate and galling nature.

Of old, poor Christians and poor Moslems lived on equal terms, chaffing each other freely on the subject of religion, as many genial folk-tales live to witness. They do so still where equal poverty combines them. But, thanks to interference by the European Powers, protecting each her special brand of native Christian; thanks to missionary efforts directed mainly to the Christian population; thanks last, but principally, to the capitulations of the Berlin Treaty by which each subject of the fourteen States enumerated resident in Turkey acquires extraterritorial standing (i.e., is placed out of reach of the law of the country) together with his servants and dependents, generally native Christians; the Christian population has been set above the Moslem in a way which savours strongly of injustice. The Christian has been schooled for nothing by the missionaries, who put him in the way of earning a good living. Boasting the protection of some foreign consul, he is perforce an object of attention to the Turkish Government. In time past, when supervision was less keen than it is now, many Christians even changed their nationality. Without departing from the country, or with least intention or desire ever to do so, they obtained papers of naturalisation from a foreign consul simply and solely to secure a 'pull' in Turkey, and not through any love of the adopted nation. I am acquainted with a man, a Christian native of the Lebanon, whose father, being dragoman to the Italian Consulate, obtained papers of naturalisation in this way. The father laid by money and bought property. The son renounced the tax and took to huts, and thought himself superior to all Ottoman subjects. Despite his Arab name, he was Italian to all inquirers, until this year, when word went forth that all Italians were to leave the Empire. Then he changed his tone: 'I am the son of an Arab, like the rest of you,' he cried in anguish. His swagger of the foreign subject vanished. He begged them, for love of God, to let him stay. But the evidence was clear against him; his fellow-Christians with the Moslems drove him out. In his place of exile his one thought was to return; his mind was tortured with a anxiety for his possessions. He bribed some smugglers to convey him in with anxiety for his other illicit goods. But in a street of Beyrout, when he believed all danger past, the cry 'Italiani' was raised suddenly, a mob collected, our friend was badly beaten by the common people rescued by the authorities, and once more banished. That shows the utterly factitious character of such 'naturalisation'.

The great majority of Christians in the Turkish Empire have no wish to dwell elsewhere. Except the people of the Lebanon, who, in return for their autonomy, were years ago walled in with a prohibitive tariff, preventing too much profit from their labours, they would seldom emigrate; and the tendency of emigrants is to return. Nowhere else could they enjoy the same immunity in the pursuit of rather dark commercial ends; nowhere else could they extend such interest for money lent, or live on a luxurious scale so cheaply. They have no corporate sentiment approaching nationality, nor any solid bond of union in religion, divided, sub-divided, as they are, into conflicting sects. These words do not apply to Servia and Bulgaria—till lately Turkish provinces—where a sense of nationality survived and the bulk of the population was of one opinion, but they do apply to Thrace and Macedonia, almost as much as to the Asiatic provinces I have in mind.

The scale of education, as of comfort, wealth and luxury, is generally higher among Christians than among Muhammadans, and this owing entirely to foreign interference (including missionary effort, rendered arrogant by the capitulations) in the former's favour. The Christians almost everywhere seem pampered; the Muhammadans neglected and downtrodden. And the Christians are not herded to the army, like the Moslems.

'We saved their lives, we kept them like expensive pets for centuries,' I have heard a Moslem cry with indignation, and now you say we are their persecutors! If we had killed them all at the beginning, as you, of Western Europe, would have done in those days, you would not now be troubling; but our Faith forbade it.'

'Expensive' they have truly been to Turkey; though as to 'pets' there may be two opinions. My friend meant that the Moslems had done all the fighting, and the government, police, and so on, while the Christians stayed at home, increased, multiplied, and made money. On the other hand, many of the Christians have been, and are still, good subjects, of high service to the State. A list of native Christian patriots—not to speak of physicians, clerks, philosophers, and men of letters—would include few names that are not quite illustrious, honoured by Moslems and by Christians equally. The Christians have always had a hand in the administration of finance in Turkey; her foreign commerce has been theirs entirely. A humored instances of kindness and toleration could be found for every instance of oppression, under normal circumstances.

It is only where the foreign consuls', or 'protectors', hand is seen, raising a man above the common lot of Turkish subjects, that any bitterness is found between adherents of the two religions. The Christians boast of favours, put on airs. Then all at once there may arise a sudden madness, and the innocent—poor, wretched, and half-starving villagers—may suffer for the guilty, being, to the mind of madness, the same species. The burden of bad government falls heaviest to-day upon the poor Muhammadan, who, seeing Christians, once his equals, basking at their ease, feels sore with injury. He, the conqueror of old, has still his pride, but nothing else to lean on for support or comfort. No foreign Power is heedful of his lot. His government, to which he looks with blind devotion, is always harassed by the Franks or Muscovites and cannot help him.

In 1860 at Damascus there was this sore feeling. Some lowclass Moslems did a foolish, rather childish thing. They made some crosses out of bits of wood, attached them to the tails of the street dogs, and sent these running through the Christian quarter. The Russian consul took the matter up. The culprits were apprehended. At the consul's bidding the Turkish Governor gave orders that for punishment the prisoners were to sweep the streets of the Christian ward in chains. The sight of Moslems thus degraded, with native Christians looking on complacently, produced a transitory insurrection of such fury that the authorities were powerless to check the slaughter. Thousands of Christians perished, hundreds fled. The Russian consul's house was the first burnt.

That is an instance typical, I think, of many others. Russia in her dealings with the subjects of the Porte has seldom been considerate of Moslem feeling, or squeamish of the means used to obtain her ends. Many thousands of lives have been sacrificed to her ambitions.

Then usury has caused much trouble; for usury, beloved of Eastern Christian, is to the unenlightened Moslem an abominable crime. Where land is the security, the trouble is embittered; for land in Turkey is a sacred thing, 'the house of El Islâm,' and a Christian could not until three years since acquire it legally in his own name. Usury has been the cause of horrid murders, particularly where the moneylender is Armenian and his customers are Kurds, his ancient enemies. And here again the innocent many—wretched peasants—have suffered for the guilty few—the cunning townsmen. The slaughter of women and children, so horrible to us, seems merely logical to peoples among whom the custom of blood-vengeance still obtains; and Christians also practise it in warfare.

As far as I can gather, in two cases only can massacres be fairly laid to the charge of the Turkish Government, and both cases happened under Abdul Hamid II, a Sultan whom the Turks themselves deposed with ignominy. Moslems of the better sort are not bloodthirsty. They hate such crimes as much as we do. They have long been worried over the condition of their country, seeking some road to quiet out of all her troubles. The very massacres themselves are proof that even ignorant Moslems were unhappy in the state of things. The Powers of Europe, they were constantly assured, desired nothing else than the good government of Turkey for benefit of Muhammadan and Christian, both alike. That was the cause, the one and only cause of all their interference. This seemed strange, since, by their inference on behalf of Christian sects, by their 'Capitulations' placing many thousands of inhabitants of Turkey outside the country's law—a privilege which has been shamefully abused by certain lesser Powers which once were Turkish provinces—they have made reform a superhuman task. Yet many Moslems half believed these Christian declarations. That was one reason why the Young Turk Proclamation of equal rights for all was everywhere received with such enthusiasm. Moslems hoped that the way out of the difficulty had been found at last; while native Christians hardly dared to trust the evidence of their own senses. The news was too miraculously good to be at first believable.

Then came the disillusion. At once upon the tidings of new life in Turkey, Bulgaria threw off the suzerainty—very dear to Moslem pride—and Austria gobbled Bosnia and Herzegovina. The other Powers which signed the Berlin Treaty made but feeble protest. The Christian States had never been in earnest when they said their one idea in interference was Turkey's renovation and reform. The last thing they desired was her revival. At the first sign of a new and healthy life in her they fell to snatching what they could for fear lest in a short while she should hold her own. Supine and sick, they might have let her be. Alert once more and eager for her strength she got no mercy from them.

In the European and the Asiatic provinces, in Arabia, Egypt, and throughout North Africa, in Afghanistan and India, a wave of Moslem indignation rose, and still is rising, against what was regarded as the grim fanaticism of the Christian Powers. Tripoli did not allay this feeling. The present onslaught upon Turkey by her former subjects—the final tearing up of the Berlin Treaty in so far as Europe is concerned, though Turkey is still called on to observe it for her part—has brought it up to fever heat. To those who know—as Moslems know, exclusively—the part played by Bulgaria in working up the Macedonia appears the most ironical of pretexts, too shallow to deceive a child in politics. The aim of the Allies, they say, is nothing nobler than a wholesale slaughter of Muhammadans, unworthy the connivance of the Western Power.

Bulgaria's rejection of the suzerainty discredited the Young Turks at the outset with the rank of Moslems, who look upon the loss of territory as an insult to the Faith. The Young Turks, thus belittled, proved feeble and were soon divided. They felt their impotence to cope with the old Moslem feeling. They made the grave mistake at first of relaxing all the reins of government instead of tightening them. And along with protestations of sincere goodwill they got their death blow from the Powers of Europe, their protectors. They fell, and a strong Government (including Christians), representing all shades of opinion, took up their anxious burden of reform. Again Bulgaria was foremost in the field against it. Again the Powers of Europe shrugged their shoulders, pleading impotence.

Is it wonderful that every Moslem in the world should now be saying that we are the real enemies to Turkey's progress, our last desire to see her Christian peoples dwell contented; our real intention to degrade and maim her? Our Moslem fellow-subjects have their newspapers which publish gleanings from the English Press, a large section of which is occupied to-day in vilifying with amazing ignorance a Moslem Power, the only one left standing, which is the subject of their love and fervent sympathy.

Truly the simple fact, well ascertained, of the existence of a multitude of native Christians loyal to the Porte might give our latter-day Crusaders pause, since it deflates their diatribes. The Christian churches of the East are many; Turkey has let them all survive together. Would any Christian Power have done as much? They value foreign interference only as it raises one above another. Collectively they stand to lose by any change. Under any other rule they would ere long grow discontented, and sentimentalise about 'old times,' as do the Copts in Egypt. The majority now know enough of the conditions which prevail in other countries to recognise that even a chaotic, medieval Turkey, prolific of disorders and unsafe for travel, is better as a place of residence and less oppressive of the individual than, for example, Russia.

As for Turkish government, 'rough in the hand but gentle in the head,' I believe that most of them regard it in the abstract with some slight affection. The Orthodox Greek Church of Turkey long ago declined to be the cat's paw of an anti-Moslem Power. Her punishment was the Bulgarian exarch. The Armenian Church has suffered more than any other from the Muhammadan mob, and she preserves the spirit of a nationality, yet it is truly to be doubted if a majority among her members would be found to vote for any foreign rule but the Turk. The lesser, weaker Churches are protected under Moslem rule from the aggressions of the greater. All have equal standing. As in the hotbed of religious strife, Jerusalem, the Moslem keeps the Christians from each other's throats.

If Christians thus support the Sultan, what of the Muhammadans? Their loyalty is a religious sentiment extending far beyond the Turkish Empire into ours. The world of El Islam is still, what Christendom has ceased to be, one mind, one body for religion. The genuine Turks—a small, superior race, enjoying the prestige of aristocracy—alone of all Muhammadans have stepped out from the Middle Ages into modern life. Others have seemed to do so at the behest of Christian tutors and through imitation, but they are subject to relapses one has seen in Egypt. The Turks have made the journey by themselves. They promise to evolve a civilization as 'modern' as our own and owing much to ours, yet independent and perhaps superior, as building less upon mechanical contrivance, more on culture of its citizens. They are Haush, members of the only Shiite sect of El Islam which values reason as a guide above tradition. They, therefore, in their faith itself can welcome progress which Mahomeds and Shohas would deem ungodly. And their influence upon their co-religionists is almost boundless. It was they who overthrew the recent tyranny whose ministers were chiefly Arabs of the baser sort. It is they—though not the Young Turk, hardrained section—who rule to-day the councils of the Empire. To show the influence they can exert on populations commonly esteemed fanatical, and also the sincerity, of even ignorant Moslems in the desire for a new era, when in the spring of 1909, the late Sultan was employed upon his counter-revolution, secret emissaries were despatched in all directions to stir insurrections (which means massacre) with the notion of discrediting the new régime. Only in one district round Mezen and Adana did massacres take place. Elsewhere quite common Moslems of the class that generally loves a riot—at Beyrout it was some hachmen—caught the envoys soon after their landing and led them to the Government for deportation. At Adana Turks worked among the reghous.

Upon the Turks, with their prestige as fellow-tribesmen and companions of the Caliph, as liberators of the realm, rests all the hope of the Islamic world. The indignation felt by Moslems everywhere at their unjust treatment by the Powers of Europe is immeasurable, and may at any moment become dangerous. The Turks are conscious of this peril at their backs, and are doing all they can to ward it off. In the capital they were in a position to maintain good order without the presence of the foreign warships in the Bosphorus. And in the provinces there cannot fail to be some ugly outbreaks when the tidings of defeat are known, as must soon happen, in spite of false news circulated with the best intentions. These disorders the presence of the foreign warships in the Bosphorus will exacerbate, since all the Powers concerned are viewed as enemies to El Islam. And who can say how far the flames may spread?

It seems to me a great misfortune for the British Empire that a Moslem Power, the Caliphate, should be put down for the mere wish to practise what we have for years been preaching—a nationality that shall be independent of religious differences. For it comes to this

In the four years since religious toleration was proclaimed in Turkey, Turkey has had a number of assaults, no defender. "The backward Moslem races will regard these national disasters as a 'judgment' upon Turkish innovations; and that must do incalculable harm."

The most disheartening fact revealed by the collapse of the so-called Concert of Great Powers is that England with her millions of Muhammadans has no settled Moslem policy. Is it too much to expect that harassed statesmen should have some faint conception of Pan-Islamism in its higher meaning? Perhaps it is. But mere humanity demands consideration of the problem offered by the poor Muhammadan. The Allies may say, at the conclusion of the war, that the said problem is no longer of importance in the European provinces, few of the Muhammadan inhabitants remaining. The trouble will be thus transferred to Asia, and rendered more acute by more congestion if the aggressive policy of Europe is maintained. Who can say, after this exhibition of their impotence, that the Great Powers can guarantee the integrity of Turkey in Asia? The raids of any trifling pretext are as likely to continue till not a scrap of independent Moslem territory is left. Conquest is no true solution of the difficulty; it only bottles up a spirit which must have an outlet, and prevents the Moslem population from its own development. The principles formulated at the revolution, and since adopted by the Turkish nation as a whole, were as hopeful for the Moslem as the Christian. There seems a danger that in any settlement arranged by Christian Europe the claims of the Muhammadan may be ignored.

THACKER, SPINK & CO'S BOOK LIST

A Valuable Translation.

An Introduction to the Commentary of the HOLY QORAN Being an English Translation of AL BAYAN by Maulvi Abou Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi.
Rs. 15.

"When the original book appeared in print and the public realised its importance as a skillfully prepared logical discussion on all the old and new religions of the world, the need of its translation into English was deeply felt by all. All credit is due to Shafiq-ul-lah Siddiqi of Dalaun, who has rendered an invaluable service to Islam by presenting to the English-speaking world a correct English translation of Al-Bayan and has thus opened the way for the truth of Islam to permeate the most civilised but non-Moslem atmosphere of the West. Such works are a great step towards an organized movement for the propagation of Islam and as such should be patronised and encouraged by the Muslim public"—The Observer.

Books on the War.

The Holy War in Tripoli by G. F. Abbott
Author of "Turkey in Transition," &c.

"The real story of the Tripolitan campaign is told in an engrossing way by Mr. Lapworth,"—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A very interesting chapter, which ought to be read with care by every student of modern European politics, deals with the nationalist spirit in Italy,"—Irish Times.

Italy's War for a Desert, By FRANCIS McCULLAGH
Fully Illustrated, Rs. 9-3.

This well-known War Correspondent returned his papers to General Canova as a protest against the massacre of the Arabs in the Oasis.

"Mr. McCullagh has done a brave man's work in writing this volume. It ought to be one of the most widely read books of the year,"—Daily News.

Entally, the 24th October 1912.

DEAR SIR,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

The Delhi Outrage.

EXPRESSIONS of indignation at the crime and of sympathy with their Excellencies Lord and Lady Hardinge still continue to arrive in the Comrade office from various quarters in India. For want of space we have been only publishing the names of public bodies and of the localities where such resolutions had been passed. The messages received this week include resolutions passed at public meetings held by (1) the Muslims of Ferozepore (city), (2) the Muslims of Bhera, (3) the Shia Community of Delhi, and (4) the Anjuman-e-Islam, Jodhpore.

Lady Hardinge's Description.

At the indignation meeting at the Bombay Town Hall, on the 7th January Lord Sydenham read to the audience the following letter from Lady Hardinge, and in doing so he said that Lady Hardinge had kindly permitted him to read an account of the outrage written on the same day, which brings home the terrible experience of their Excellencies as no words of his could do:—

“Passing down the Chandni Chowk, where the cheering was on all sides, I suddenly felt an upheaval and was thrown forward. When I recovered my place, I felt rather dazed and most decidedly with a bad stinging in the head. The Viceroy turned to me and said, ‘I am afraid that was a bomb.’ The elephant had stopped. Then he called out: ‘Go on,’ and the procession started again. My attention was perfect stillness from the crowds until then, but when it started there were voices raised and I heard ‘Bravo’ amongst these. I then began noticing more details; for instance the howdah back had gone and that the Viceroy looked pale. I said to him:—‘Are you sure you are not hurt?’ He answered: ‘I am not sure. I have had a great shock, but I think I can go on.’ A few seconds afterwards, I stretched backwards to be able to see him from the back, and through a slit of the uniform near his right shoulder (the furthest from me) I could see red flesh appearing. Then I thought shall I tell him he is wounded, which will frighten him, or take the risk of the harm the jolt of the elephant will do him? I looked round and noticed the legs of a man who was having backwards and dead. Then I quietly said: ‘Do let me stop the procession, as I fear the man behind is dead.’ (We had moved on 150 yards) He said ‘Of course, we cannot go on under the circumstances.’ I stopped the elephant and signed to Colonel Maxwell on the elephant in front. He ran up and the Viceroy said ‘Can you do anything for the poor man behind?’ And he said, ‘Would you like Colonel Roberts to come? I think the Viceroy’s shoulder is hurt.’ Just then the Viceroy had a little convulsion and was rapidly losing consciousness. On regaining consciousness, he gave all instructions for the full carrying out of the ceremony. After this, there is nothing to tell excepting a history of the difficulties of getting him off the howdah and into the motor-car, then into the house and his clothes taken off. He was bleeding profusely from about six wounds. No one was in the house, but the staff did every thing and managed him beautifully.

The Viceroy's Health.

The following bulletin was issued at the Viceregal Lodge at 8-30 A. M., on Saturday, the 11th instant:—

His Excellency's condition is daily improving. The wounds are healing satisfactorily.

TETE A TETE

Ottoman Treasury Bonds.

Our readers would remember that early in the progress of the Balkan War we solicited His Excellency the Viceroy to make an announcement that the advance of a loan by the Mussalmans of India to the Government of Turkey during the war would not be against British law or policy, nor opposed to His Majesty the King-Emperor's Declaration of Neutrality. With characteristic graciousness His Excellency made this announcement in a telegram addressed to us, which we published at the time and also communicated to His Imperial Majesty the Sultan of Turkey. Since then we heard from the Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay that his Government intended to issue Treasury Bonds to the value of three million Turkish pounds, bearing interest at six per cent., which was to be paid through the agency of the Imperial Ottoman Bank and the Council of Public Debt, and that they were to be redeemed in three years at the rate of two instalments per annum, and that they were secured by the revenue from the recent war impost. Since then we have been communicating constantly with the Turkish authorities to settle all necessary details. At first we were informed that these bonds would be issued with a face value of £ (Turkish) 1, 2, 3, 5, and upwards. As the Turkish pound is the equivalent of Rs. 13 8-0, it was felt that it would be preferable to have at least a portion of these Treasury Bonds issued in terms of Indian money from Rs. 5 upwards so as to be more readily calculable and convenient for Indian purchasers. We now learn from His Excellency Djaler Bey, the Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay, that it has been decided to issue bonds for one million sterling, each bond being of the value of £ 1 sterling or Rs. 15. Being anxious to make it possible even for the poorest Mussalman to take a share in this loan to Turkey, we have not yet given up our endeavours to arrange for the issue of some bonds with a face value of Rs. 5 and 10. But we think it will not do to wait much longer for the settlement of this question, and steps must promptly be taken to arrange for the sale of the one pound sterling Treasury Bonds. If in the course of the next few weeks we learn that our efforts to induce the Turkish authorities to issue bonds of smaller value have resulted in success, we shall publish the fact and take steps to arrange for their sale. We have already arranged with two important banks, which have numerous branches throughout India, to receive deposits from the intending purchasers of these bonds. The Bank of Bengal with its many branches has agreed to receive such deposits and effect purchases for an inclusive charge of two annas per cent., with a minimum limit, however, of one rupee for each transaction, which means that the purchaser will have to pay the Bank of Bengal a commission of one rupee for every transaction not exceeding Rs. 800, whether the transaction is large or small. But the Alliance Bank of India, which has branches at Bombay, Calcutta, Agra, Amritsar, Cawnpore, Darjeeling, Lahore, Mussoorie, Murree, Rawalpindi, Umballa, and Delhi, has agreed to do the same for an inclusive charge of two annas per cent., with the minimum limit of only two annas, so that a commission of two annas only will be required by the Alliance Bank for every transaction up to the limit of Rs. 100, whether it is large or small. Beyond the above-mentioned respective limits of the two banks, the rate of commission chargeable by them is the same. We are thankful to both these banks for agreeing to transact this business at a very moderate commission, and particularly to Mr. Dalzell, Manager of the Delhi branch of the Alliance Bank of India, Ltd., who has gone out of his way to meet us in this matter and has kept the minimum limit of commission at the insignificant figure of two annas which could certainly never pay it to effect a large number of small transactions. Mr. Dalzell writes to us as follows:—"I am prepared to reduce our charge to 2 annas per cent. for the purpose of receiving deposits at our Head Office and all our branches, from persons desirous of purchasing Turkish War Bonds. Our minimum charge will thus be 2 annas. I trust this is now quite clear and satisfactory, and on hearing from you that you agree to our terms, I will at once arrange for all our offices to accept deposits and transfer them to this branch at par, and, on receipt of necessary instructions from the depositors, I will arrange to procure their bonds for them. I think it will be as well if you made it quite clear to all interested that when sending in their deposits either to us or any of our other offices, they should send a specimen of their signature, and at the same time give their full name, address and designation, to enable us to communicate with them direct in the matter of procuring their bonds." We trust intending purchasers of the bonds would carry out these instructions in all cases, at the same time sending the bank's commission at the above-mentioned rates, and that work which has been delayed so long for unavoidable reasons would at last be commenced with the enthusiasm and earnestness which have astonished everybody in this country and have created not a little impression abroad. Peace and war still hang in the balance, and if war is continued money alone can provide the means of war. But if Turkey has to conclude peace on account of the unquitting pressure which Europe is bringing to bear upon her weak-kneed Government, money would be still more necessary for a new start in life which the Empire of the Ottomans will have to make. War stores must have been depleted, ships must be in need of repairs and the whole organization of Government on which, even more than on the courage and numbers of the army, a nation has to depend in these days, must require to be financed. This is no small matter, but it is a matter which deserves every consideration that Indian Mussalman can show and every sacrifice that they can nerve themselves to make. Hitherto we in the East have been used to gifts and loans from Sultans and Padshahs, but Allah has honoured the Mussalmans of India by raising them to the position of those who can assist even Sultans and Padshahs. In His great assemblage all are equal, and it has been said to them as it has never been said to any other people that verily they are brothers.

خدا کی شان می رتبہ ہو یہ خارِ مہیلاں کا

We trust that it will not be long before the Ottoman Treasury Bonds of the value of a million sterling are exhausted, for it must be remembered that there are seventy million Mussalmans and they are being asked to do nothing more than what they have been asked before.

The course of the Peace negotiations during the last two weeks has been erratic and sensational. Every moment it has seemed as if the negotiations would be broken off and, though they pursued their intermittent course amidst general diplomatic optimism, they have at last reached a deadlock. Between the proposals of the Allies and the Turkish counter-proposals there is a large and yawning gulf, and it yet remains to be seen how the gulf will be bridged over. For the sake of a clear appreciation of the existing situation it is necessary to state the respective terms of the belligerents in a brief and simple form. According to the proposals of the Confederacy the Turks were required to renounce their sovereignty over the whole of European Turkey except a small strip of territory along the shores of the Sea of Marmora and the Bosphorus, while Crete as well as the Aegean islands should be ceded to Greece. The Turkish counter-proposals were to cede all occupied territories westward of the vilayet of Adrianople, which would remain Turkish, subject to the ratification of the Turco-Bulgarian frontier to be negotiated between Turkey and Bulgaria alone; Albania to be autonomous, the Powers settling its boundaries and political organisation. The future of Crete was to be settled according to the decision of the Powers. The Turks further declared it to be impossible to cede any of the Aegean islands as they belonged to Asia Minor. The Allies were reported to have replied that the cession of territory westward of Adrianople must comprise all and not only occupied territory. Regarding the Turkish proposal about Albania the Allies were said to have given their assent. As to the question of Adrianople, Crete and the Aegean islands, the Turkish delegates were requested to reconsider their attitude. They, however, remained firm. The Allies, thereupon, presented a threefold ultimatum intimating that failing a clear and satisfactory reply by Monday (8th January), they would break off the negotiations. At the Monday meeting of the Peace Conference the Turks presented proposals for certain cessions of territory northwards of Adrianople, but excluding that city, and also undertook to renounce their rights in Crete provided no other islands were demanded. The Allies, however, after a mutual consultation drafted a resolution to the effect that since the Turks had not replied satisfactorily to their last proposals they would suspend the labours of the Conference till Friday (10th January). The Conference has not met since then, and the question of peace now hangs on the fate of Adrianople. The position of Crete and the future of the Aegean islands also form the subjects of vital difference, but the final settlement would be practically reached if the question of Adrianople can be solved to the satisfaction of the belligerents. It is reported that the Turks are determined not to assent to the cession of Adrianople. The Allies seem equally resolved to secure it. The only way out of the impasse would, therefore, seem to lie in the immediate resumption of hostilities. The Turks have nothing to lose and every thing to gain if events take such a turn. If Adrianople is to be lost to the Turks, better far it should be lost on the field of battle. We trust the Ottoman Government has a clear estimate of the material and moral loss it will impose on the Empire by a timid acceptance of the terms of the Allies. By rejecting them, even in face of the most vigorous diplomatic pressure from other quarters, it would save its honour and dignity even though the material loss may have become irreparable. We hope the Ottoman Government is fully alive to the strength of Moslem feeling throughout the world on the question of peace. As to the feeling of Indian Mussalmans, we believe it is truly reflected in the following cablegram which has been sent by us to His Imperial Majesty the Sultan:—"Indian Mussalmans trust Turkey will not accept peace without honour. Help from God and early victory. Pray assure us." No one, however, can ignore the enormity of a new factor which may lead to one of the most infamous diplomatic transactions in European history. Reuter informs us that the Great Powers are practically agreed regarding the question of Adrianople and that a joint Note is to be presented to the Turkish Government urging moderation and the necessity of a peaceful settlement. It is manifest that the diplomacy of the Triple Entente is active on behalf of the Allies and the Turks are being pressed to yield on the most vital issue by the warring lovers of peace, on the one hand, and by the aggressive military demonstrations of Russia on the Armenian frontier, on the other. The Turks have often been asked to recognize the facts of the situation. One of the most patent facts is that the Allies can never hope to secure the acceptance of their extravagant demands single-handed. Any settlement of the questions on the lines proposed by them will be achieved by a cynical and unblushing coercion exercised by some of their patrons amongst the Great Powers. The Turks trust to the sense of fairplay of the great nations. That trust had seldom been justified in the past. The Muscovite is having the one chance of his life to play at his old game with loaded dice. France is merely a Russian satellite. Does England remember her old professions of friendship for the Turks and does her Government realize its imperial responsibilities? Some of the most important Ministers of Great Britain have already shown in public the true bent of their minds, and are perhaps not unaware of the impressions that their gushing sympathies for the Allies have produced in the Moslem world. At this critical stage, the Indian Mussalmans cannot but feel anxious about the possible attitude of His Majesty's Government. We trust another disappointment is not in store for them. We appeal to the Indian Government to try to let the Turks have a fair chance. It is in the name of honour, of consistency and above all in the interests of the Empire that we venture to make this appeal. If His Majesty's Government cannot assist Turkey on account of its declared neutrality, surely it ought not to have any hand in coercing her. We have never urged the British Government throughout this crisis to take up arms on behalf of the Turks, though such demands have been made in some quarters. There were in the greatest Moslem Empire in the world. We have only urged for fairplay and justice. We know an appeal such as the one we make to-day is open to misconstruction. But in a time like the present we will be untrue to ourselves if we did not speak our mind freely both in the interest of the Turkish Empire and our own.

Some kind friends have called our attention to a speech delivered by Mr. Mohamed Ali at Lahore towards the end of November last on the subject of the All-India Medical Mission and the sale of Ottoman Treasury Bonds in India. It appears that this speech has disturbed the meteorological conditions and even some of our readers of thunder are visible, pale and lightning can occasionally be discerned on a corner of high Olympus. The speaker is no Ajax to defy such thunder and lightning, but he believes he is safe at least this time. They are young whom the gods love, and unless there is more evidence of the love of the gods, his extreme youth, which has hitherto been his one crime, would for once shield him from harm. But we must suppress all attempts at being facetious, for we are told the great C. I. D. has never yet forgiven a joke or anything even remotely approaching banter. Whatever other test of truth it may like it certainly detests ridicule as if it were high treason. Now, we are sincerely glad that nothing more serious has yet been discovered than the Lahore speech wherewith to confound its author. He happens to be not only the editor of this journal, but also its printer and publisher, for he has no desire to involve anyone but himself in the consequences of his actions. For two years the Comrade has been before the public and the Government, and if after all this time it is only the spoken word that disturbs the equanimity of some officials, all we can say is that we are grateful for the relief thus unwittingly afforded to us. Now, so little was thought of the Lahore speech by its author that he read the published report at Bombay for the first time a fortnight after it had been made and then too it was only a portion of it that he could manage to read. When the sheet lightning, however, became visible on the horizon he read the other portion also in an issue of the Zamindar borrowed from the file of a local contemporary as our own file was incomplete. It is evident even from this belated perusal that our Lahore contemporary's Assistant Editor who wrote an account of the meeting has had no training as a writer of shorthand in Urdu like the reporters of the C. I. D. who generally act as substitutes for press reporters in Moslem meetings at Lucknow. As an effort of memory his reproduction of the speeches is certainly wonderful, but he would have been a prodigy if he had reproduced the ipsissima verba in the case of a speech which lasted nearly an hour. That there are many omissions is evident from the fact that the report does not go beyond three and a half columns of the Zamindar. But as it is, we do not see what there is in it to interest the seekers of sedition. Is it the flouting of those that have tried to frighten Europe with the "Moslem Menace" in the shape of an all-conquering army of "Pan-Islamists"? Or do they object to the expression of a wish that there may come into being a defensive alliance of Moslem kingdoms to resist the offensive Concert of Europe? If not either of this, do they feel hurt because those pets of theirs, the "leaders," have come in for some rough handling? Whatever may be their own objection to the speech, the author thereof regrets above all one chief omission and a misquotation from the message of another. In all actions for which we have been responsible during the recent troubles of Turkey we have been anxious to secure the goodwill of Government. Our Turkish Relief Fund was opened in October, 1911, with the consent of H. E. the Viceroy, and our Medical Mission has been sent to Turkey with His Excellency's cordial assistance. Similarly, before we took any steps to arrange for a loan to Turkey we requested the Viceroy to make an authoritative pronouncement on the subject. This did not evidently suit the ideas of liberty and independence of an Urdu contemporary of Calcutta which asked us satirically if we wished the Imam of every mosque to solicit similar pronouncements before delivering the khutba every Friday. The satire was certainly clever, but it needed no reply in the Comrade. At Lahore, however, Mr. Mohamed Ali tried to justify his action by attempting a description of all the elements that composed his community. For himself he could say that before he undertook the launching of the Comrade he had asked himself whether he was prepared for every possible consequence of reverencing his conscience as his king in performing the duties of a publicist and that his answer had been in the affirmative. But what right had he, he asked at Lahore, to presume that every Mussalman would do what his heart prompted him to do for the relief of the sufferings of his brethren in Turkey without definitely ascertaining that such action was not disagreeable to those in power? This is the justification of the Comrade's action, and we find in it nothing to blush for or apologise. We have never feared to criticise the policy and measures of Government when occasion demanded, and it was, therefore, due from the editor of this journal to bring prominently before the large audience at Lahore that throughout the troubles of Turkey the Government of India, unlike the Liberal Cabinet, had shown the utmost respect for the grief and tribulation of His Majesty's Moslem Indian subjects and had rendered them every legitimate assistance. All this was a single argument, but we find in the Zamindar's report that it has been split into two paragraphs and a clear sequence has not been maintained. But it would be an irony of fate if for our reply to our satirical Calcutta contemporary, which perhaps was in the misanthropic atmosphere of Beagat visions of a decoration of Khan Bahadurship ready to descend on us from Olympus, we should receive a no more deserved crown of "martyrdom." Which of the top we fear, most we leave our readers to guess. So much for the opinion, and now a word about the misquotation. The Zamir's report gives no indication that Mr. Mohamed Ali had brought a message to the Lahore audience from one whose past success in all that he has hitherto undertaken gives us hope that he will overcome every difficulty in creating an organisation of immense potentialities for his community. His plans are being matured and it would be better if we said no more about them at present, though we may just as well disappoint the C. I. D. now by stating that there is no secrecy about the whole affair. His message has been altogether misreported and Mr. Mohamed Ali did not say that "the time has come for all Mussalmans to arm themselves and muster beneath the walls of K'aba." The time has certainly not come, but when it pleases God that it should come, the editor of the Comrade will be the last to shrink from announcing it. And when he has announced it, let us be sure he will not play the sign-post and merely point the way.

We have already announced that a cablegram was received by us from Dr. Ansari about the safe arrival of the All-India Medical Mission at Constantinople, and that a later message from him informed us of the "great demand for immediate work." No further message has been received this week, but we are sure the Mission has already entered on its labour of love and mercy and is earnestly doing its duty. The All-India Medical Mission has a wide sphere of usefulness before it, and we trust the generosity of the Indian Mussalmans will be sustained in a liberal measure to enable it to do its work effectively. We may state here for the information of our readers that we had requested His Excellency the Viceroy, before the departure of the Mission, to kindly ask the British Foreign Office to lend assistance to the Mission through its Consular authorities in Egypt and through His Majesty's Ambassador in Constantinople. We are grateful to His Excellency for having so readily and considerably acceded to our request. The Private Secretary to the Viceroy informed us on the 24th December, just a day after the outrage in Chandni Chank, that the request had been duly communicated under the Viceroy's direction to the Secretary of State. "A telegram was received from London on the 20th December to the effect that the Foreign Office had sent the suggested instructions to the Consul-General at Cairo and to the British Ambassador at Constantinople and had informed the belligerents of the composition of the party." The latter precaution was absolutely necessary as, in view of the "Carthage" incident during the Turko-Italian war, one could not ignore the possibility of a stoppage of the Mission by the Balkan Confederacy on its way to Turkey. Now that the Mission has safely reached its destination all must be eagerly looking forward to hear of its success. We are confident that the earnest band of workers under the able guidance of Dr. Ansari will do their duty with credit. A letter from Dr. Ansari written near Aden gives interesting details of the daily life of the members of the Mission on board the ship and shows how he had devised a complete programme of daily work which was being observed with strict regularity. "Only one day's strictness was all that was necessary," says Dr. Ansari, "as they all follow the programme religiously to the letter except when too sick.... You would see from the programme that they are all fully occupied all day. I am very strict as regards prayers and lectures.... I can say without hesitation that every man would prove helpful after the lectures have been finished." As to the spirit of the members, it will be amply manifest from the following extract which we take from a letter sent to us from Aden by a member of the Mission:—"We have already reached land, and about 10 or 11 o'clock we reach Aden. I wish we could fly over the distance or go at once to render some humble service to the Turks. Nothing will give us greater pleasure than to sacrifice ourselves for the brave and wounded Turks. You may rest assured that we shall not spare any effort to relieve the wounded of pain and to obey the orders strictly. I can say without fear that when we return to India we shall not be a disgrace to the Mussalmans of India. In Dr. Ansari you have chosen the very man for the post." The following is the programme observed on board the ship.

- (1) 5-30 a. m., Fajr Prayers.
- (2) 6-8 a. m., Coffee
- (3) 8-9 a. m., Lecture (Dr. Ansari.)

[Surgical Technique, Anæsthesia, Antiseptic, Preparation of patients for operation, operation theatre, wards, instruments, utensils, dressings, lotions, irrigations, hæmorrhage, shock, etc.]

- (4) 9-30 a. m., Breakfast.
- (5) 12-1 p. m., Lecture (Dr. Pyzee and Dr. Mahmudullah.)

[Elementary applied anatomy and a few points on Elementary physiology.]

- (6) 1 p. m., Lunch.
- (7) 1-30 p. m., Zuhar Prayers.
- (8) 2-3-30 p. m., Demonstration and Practice (Dr. Naim and Dr. Barry.)

[First Aid, Ambulance, Field-work, Bandaging and application of Splints.]

- (9) 4 p. m., Tea.
- (10) 4-30 p. m., 'Asr Prayers.
- (11) 5-6 p. m., Lecture and Practical Demonstration. (Dr. Ansari.)

[General principles of Nursing, Beds and bed-making, bathing, sponging, foment, compress, observation of patients, hygiene of wards, bed-litters, temperature charts, nurse's report, night report, registers, Ethics to be observed in wards and with patients in general.]

- (12) 6 p. m., Maghrib Prayers.
- (13) 6-30 p. m., Dinner.
- (14) 9 p. m., 'Isha Prayers.

THE HON. SECRETARY of the Y. M. M. A., Bombay, requests us to state as follows for the information of the Moslem public:—"A cablegram received this morning (8th January) in Bombay from Constantinople by the Honorary Secretary, the Young Men's Muhammadan Association, states that His Sultanic Majesty has desired that the Bombay Poor Moslems' Medical Mission, organised by the Young Men's Muhammadan Association and the Anjuman Ziaul Islam, should proceed to Tchataldja, the seat of war, on field service, whither it will proceed this week from Constantinople. It is necessary to mention here that no Mission has been organised by Dr. Suhrawarthy, and this Mission has no connection whatsoever with Doctor Suhrawarthy, it being the first to leave the shores of India. Those who desire to subscribe to the funds of this Mission are requested to send in their subscriptions either to Mr. Muhammad Umar Haji Yousuf Sobhani at No. 9, Hornby Road, Fort, or to Mr. M. H. Mumkba, Byculla, Bombay, Honorary Secretaries to the Board of Trustees of this Mission."

THANKS to the big, distracting events elsewhere, the Fates that govern Persia have been busy spinning with more than usual vigour and startling things may happen any moment to add to the afflictions of that hapless country. Russia is actively planning the restoration of the ex-Shah whose principal agent, Saad-ed-Dowleh, has returned under the patronage of Russia and England and has made a bid for high office in Teheran. The Russian grip over the Northern Provinces is now complete and the authority of the Persian Government has ceased to exist. The point of view of the Russian Nationalists whose policy is ascendant in the Russian Foreign Office, has been frankly summed up by the Teheran correspondent of the Norooz Vrengs. He says that "Russia has full legal and moral right to occupy Azerbaijan, as a creditor has the right to sequestrate an estate whose owner has caused him damage." He demands that the present Prime Minister should be replaced by one "in sympathy with our interests." The correspondent concludes:—"On the whole the most effectual form of address in Persia is the imperative, and the most appropriate and profitable tone is that of an ultimatum." This Muscovite text has been frequently and freely preached by many a British Imperialist and the British Government has been often urged to occupy Southern Persia. The unfortunate death of Captain Eckford has rendered this demand more persistent and some of the recent questions in the House of Commons on this subject and more particularly the replies of Sir Edward Grey are full of ominous significance. "The Imperial Government fully realised the unsatisfactory state of affairs," said the Foreign Minister in reply to Colonel Yate, "and was urgently considering what steps could be taken." Those steps are probably foreshadowed in the Times article, a summary of which has been cabled by Reuters to-day. After reviewing the situation and calling it hopeless, the Oracle of the Printing House Square assumes a portentous air and hints at an "experiment" of keeping the trade routes in Southern Persia open by a military occupation. It candidly repeats the difficulties of such a step and admits that all such occupations tend to become permanent. But it salves its conscience by declaring that there is no hope of the regeneration of Persia from within. The Times article is, in all likelihood, the shadow that the coming events are casting in front. The British "experiment" may be tried by an early dispatch of some Indian Regiment to Persia. The Muscovite dream will come true at last at the "experiment" will be an irrevocable step towards the partition of the country. Is it possible to hope that the Indian Government may yet be able to resist a step hinted at by the Times which will be contrary to its old policy and may be incalculable in results?

1st January.

The Comrade.

The Comrade.

The Muhammadan Educational Conference.

When Sir Syed Ahmed Khan founded the Muhammadan Educational Conference he felt the necessity of an annual gathering of such few Mussalmans as could then be found to be interested in the advancement of Western education. At first his own advocacy of modern education was a cry in the wilderness, but in the course of succeeding years he was able to gather round himself a number of Mussalmans partly through the confidence he enjoyed and the personal influence he was able to exercise in their circle, and partly through their own appreciation of what were then regarded as "advanced" ideas and the "New Light." But even these could hardly add anything useful to Sir Syed Ahmed Khan's own ideas on the subject of Western education, and the gathering was not so much convened for an exchange of views as for the purpose of advertising Western education, and familiarising the Mussalmans with the educational ideals of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan. Many resolutions used to be passed at these early sessions of the Conference as they are passed to-day. But the initiative was, in the majority of cases, Sir Syed's own. The chief, if not the only, original contributions to the work of the Conference were the poems of Khwaja Altaf Husain Hali, and there can be no manner of doubt that if Western education found a brain to conceive and a hand to execute its plans in Sir Syed Ahmed, it found a voice of great power and sweetness in Hali. The good folk who met every year in some important Moslem centre in the United Provinces or the Punjab, and chiefly at Aligarh, hardly served any purpose other than that of advertising the views of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan and of carrying his ideas and the words of Hali to their respective homes.

This was the only practicable course in those early days, and anything like an organisation was out of the question. But on the death of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, when Northern India had become fully permeated with his ideas and shared his aspirations, it became possible to advertise Western education in the outlying provinces also, and Calcutta, Madras, Bombay and Karachi were in turn visited. Nawab Mohsin ul-Mulk had a large circle of personal friends throughout India, and his abounding charisma of manner captivated all those who came in contact with him. The credit of carrying the Aligarh flag into distant provinces and in uniting the whole of Moslem India in its educational ideals is, therefore, due to him. But although much pioneer work was then needed in the outlying provinces, as it was needed in the North in the days of Sir Syed, the latter region could no longer be satisfied with a Conference which merely served the purpose of popularising Western education. It needed for its nourishment the strong meat of educational discussion with a view to find solutions for the educational problems which the popularity of Western education in the North was bringing into being. Here, however, the Conference failed to a great extent, because the powers that be desired to retain in their hands the educational dictatorship of Sir Syed without deserving it, and in utter forgetfulness of the change that had come since then over the surface of things in Northern India.

The Conference has in recent times made some efforts to create an educational organisation which could not have existed in the days of Sir Syed, but its chief practical work has been the financial assistance it has rendered to the Aligarh College. Since the death of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan that college has had much difficulty to face and many problems to solve. But if one turns to the voluminous reports of resolutions passed, speeches made, and lectures delivered at no less than a dozen annual sessions of the Conference in recent years, the only idea he will get of the progress of the work at Aligarh would be that it is some mysterious concern, the sole characteristic of which is that it gathers money in every session of the Conference without ever accounting for the expenditure or stating the use which it makes of that money. We defy anybody to piece together even a sketchy report of Aligarh's progress during the last fifteen years from the voluminous literature published by the Conference, and even to-day the reports of the Joint Secretary contain hardly any reference to the revenue and expenditure of the college, the numbers of the students studying and of teachers teaching at Aligarh, and the problems it has had to solve in recent times. This is not all. Some of the most important problems connected with the progress of education in India would have been wholly ignored by the Conference were it not for the persistence of some who desire to make it a real Conference of the Muhammadans of India interested in the advancement of modern education in all its forms. Excepting, perhaps, the debate on Mr. Gokhale's Primary Education Bill in the session of 1911, there has hardly been any educational problem in India which has been tackled by the Conference. As regards the creation of an organisation for educational purposes, the various local committees of the Conference are almost without exception moribund, and no attempt has yet been made with any success to collect information about the number, character and progress of Mussalman educational institutions and associations existing throughout India. Judged, therefore, as a deliberative Conference discussing serious problems of Indian education the annual sessions of the Conference are of little use, but judged as a bureau of information on the progress of Moslem education in India and as a living organisation stimulating educational progress throughout the land the Conference has been a dismal failure.

Almost the only item of interest in the annual programme nowadays is the Address of the President, and in this respect the Conference can boast of considerable literature of great value. But no Presidential Address of recent times has faced the various problems of Moslem education so courageously and with such determination as the long Address of Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami, M. D., D. P. H. (Cantab), formerly of the Indian Medical Service, who presided at the 26th annual session held on the 28th, 29th and 30th December at Lucknow. This fairly comprehensive Address in every way deserves a careful perusal, and even if every question has not been discussed in detail his passing references contain much wisdom and enlightenment. But its chief feature is a fairly close study which he seems to have made of Aligarh as it was designed to be by its Founder, as it is supposed to be to-day, and as it may or may not be in the future according to the Constitution that may be agreed upon for the proposed University into which it is to be extended.

We have much sympathy with the point of view of Major Bilgrami on the subject of the Aligarh of to-day and the Aligarh of to-morrow, and our repeated condemnation of the attitude of the Secretary of State's decisions cannot be reproached on the score of weakness. But we trust he will forgive us if we fail to agree with him in regarding the picture of Russian education before the days of Alexander II. as a suitable comparison for Indian conditions to-day. It is true that many of our pedagogues find even more comfort in the soothing word "Discipline" than a certain old dame found in "Mesopotamia," and fondly believe that the discipline of the barrack-room and the parade-ground can be reproduced in college hostels and playing-fields; but we have hardly come anywhere near the state of affairs when Colonels and Counts would become Professors of literature and policemen would lecture on Philosophy. Whatever may have been the policy of Anglo-Indian educationists in the past, and whatever suspicions may still lurk in the minds of a certain school of administrators, Government as a whole has recognised the utility of a wide diffusion of education in India and the absolute impossibility of allowing the people of this country to remain in intellectual darkness. Feeble efforts still continue to be made from time to time to devise short-cuts to loyalty through the darkness of ignorance; and a certain type of Englishmen, whom a perverse fate has doomed to be pedagogues when Nature and the catching example of the "Premier Service" have cut them out to be understudies of the zabardast administrator, often wish to exact from the Indian student, as Sir Auckland Colvin had put it, "full justice to English deserts" without heeding at all that he, too, must expect the English "to do equal justice to his own." But other communities in India have made it plain enough that this cannot last, and even those who wish to pursue such policies have recognised that the end is inevitable. If that is not yet so in the case of the Mussalmans it is because, during the first decade after Sir Syed Ahmed's death, the Trustees of what was designed to be an autonomous institution enjoying a "measure of self-government," and "in its administration free from interference by Government officials" did not take care to preserve its earlier traditions. What Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami deploras to-day has been deplored long before by others; but even though their judgment was less severe, they had not his advantage of seniority and were left to cry in the wilderness alone. It is some consolation to them now that even if their lack of years still continues to be a reproach to them, they can no longer be charged at the same time with a lack of "sobriety" and "moderation." Major Bilgrami's Address provides them with a naive justification, and the candid admiration of Sir James Meeson supplies their own frankness in criticism with a legitimation which they must greatly value.

Major Bilgrami has criticised the compromises of the Constitution Committee unsparingly, but he has followed the traditions of polite controversy in sparing the members of the Committee themselves. We respect his scruples, but we would equally respectfully point out that it is not practical wisdom to judge the creation without taking into consideration the character and motives of the creators. The Constitution of the University as drafted by the Constitution Committee is a curious mosaic made up of many small pieces put in by one or other of its members, or by the Government of India, against the wishes of a minority opposed to their finding a place in the Constitution. We have already pronounced our own benediction on it as a whole, in view of what we know of the composition of the Committee and the creative process which resulted in that Constitution. But we can perhaps point out many more defects in it than arrested the attention of Major Bilgrami if we had ourselves to do the framing of an ideal Constitution. Even now we shall be glad to assist him in having some of its more prominent defects removed, but it is necessary that he should first understand the conditions which have produced a defective constitution and then set himself the difficult task of removing those conditions.

In the first place, we fear Major Bilgrami's long absence from India has led him to translate in imagination some of the conditions of freedom existing in England—which we here must envy him—into the order of things that have ever been possible in India. But where his idealism has soared quite out of the reach of our realities is that he believes the Aligarh of to-day, which "shall cease to exist as a separate corporation and shall be incorporated with the University," to be the same institution which was "the ideal of Sir Syed and of Syed Mahmood." No illusion could be greater or more misleading. That Aligarh ceased to exist even in the days of one "Who succeeded them in the leadership of the community," and if it still continues to exist as the ideal of some Mussalmans in the realm of their own imaginations, spurring them on to work for its translation into the realm of reality, they are charged by such members of their own community as have personal axes to grind with conspiring to destroy discipline, and their efforts to reclaim the Aligarh of an earlier day are represented as dimensions of which the price will be nothing short of Aligarh itself.

Major Bilgrami rightly fears that clause 5 of Chapter III of the Statutes in the Constitution of the University, which goes beyond the provision in section 41 of the Rules and Regulations of the Aligarh Trustees, would have "the effect of making our 'Supreme Governing Body' supremely ridiculous." But is he sure that even under the existing provision of the Trustees' Rules the Governing Body of the College governs any more than an Indian Chief immured in his medieval palace who has made his Minister the keeper of his conscience, but shrewdly suspects both the conscience and the keeper thereof to be the sport of a Rule-Britannia Resident? Major Bilgrami rightly apprehends that the University "will in practice be altogether a Government affair run by the experts of the Educational Department." Does he realise that the so-called experts of the Educational Department, who were kept at arm's length in the days of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan when the Government grant-in-aid bore a much larger proportion to the revenues of the college than it does to-day, now ride astride the situation, and Mr. do a Fosse presume to direct instruction at Aligarh as authoritatively as in Allahabad.

Major Bilgrami justly regrets that Government wishes to assign to the Trustees in the proposed University "a position of responsibility without power." But does he not ignore the fact that what he calls "a most uneaviable position" has long before this been assigned to the Trustees of the College mainly through the same acquiescence of some of their own number who have been and to some extent still are in authority at Aligarh? He rightly expresses the apprehension that the Mussalmans may find a member of their own University staff "exercising the veto and assuming full control of the policy of the College, if he happens to have influence in high quarters or a friend well placed in the Educational Service." Would it surprise him to know that this is exactly what had consistently been done for more than a decade after Sir Syed Ahmad's death? Sir Theodore Morison has frankly enough admitted this, but has attempted to justify it on the ground that in his opinion he knew the Mussalmans better than the Secretary of the Trustees, and that they had greater confidence in his wise benevolence. But whether this justification be accepted or not, and whether his successor may or may not have attempted the same justification and played the part of the Stuarts after the Tudors, what after all, we ask, was the reason of the differences between Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk and Mr. Archbold except Mr. Archbold's attempt to exercise such a veto and Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk's courageous refusal to permit such an encroachment on the powers of the Trustees? Very late in the day, but even then not too late, the Trustees, compelled by public opinion, rallied to the support of Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, and with becoming dignity accepted the resignation of Mr. Archbold. Even so masterful a Lieutenant-Governor as Sir John Hewett was impressed with the determination of the Trustees to be masters in their own house, and they had an excellent opportunity of making sure that their new Principal had grasped the full significance of the unfortunate but, under the circumstances, inevitable differences and their settlement. But even when theoretically determined to have their rights and position respected, the most resolute among the Trustees have failed in safeguarding these in practice. The next few months will show unmistakably whether Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk was wise in following the advice of Sahibzada Aftab Ahmad Khan and appointing as Mr. Archbold's successor one who had taken a leading part in threatening the Trustees with Government interference, and who had not withdrawn a letter twice condemned by Sir John Hewett before the Principalship was offered to him. Such tactics as a rule put a premium on insubordination and breach of discipline, and those who fondly believe that they can win over their subordinates by such methods fully deserve to be blackmailed. Mr. Towle acted as Principal sub pro tem. for two years and during this period did not, to our knowledge, indicate to the Trustees in any manner that he was merely nursing his grievance. He has not yet been made permanent because of the University which has now long been in sight, but the Trustees have recently assured him of a permanent salary equal to that which he now draws. We hope he will not act as his predecessor had done and force upon the new Lieutenant-Governor any intervention such as an administrator of the type of Sir James Meeson would be the last to undertake in a hurry. But if Mr. Towle provokes such differences, would not Aligarh history be repeating itself once more and with equally unfortunate results?

To our mind it will be in the highest interests of an institution like Aligarh if it works without the recurrence of differences between its Trustees and the European staff, and if no Patron of the college finds himself in the delicate position of a mediator. But if this cannot always be possible, can the Press be condemned to silence on the subject of these differences? Nobody regrets more than we do the necessity of our occasional adverse comments on the state of affairs at Aligarh. But in view of our inside knowledge of these affairs, added to our love for the institution and our abiding belief in its immense possibilities, we could not leave Aligarh affairs undiscussed without a clear dereliction of duty. However dangerous these public discussions may appear, we have already noted that sometimes even stern disciplinarians cannot avoid a public reference to them so long as these differences exist between the Trustees of the college and its staff. The real difficulty begins when we have to deal with the grievances of the students and their teachers' complaints of their behaviour. For it is not possible to discuss these in such a manner that students may not overhear the voice of the public critic, and there are times when it is positively dangerous to withhold public criticism. Much as we deplore the awkward situation created by the necessity of such a discussion, is it possible for us to indulge in anything but stage whispers which are bound to reach the ears for which they are never meant? To-day, when it appears from the recent speech of Sir James Meeson at Aligarh that Mr. Towle and at least some of his colleagues are not satisfied with the discipline of the students, we are compelled to ask whether all is well with the attitude of the Professors towards the Assistant Professors—who are after all their colleagues—and the students to whom they stand in loco parentis. Major Bilgrami has dealt in his Address with the alleged decline in the veneration due from pupil to teacher and has himself offered an adequate explanation of the change in the commercialism of the pedagogy of to-day. But he admits that the reverential spirit "still exists in this country under modern conditions where the right kind of teacher and the right kind of pupil get together." Does not this bring to mind an ineffaceable picture so simply depicted by Hali?

وہ یک اور اس کی شاگردوں کو بام م سخن دیکھی

(Those who have not seen the pictures of Affection and Obedience should see Beak and his pupils conversing together.) Major Bilgrami rightly believes that "to obtain the best results a certain amount of warmth of heart" in the teacher is necessary, among other conditions, and if it is true that the students' minds have not properly been disciplined at Aligarh, is it not pertinent to ask whether it can still be said of Aligarh that "the students have not been looked upon as mere mechanical toys to be made to assume any desired posture or perform any given action by the pressing of sundry buttons or the winding up of certain springs?" Is it true that they are treated "always as human beings with all their feelings, sentiments and passions, joys and sorrows, virtues and vices, merits and foibles?" We shall not dwell much on this aspect of the question, but in the interests of the future it is impossible to close this book and say we shall look into it no more. Aligarh is certainly not in a state of ferment such as existed in 1907, and such as would have justified the alarm of Sir James Meeson. But we confess a certain malaise had lingered after the violent distemper of six years ago and a sullenness seems to brood over the place. This is, however, inevitable so long as there is an absence of candour and frankness in the relations of the Trustees and the staff on the one hand, and of the European staff and their Indian colleagues and students on the other.

The Indian National Congress.

"A CONGRESS VETERAN" has made some frank admissions in a Behar paper about the position of the Congress to-day as well as the quality of its work in annual session. He is considerably alarmed at the thought that it is fast losing its hold on the affections of the educated Indians and that its deliberations have of late been marked by much less vigour of thought and argument. He particularly deplores the meagre attendance of the delegates at Bankipore—about 200 in all—and recalls the days when the Congress aroused far greater popular enthusiasm and annually drew as many as 1,800 delegates from all parts of the country. "The spectacular show needs to be given up," concludes the "Veteran." The Congress inspiration is obviously on the wane and its causes are not far to seek. The movement in its infancy was bound to arouse popular interest as it held forth a new and inspiring political ideal before the people. Much of its early work was of a missionary character and its ranks grew every year as its gospel of nationalism and political self-realisation moved men with a new-born zeal of conversion. The work of propagandism, however, could not last for ever, while a certain impatience for the Promised Land was bound to manifest itself soon amongst the converts to the new creed. The very widespread familiarity with the ideals of the Congress gradually led to a slackening of the popular zeal. The followers of its early days began to grow indifferent, as they felt year after year that the Congress with all its strenuous energy of debate and fine political philosophy was still barren of practical results. The fast-awakening political consciousness of the people panted for fresh fields of activity and this is the one thing that the Congress has failed to provide. It has no doubt furnished much useful criticism during its career for the guidance of India's rulers, and part at least of the policy embodied in the Reform Scheme of 1908 is due to the aspirations that the Congress movement had created and made vocal. But the people now demand a more practical and constructive effort. The constitution of the Congress has not improved beyond that of a big debating society; and its annual sessions will continue to grow less attractive and useful as long as theory-fed politicians are suffered to bulk large on its platform.

The Bankipore session was not a very brilliant affair even as regards the redelivery of "the first principles"—an achievement that the orthodox type of the Congress orator has been taught to regard as the crown of his political career. The net result was the passing of a number of Committee-made resolutions, plus a new access of dignity to the amant propre of Behar. The Presidential address was, as usual, a heroic effort to restate the political faith, hope and destiny of India in terms that even one does not seem to stale. The Hon. Rao Bahadur R. N. Mudholkar is a staid and experienced Congressman and his utterance does not lack in practical sense, useful criticism and laudable aspiration. But it does not crystallise into some live issue that would call forth fresh energy of battle, even into some illuminating hint or gesture that would solve existing doubts and clear the path ahead. After reviewing the aims of the Congress, the recent troubles, the new era, the progress achieved, the change in the spirit of Government, which has led to the birth of a new ideal of "Provincial autonomy," the President fastens on the "defects in Council Regulations" with evident relief and points to "separate Muhammadan electorates" as the one evil that threatens the political future of the country. "Nothing," says the President, "is more calculated to retard the concord and harmony between Muhammadans and Hindus, to obstruct the intellectual and political advancement of the Muhammadans themselves, and the growth of a sturdy catholic public spirit and life amongst them, than these watertight compartments of separate electorates." Arguments or rather judgments like these serve to emphasise the garrulous futility of the parrot-cries and platitudes that have hitherto done duty for thought on the Congress platform.

It has been a conventional belief professed by every Congressman that the Indian national unity would best be promoted if the Mussalmans ceased to think for themselves. All obvious differences of tradition, history, creed, temperament and outlook are lightly brushed aside by a perverted appeal to non-existent patriotism in the name of the nation that is yet to be. Given from the Indian Nationalist standpoint such strenuous use of a sterile sentiment defeats the very objects that it claims to serve. One cannot help sighing for some bold, rebellious political heretic if you will—who would break through the fetters of cant and convention and fearlessly look facts in the face. The old winners who have dwarfed the big problem of nation-building to the simple theme of fixing the mode of elections to the Legislative Councils of the country have thereby declared themselves bankrupt—at any rate, intellectually. Like the ostrich they bury their heads in the sands of sentiment and refuse to admit that the situation is what it is. They do not seem to know that they are trifling with the gigantic problem which they apparently do not understand and are certainly unfitted to solve. The Congress politician who hammers away at "Separate Electorates" for hours together and holds them responsible for the birth of what he calls "the Hindu-Moslem question" is exactly the person that is thwarting the growth of Indian nationality. If the Mussalmans had no separate interests to safeguard in daily life, there would have been no separate electorates. Even if the Mussalmans had insisted on separate representation of their community in sheer spite of the Hindus, or through some strange perversity, the root problem would still have been there to solve—the problem of removing the prejudices, the animosities and the discords, which keep the Indian communities apart, so that they may ultimately attain national unity. The President of the Bankipore Congress says that "the undesirability of these separate electorates is acknowledged by several of the leaders of the Muhammadan community, by some of those very persons who were elected to represent its interests in the Viceregal and Provincial Councils." We trust the Hon. Mr. Mudholkar has had enough political experience and we presume he is able to understand the real feelings of the Moslem community as a whole. Even "the leaders of the Muhammadan community" who differ from the mass of Moslem opinion in their views about separate electorates and who subscribe to the Congress creed, know perfectly well that they are "leaders" without a following. The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque, whose address as Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Bankipore Congress was a remarkable utterance in many ways, was frank enough to acknowledge that "it is an undeniable fact that Mussalmans as a community have kept themselves aloof (from the Congress) and those who joined have joined in their own individual capacity." As long as the Mussalmans feel that they have certain special interests to safeguard, no amount of specious reasoning and fine talk will induce them to give up special political organisations, or cease to demand separate representation in the Legislative chambers of the country.

When once the necessity of separate electorates is recognised in case of the Legislative Councils it is illogical and inconsistent to oppose the extension of the principle to local bodies. The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque, however, seems to be unaware of the absurdity of his position in regard to this question. Perhaps his view of the matter is that Hindus and Mussalmans should, without communal distinction, be thrown together at some stage in the public life of the country and that it would be best to preserve such association in local bodies which deal with matters of common concern in daily life. This attitude, however, utterly ignores the principle underlying communal representation. The broad, ultimate interests of Hindus and Mussalmans are in their nature identical, otherwise it would be a silly pastime even to idealise about United India. Separate electorates have been found to be necessary at this stage exactly because there exist at present distinct and well-defined Hindu and Moslem standpoints in regard to the common, immediate and every day affairs of Indian life. And the public bodies that have been created in the past and may be created in the near future to deal with these affairs should be constituted on the basis of providing full and adequate representation of these standpoints. The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque indulges in cheap sneer at people who "have the notion that by writing vigorously and strongly on a few nominations of municipal commissioners they are championing the cause of justice." In the name of all that is ridiculous, what other "cause" should interest men of common clay, of the very earth earthy, who have never been blessed with vision of Wonderland hung with stars and who must needs concern themselves with such "petty things" as rearing a family on moderate income, keeping their physical surroundings tolerable, or ensuring an equitable distribution of the burden they have to bear for the luxury of corporate existence in society. And, after all, do not these self-same "petty things" lie at the root of the Hindu-Moslem question? The public men of India who brush them aside in lofty disdain as things of no account perhaps know not what they do. If they do so knowingly, then they really stand in need of truly "higher ideals" and should "try to achieve them."

The Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque dealt at length with the question of Hindu-Moslem co-operation in public affairs and strongly exhorted the Mussalmans to join the Congress. We hope the Hon. Mr. Haque knows as well as any other public man of India what keeps the two communities apart in the political life of the country. He holds very sound and inspiring ideals about India's future and about the union of diverse races in the service of the motherland. And we are sure he equally knows that the cause which he has so much at heart will not be appreciably advanced merely by eloquent exhortations based on sentimental grounds. When he talks of the "national assembly which knows no distinction of class or creed, no distinction of Hindu or Mussalman" one involuntarily feels as if the millennium were at hand. In that case we think there is hardly any need for "a joint conference of Hindu and Mussalman leaders at an early date." Clear thinking is, we presume, still a valuable asset in all discussions, and more so in politics where it is so difficult to draw the line between fact and aspiration.

About "the inequalities of the franchise" both the Chairman of the Reception Committee and the President of the Congress advanced some valid opinions. It must, however, be remembered that Lord Minto's ideal was communal rather than individual franchise. Still, it is advisable that every electorate must be fairly large and for each requisite qualifications must be fixed to get the proper number.

The President dealt with some questions of public interest in an able manner and his views in regard to Indians in South Africa and other Colonies, the Civil Service question, Commissioned posts in the Army, and Decentralization and Local Bodies would command approval and sympathy. Now that the Public Service Commission has commenced its labours in Madras the whole question within the scope of its inquiry will naturally give rise to considerable public discussion. We will have shortly to examine in detail various matters of immense public importance arising out of the inquiry and would only remark here that the Hon. Mr. Mudholkar's observations in regard to the position of Indians in the Higher Services are eminently sane and deserve the fullest consideration of Government. His opinion that local bodies should be entrusted with larger powers and greater initiative and should be "effectively popularised" equally merit attention. We, however, fail to see how the creation of "Divisional and District Advisory Boards" will add to the efficiency of district administration. The real need is not so much to "give help to these representatives of Government (District Officers and Commissioners) with advice" as the greater inclusion of Indians in the Bureaucracy, for, in the last resort, only the trained Indian administrators of high character and capacity can really serve the ends of true efficiency.

The Hon. Mr. Mudholkar made a sympathetic reference in his address to the troubles of Turkey, which we are sure will be appreciated by his Mussalman fellow countrymen. A few of the Hindu papers have taken exception to such reference and one of them—a not very candid critic of the Indian Mussalmans—has even hinted that the selection of the Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque as Chairman of the Reception Committee was ill-advised, as he devoted a considerable portion of his speech to a description of the present state of Moslem feeling in India, which was absolutely out of place in a session of the Indian National Congress. This view gives us a true measure of the position that some of the Indian Nationalists would like to assign to Mussalmans in their schemes of India's future. We hope that the future of Indian Nationalism has not been compromised by a frank expression of the feelings of an important section of the Indian people on the Congress platform. Be that as it may, the Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque made some very pertinent remarks about the grave situation in Moslem India, produced by the indifference of some of the most responsible Ministers of Great Britain towards the feelings of His Majesty's Moslem subjects. Luckily, however, as the Hon. Mr. Mazharul Haque said, "at this critical juncture two factors came in, which soothed the ruffled susceptibilities of the Moslem community. We have now at the helm of the Indian Government a Viceroy who grasped the danger and at once handled the situation with tact and sympathy. His subscription to the fund of the Red Crescent Society greatly conciliated public opinion. . . . The latest instance of this sympathy is the opening of a subscription list by her Excellency Lady Hardinge to enable the Indian ladies to subscribe. The Moslems of India can never forget all this kindness."

We have prefaced our remarks on the Banikpore session of the Congress by some general observations on its present position and on the quality of its work. We are glad to note that the President himself was conscious of the comparative sterility of result and vaguely felt the nécessité to which the whole movement was drifting. He thinks that with a change in other directions a corresponding change in the methods and procedure of the Congress has become desirable. This is a refreshingly wise and practical counsel. Our only hope is that it has fallen on receptive soil and will bring forth early fruit. The work before India's patriot is, in all conscience, enormous; and he cannot any longer afford to let his intellectual and moral resources run to waste. As the President said—

So long as the masses remain steeped in ignorance and the depressed classes are regarded as unclean so long as the mothers of families and the mistresses of households are kept without knowledge in the seclusion of the purdah, not capable of participating in intellectual pursuits or public matters, so long as class is divided against class, caste against caste, race against race, and classism and sectional selfishness away the action of the different communities, so long as true brotherly feeling and devotion to duty do not become the main guiding principles of our life, so long shall our aspirations remain mere dreams.

CORRESPONDENCE

Indian Mussalmans and Turkey.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Events in India have been happening pretty fast, and Indians in foreign countries are having quite a time in keeping track of them and doing their respective work. Reading the Mussalman papers of India one would think that the fate of the Indian Mussalmans depended on events in Persia or Turkey. It is very well to sympathize with, and send Medical Missions to, the wounded and injured Turkish soldiers. That is humanity, and no sane-minded person can take exception to that. But when it is proposed to send volunteers to fight for Turkey or subscribe for a Turkish "Dreadnaught" we are compelled to investigate the matter more thoroughly before we go on further with it. We sympathize with our co-religionists in different countries, but it would be sheer folly to help them with men and money. First it would make the position of the British Government more embarrassing and, secondly, we would be showing undue favour to a friend from whom we can expect nothing. Look to another side of the picture. The Turk has shown himself entirely unworthy of modernizing his government. The same bigotry, the same fanaticism, exists in his government now as it did years ago. The Armenians in order to build a Church in some town in Armenia have to get a sanction from the Government in Constantinople, which by the least computation takes six months! Such are the facilities under Turkish rule. Examples like this can be given ad infinitum. We in India can scarce realize it, living as we do under a modern government and enjoying at least the outward semblance of civilization. Take any of the Turkish Empire and compare it with Egypt or the newly-created monarchies in the Balkans. There is a world of difference. Then again, what business have we with Turkey or Persia? May I inquire, how much money was sent to India by Turkey or Persia during the last great famine? Their hearts were not so full of overflowing with the spirit of Islam, as ours is. They knew as well as any civilized country about the sufferings of the Indian Mussalman royals. My point is, we need all the money we have and more, and all the energy we have and more, for fighting our own battles. We do not want Persia or Turkey—we want India. The money we plan to spend for the Turkish Navy might very usefully be employed for Indian education.

In this connection, I want to point out one fact. Hindus of India are stealing one more march over the Mussalmans. They are going to foreign countries by the scores. While the Mussalmans are seemingly more busy with Balkans and Persia, than the development of India as a whole. Of the 300 Indian students in United States of America only 2 per cent. are Muhommedans. Does that show anything or prophesize anything? And when it will be too late we will be soliciting Government to make some special rule on account of our "political importance."

I know I am open to controversy on what I have said. I know as fully that there would be thousands to dispute my points. I have not the time to enter into a long controversy on this subject, nor do I wish to abuse the hospitality of your columns. I have placed my views before my co-religionists and it is for them to consider it.

[In sending this letter for publication, the writer tells us in a covering letter that "although I differ from you, I hope you will not deny me the hospitality of your columns." He is right in both and has gauged his opinion and our hospitality equally correctly. We publish his letter exactly as it was received.—Ed., Comrade.]

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Jan. 3

THE Ambassadors recommenced their deliberations with regard to the Balkans at the Foreign Office yesterday.

The Times says: "There is reason to believe that the garrison of Adrianople is very hard pressed and that negotiations have even been opened for its capitulation." In a leading article the Times says: "The big words of Dr. Daneff will not disturb the belief of well-informed persons in the success of the Conference on the basis of honourable compromise. Most friendly conversations have notoriously been proceeding daily behind the scenes of the Conference."

The representatives of the Albanian Provisional Government have arrived in London and have submitted a memorandum for the consideration of the Ambassadors advocating the inclusion in Albania of a large extent of territory, including Prevez, Janina, Monastir, Uckah, Prishtina, Mitrovitza and Ipek. The three Albanian delegates to-day conferred with Sir Arthur Nicholson at the Foreign Office on the subject of the future of Albania.

London, Jan. 4.

Owing to the Turkish delegates being again without full instructions the Peace Conference only met at six o'clock on Friday evening. The Allies presented a three fold ultimatum dealing with Adrianople, Crete and the Aegean Islands. They intimated that failing a clear and satisfactory reply thereon by four on Monday afternoon they would break off the negotiations. The Turks suggested four on Saturday afternoon and the Allies agreed. The Turks' reply is regarded as ominous and as indicating that they feel a rupture to be inevitable.

Later

It was the Turkish response to the demand made by the Allies at the last meeting for definite proposals that led to the ultimatum. The Turks proposed a boundary starting near Adrianople and leaving that city to Turkey, thence following the river Arda westward and then to Lagos Bay eastward of Thessalonica. As regards Crete the Turks proposed to renounce Turkish rights in favour of a great Power who would determine its future régime on condition that the cession of no other island was demanded.

The Allies replied regretting that the Turks ignored the result of the war, which would justify the Allies in breaking off negotiations forthwith, but as a proof of their conciliatory spirit they requested the Turks to make proposals on Monday relinquishing their rights to the Allies and ceding the Islands of the Aegean and the town of Adrianople. Otherwise negotiations would be broken off. The Turks replied as stated above.

The papers are of opinion that the Powers are bound to intervene if the Conference ends in rupture.

The arrival of M. Jonescu, Rumanian Minister of the Interior in London, has drawn attention to the relations between Bulgaria and Rumania, which are regarded at a serious factor in the crisis. It is thought possible that the Turks are speculating on the intervention of Rumania, but Bulgarians in London regard such intervention as impossible as it would inevitably embroil the Powers. M. Jonescu, who conferred with Dr. Daneff yesterday, in the course of an interview with Reuter said: "We have hitherto made sacrifices to keep peace, but we cannot give a pledge for the future." He declined to discuss reports regarding the territory Rumania had demanded from Bulgaria.

A Bucharest message states that the officers of the reserve have been ordered to prepare to join the colours at any moment. King Ferdinand, replying to an address from Sobranje, said that he still hoped that a definite understanding would result from the negotiations, but he added: "Should inevitable Divine Will decree otherwise we shall not hesitate again to resort to arms to extract from the enemy satisfaction corresponding to our just claims."

The Turkish garrison, numbering two thousand, on Chios has surrendered to the Greeks.

Reuter learns that the Turkish delegates are absolutely determined not to yield Adrianople or the Aegean Islands come what may. A rupture at to-day's Conference now seems certain.

The Times states that as a result of the conversations between Dr. Daneff and M. Jonescu it is believed that the Bulgarians on the advice of Russia are willing to concede a slightly rectified frontier, following a straight line through Silistria to the Black Sea. The Rumanians want much more, but do not contemplate a resort to arms.

London, Jan. 6.

Reuter learns that well-informed circles believe that war will not be resumed. It is felt that the Powers will and must intervene.

In an interview with Reuter's representative Dr. Daneff said that the relations between Bulgaria and Rumania were of the best. There was no reason to suppose that any question, for instance, the rectification of the frontier, would not be satisfactorily settled at the end of the war.

The Turkish fleet sailed on Saturday morning with formal order for a decisive engagement with the Greeks. A battle began off Tenedos.

An Athens telegram states that the Turkish warships Madjidyek and Hamidyek, which were recently torpedoed in the Black Sea, left the Dardanelles on Saturday morning with six destroyers. The two former engaged the Greek destroyers off Tenedos, but all withdrew to the Dardanelles on the approach of the Greek fleet.

The interference of officers at Constantinople is again threatening a political crisis. It is stated that a deputation representing 150 officers from Tchataldja has arrived there to urge the appointment of Izzet Pasha, Chief of the Staff, as Minister for War in place of Nazim Pasha.

The conferences among the peace delegates and diplomatists on Saturday and Sunday have apparently had the effect of inducing a calmer frame of mind all round. The Turks will to-day propose new concessions, and the negotiations will continue.

Both the Turkey and Allies equally appreciate the fact which the Powers have emphatically urged upon them that a resumption of hostilities will entail most dangerous complications.

The Powers will not intervene until Adrianople surrenders, which it is expected to do at the outside in ten days.

It is believed that the Turkish Government is desirous of relieving itself of responsibility before its own people by perforce yielding to united Europe.

London, Jan. 7.

The Peace Conference sat for an hour on Monday and then adjourned. The Turks presented proposals for certain cessions of territory northwards of Adrianople, but excluding that city, and also undertook to renounce their rights in Crete provided no other islands were demanded. The Allies thereupon consulted together and drafted a resolution to the effect that since the Turks had not replied satisfactorily to their last proposals they would suspend the labours of the Conference. Subsequently a general conversation occurred during which it was explained that rupture was not intended, but suspension until a more satisfactory reply, more consistent with the Allies' terms, was received. The Turks left perturbed and excited. The Allies state that there would certainly have been a rupture but for the advice of the Powers. The Balkan delegates are of opinion that the adjournment over the Orthodox Christmas will afford the Turks time to consider and submit more acceptable proposals at the next meeting, which will probably be held on Friday and possibly Thursday. In the meantime it will be possible for private negotiations to be resumed between the delegates on both sides.

The Ambassadors met at the Foreign Office to-day to consider the position arising from the indefinite postponement of the negotiation. Reuter learns that the Ambassadors are awaiting instructions with a view to settlement between the belligerents by united action. It is believed that the Powers are not opposed to the cession of Adrianople to Bulgaria.

London, Jan. 8.

In the House of Commons, Sir Edward Grey announced that the question of action by the Powers in the event of the failure of the Conference was receiving the attention of the Powers, but he was unable to make a statement as to their views or decisions until it could be made by common consent. There have been no developments regarding the Peace Conference since Tuesday. The atmosphere in diplomatic circles continues to be eminently pacific, the Powers appearing to be agreed as to the necessity for smoothing over the difficulties both between Turkey and the Allies and between Bulgaria and Rumania. It is semi-officially stated in Berlin that the Powers have decided to take immediate action in the cause of peace, and that ident-local representations will be made simultaneously in Constantinople and to the Turkish delegates in London with the object of preventing a renewal of hostilities. In an interview with Reuter's representative Dr. Dapoff said that he was confident that the Allies' demands would be accepted and peace preserved. Arrangements were concluded in London yesterday for the issue of a small short loan to relieve the immediate needs of Turkey. This is considered as indicating that the prospects of peace have improved. Nazim Pasha and Nourulughlan Pasha proceeded by special train from Constantinople yesterday to meet the Bulgarian General Savoff. They returned in the evening. Reuter learns that the conversations between Bulgaria and Rumania with reference to the rectification of the frontier are not progressing. It is understood that the Powers are exerting themselves to prevent the outbreak of a conflict. It is semi-officially denied in Sofia that an agreement has been concluded between Bulgaria and Rumania ceding to the latter a strip of territory from Olenitz to Cape Gulgud on the Black Sea, or that Bulgaria undertakes to pay an indemnity covering Rumania's military expenses. The Council of Ministers met at Constantinople yesterday and discussed the question of conferring high commands on Enver Bey and Kethi Pasha in the army at Tchataldja. The tension between the Cabinet and the Young Turkish military is senter than ever, the latter being anxious for a resumption of hostilities. Pronouncement is given in Rome to a telegram from London saying that the diplomatists believe that the Powers constituting the Triple Alliance will support the idea of the Islands of Chios, Mitylene, Kos and Rhodes in addition to the islands near Dardanelles remaining under Turkish sovereignty in order to avert the grave question of the balance of power in the Mediterranean.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

THE eagerness expressed by Bulgarian statesmen to be the peculiar friends of Turkey after peace is made shows how speedily they have thought themselves into the place of Russia. As long ago as 1802 Koutchoubey, the eminent Russian statesman, said "There are no neighbours more tranquil than the Turks, and the maintenance of these natural enemies of Russia should henceforth be the fundamental rule of our policy." Some seventy years later Bontseieff, the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, put the same idea even more epigrammatically. "Our rôle at Constantinople is much simpler than is usually believed. It consists in being always the best friend or the worst enemy of Turkey." The Bulgarians pretty clearly now see themselves the heirs of Russia where Turkey is concerned. They have been Turkey's "worst enemy," and, faithful to the inherited tradition, they are turning to the part of "the best friend."

Rome, Dec. 16.

King Victor Emmanuel has sent the following autograph letter to Signor Giolitti, the Premier —

Dear President, —

I have just given my assent to the Bill approving the Peace of Lausanne, which confirms us in the possession of Libya. I have observed with heartfelt satisfaction as an Italian and as King the admirable proof given in this memorable year by our country of its concord in its aims, serene in its faith.

In trying times you, as head of the Government, have carried out your task with a clear insight and indefatigable activity. Your grateful country renders you well-deserved honour.

Happy to express these sentiments, I press your hand with a full heart and remain,

Your affectionate cousin,

VICTOR EMMANUEL.

Constantinople.

Reports from Constantinople allege that a Cabinet crisis is impending and that the establishment of a military dictatorship under Nazim Pasha, Mahmud Sherket Pasha, and Isat Pasha is probable. Kiamul Pasha is stated to have lost all his influence and the Committee of Union and Progress to be struggling successfully to regain lost ground. Nazim Pasha is alleged to have said that the war is only now beginning.

A telegram from Aleppo says that the new sections of the Baghdad Railway from Aleppo to Hadjon, in the Armenian Mountains, and from Aleppo to Djerabulus, on the Euphrates, were opened to traffic yesterday.

The Naval Engagement.

Berlin, Dec. 18.

CAPTAIN PERSIUS, commenting in the Tageblatt on the naval engagement off the Dardanelles, declares that the Turkish navy is stronger than the Greek. The fact that it has only now ventured to leave the Dardanelles proves that, like the army, the navy was not ready for war, a fact which is especially astounding as regards the ships in commission, which included Turkey's three ironclads. "The training of the Turkish navy," the writer continues, "lay in the hands of British officers, who, indeed, seem to have been as little able to make head against Turkish mismanagement and indolence as the German army instructors."

On the other hand, Professor Ballod in the Tägliche Rundschau proves with the aid of a forest of technical arguments that the 9 2in. guns of the Greek warship "Averoff" are much more effective than the old Krupp 11in. weapons carried by the two Turkish battleships that formerly belonged to the German navy. Professor Ballod points out that as the guns of the Greek warship can fire four times in a minute, while the Turkish guns take two and a half minutes to reload, the "Averoff" alone, with proper handling of her guns, ought to have sunk the entire Turkish fleet in a quarter of an hour. That the fight lasted an hour and a half, he says, the Turks owe to the complete incompetence of their opponents in gunnery. In conclusion Professor Ballod declares that the Greek fleet and its British instructors have therefore in any case given proof of remarkable incompetence in modern naval fighting.

Turks Claim a Victory.

Constantinople, Dec. 16.

The following official despatch has been received here:—The commander of the Ottoman fleet telegraphs that a Turkish squadron went out from Dardanelles at 8-20 this morning and came into contact with the naval forces of the enemy. The squadron exchanged shots at distances varying from 3,500 to 4,500 yards. Both officers and crews displayed great resolution and exemplary courage in the fulfilment of their duty. During the fight, which lasted an hour and a half, three or four of our projectiles struck the Georgios Averoff. Her 24-centimetre guns in the bow and her starboard 19-centimetre guns were silenced. The enemy's other vessels made for the open sea after firing a few shots without result. The battle then went on with the Averoff alone, but she, too, finally joined the other ships, fleeing in the direction of the Piræus. Thanks be to God, our ships sustained no damage.

The Peace Conference.

Statement by Reshid Pasha.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, Dec. 18.

M. POINCARÉ this morning saw M. Paul Cambon, the French Ambassador in London, and afterwards received Reshid Pasha, the chief Ottoman delegate to the London Conference, who was accompanied by the Turkish Ambassador in Paris, Rifaat Pasha.

Reshid Pasha has given a statement of his views to a representative of the Temps. He said that the Turkish delegation was going to London with a sincere desire to conclude peace and put an end to a useless effusion of blood; but they were determined not to conclude peace except upon honourable terms. The military strength of Turkey was daily increasing. They had at present at Tchataldja 170,000 men abundantly supplied with ammunition, and the sanitary conditions were daily improving. He called particular attention to the fact that the cessation of hostilities was merely based upon an armistice, and that fighting would inevitably be resumed if one of the two parties attempted to impose too onerous conditions upon the other. He could not state at this stage the terms which Turkey was prepared to accept. The Ottoman Government, however, was ready to recognise in given circumstances the autonomy of Albania under the suzerainty of the Sultan, but he could not at present say anything further.

Reshid Pasha laid special stress upon the inability of Turkey to negotiate with Greece so long as Greece had not concluded an armistice on the same conditions as her allies. There was no solid basis for negotiations with Greece while a state of war continued. Engagements might be fought on land or sea which would any day alter the situation. Turkey could not be expected to treat with a State which was counting upon the chance of war to improve its diplomatic position.

TURKEY AND THE POWERS.

Turkey hoped and desired to negotiate directly with the Balkan Allies and to conclude a treaty of peace without its being necessary for the Great Powers to intervene in the discussion. If, however, the demands of the Balkan Allies were such as to make a direct agreement appear impossible, and if the Great Powers in these circumstances manifested a desire to take part in the conversations, Turkey would accept this method of procedure. He regretted that the resolute attitude of Turkey had in some quarters in France been attributed to the advice of certain Powers. In matters so grave as those with which Turkey now had to deal she could only consult her own interests, and he could give the assurance that she had not yielded and that she would not yield to any solicitations of a foreign origin. It was deplorable that these attempts were being made to discredit Turkish policy in the eyes of the French nation by representing that policy as not very friendly to France.

Demands of the Allies.

London, Dec 18.

Dr. Danef, president of the Bulgarian Sobranje and chief plenipotentiary of the Bulgarian delegation, received a London representative of the Manchester Guardian at the Ritz Hotel this evening and discussed with him a few of the chief points that will come before the Conference within the next few days. In granting this interview—the first that he has given to an English newspaper—Dr. Danef expressed his appreciation of the services rendered by the Manchester Guardian to the cause of liberty in the Balkans. The Manchester Guardian, he said, "is known throughout Bulgaria as the paper which has always been foremost in protesting against the cruelties of the Turks, and I am glad to see that it is still upholding its tradition."

Referring to what had taken place at the Conference to-day, he said that what had happened had simply been that the Turkish delegates had not received the necessary credentials from Constantinople allowing them to meet the Greeks. The Turks stated that they expected to receive the necessary instructions to-morrow, and accordingly, at their request, the Conference was adjourned until Saturday.

"We have been delayed in getting to the real business of the Conference," Dr. Danef said, "owing to those essential formalities—essential because we insist that the Allies shall conduct the negotiations en bloc. When this difficulty is got over, as I anticipate it will be without any trouble, the Bulgarians, of course with the united support of the Allies, will proceed to present their demands to Turkey. These demands may be presented on Saturday. If not, we shall have to wait until next week. If Turkey accepts our demands, all will be well. If not, the negotiations will be broken off and the war will begin again. In that case, probably, the Great Powers will find it advisable to make their recommendations to both parties. I must emphasise the fact that while the Bulgarian demands will be laid down as soon as the difficulty of credentials is settled, there will be at the same time general demands in the interests of all the Allies. We shall find a formula which embraces all the wishes of the Allies."

"The most important of our demands will be with regard to the possession of Adrianople. We shall insist upon the possession of Adrianople. We must have it, and we shall not move from our demand."

Asked whether he thought that Turkey was likely to concede Adrianople, he said that it was possible she would not be willing at first, but that eventually she would have to give way. For the present Turkey might make a strong bid for the retention of Adrianople.

Asked whether he had any information as to the length of time Adrianople was likely to hold out, Dr. Danef said that he had means of estimating the further resistance of Adrianople, but he was not able to divulge it.

Another member of the delegation who was present at the interview interposed at this point and said that they did not think that Adrianople could last much longer.

Dr. Danef went on to say that the next demand would have reference to the delimitation of the frontier between Turkey and Bulgaria, which would be eastwards from Adrianople—at this point Dr. Danef broke off and said he could not at present go into further details on that matter.

"The question of Albania," he went on, "is a question rather between the Allies and the Greek Powers than a matter of discussion between the Allies and Turkey. On this point we shall endeavour to work in concert with the Allies, while doing our utmost to remain in full accord with the Great Powers, an essential object with us, while of course our first duty is to support the demands of the Allies."

Asked to express an opinion on the points of controversy between Bulgaria and Greece, he said that for the present the Bulgarians were en bloc with the Greeks. When the general terms of peace have been decided with the Turks, then undoubtedly other questions between the Allies themselves would come up for discussion. "And I have not doubt," he continued, "that we shall be able to arrive at an amicable settlement."

"Throughout the whole controversy," he added, "we have worked together harmoniously with the Allies. Bulgaria is the centre of this action of the Allies, and Bulgaria, having entered into this common action with the other Balkan States, will continue on the same course until peace is concluded. But the first business, to which every thing else must be subordinated, is the conclusion of peace with the Turks on lines which will satisfy the Allies. "You may say," he added, "that the rumour in some of the newspapers that the Bulgarians have any intention of deserting the Allies in order to join the Triple Alliance is not true." It is an absurd report."

Arrangements at St. James's Palace.

The rooms in St. James's Palace in which the Peace Conference is to be held are now ready for that purpose. The delegates will be accompanied by their secretaries and military and legal advisers, and altogether those who will be concerned, directly or indirectly, in the negotiations number about 40. While the Conference lasts they will live at various hotels in London, but arrangements have been made to provide lunch and tea in the Palace on each day of meeting.

An opportunity was given yesterday, through the courtesy of the Lord Chamberlain's Department, of making an inspection of the rooms. The delegates will confer in the Picture Gallery. From its walls the Kings and Queens of England, from Henry VIII, the founder of the Palace, to Queen Victoria, look down upon the long table where the questions at issue are to be decided. Upon this table portfolios will be arranged for all the delegates, each of them bearing the Royal Arms and stamped "St. James's Palace," and the Privy Council have lent six massive silver inkstands which were presented to that body by Charles II. A Tudor fireplace, with the ancestral bearings of Queen Elizabeth, is one of the chief ornaments of the room, but otherwise it lacks the handsome furnishings of the other apartments, and wears at present a business aspect well fitted for the purpose for which it is to be employed. It is the most secluded apartment in the Palace, side tables are provided for clerks and shorthand writers, and large easels have been placed at one side for the reception of maps of the disputed territories.

Two other rooms, the Armoury and the Tapestry Room, have been reserved as subsidiary conference rooms, to which delegates may retire in order to discuss questions of special interest to their particular group. The walls of the Armoury are covered with suits of armour and old weapons, and the Tapestry Room, which contains some fine Mortlake tapestries of the period of Charles II, is interesting as the room whence the Sovereign is proclaimed and presented to the public. The secretaries of the delegates have been apportioned a large room overlooking St. James's Park, known as Queen Anne's Drawing Room, the walls of which are hung with paintings by Reynolds, Lely, and Van Dyck.

The remaining rooms of the suite are reserved for relaxation. Adjoining the Picture Gallery is the Banqueting Hall of the Palace, now very rarely used for festive purposes, where the delegates and their advisers will take luncheon. Its walls are hung with old battle pictures. On the first day of the Conference luncheon will be served in the Entrée Room which is also set aside as a drawing room, and tea will be served here. This apartment, which gives access on five days to the Throne Room, is one of the handsomest rooms in the Palace. It looks on to St. James's Park, the carpet and walls are rose-red, and the pictures include portraits of famous admirals by Reynolds and Hoppner, and a painting of William IV. in State robes by Sir Martin Archer-Shee. — The Times.

The Young Turks.

The Constantinople correspondent of the St. Petersburg Retk recently paid a visit to Haladjian Effendi, the Young Turkish ex-Minister of Public Works, at the prison of the Ministry of War, where he was confined together with a number of his colleagues and leaders of the Committee. The interview was a prolonged one, and was attended by several other inmates of the prison. Most of the ex-Ministers viewed their arrest philosophically, and described the charge of conspiracy which was levelled at them as preposterous.

"The court-martial," they said, "consisted exclusively of members of the Military League, who were bent on destroying the Young Turkish party. Only three days previously it had been decided to exile all of them to Konia. When the prisoners applied to the Minister of the Interior for a public trial the reply they got was that he knew nothing of the affair, which was within the competence of the military authorities. On the whole the attitude of the civil authorities was decidedly sympathetic. At first the idea was to get up a ceremonial trial, and an examining magistrate was charged with the duty of taking the prisoners' evidence. The magistrate in the course of the examination frankly admitted that he was only discharging his duty, having personally nothing against the prisoners. The examination supplied no basis for a legal trial. Thereupon the court-martial took the affair into its own hands, and decided to transport them to Konia. But in the course of those three days circumstances changed radically. The arrests of the Young Turks caused great commotion in the army. The officers openly proclaimed their intention of abandoning the Tophaldiya trenches and marching on Constantinople should the prisoners not be released. Nazim Pasha himself severely condemned the policy of the old gang and the Military League. The Government realised that the army was still in favour of the Young Turks, and that to destroy the leaders of the party would not mean the destruction of the movement itself. Thereupon it issued an order dismissing the old members of the court-martial, with the exception of the president, and appointing new members in their place who did not belong to any party. The president came to the prisoners and stated that their case, in his opinion, had been unduly 'inflated' wherefore he hoped that their release would soon be ordered. The date of the letter is not given by the Reich, but all the Young Turkish leaders have now been released.

The correspondent states that the interview lasted till evening. At last an officer entered, and respectfully stopped at a distance. Haladjian Effendi looked at him. The officer courteously observed that the gates were about to be closed, and that he would be obliged if the interview could be brought to an end. "In a moment, sir," said Haladjian. "I am not your sir," observed the officer, "I shall be the first to rejoice when you are let out."

"It is characteristic," writes the Constantinople correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt, "of the change of feeling at Constantinople in favour of the Young Turks that the ex-General Sherif Pasha has decided to go back to Paris, as his agitation against the Young Turks has no prospect of success. On Saturday Talaat Bey, who the day before had been arrested by mistake and then released, had a long interview with Nazim Pasha, and then Enis Ayni, a former officer and a much-respected leader of the committee, who had likewise been imprisoned was invited by Nazim Pasha for consultation. These meetings are very significant and cause considerable comment."

Kiamil's Power Failing.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung states that the Porte is determined not to yield Adrianople and Kirk-Kiliseh, and that it will insist on the autonomy of both Macedonia and Albania under Ottoman Governors General. The view both at the Porte and in the European Embassies is that the London Conference will soon arrive at a deadlock, and that a renewal of the war is almost inevitable. Hence the busy military preparations on the part of the Turkish Government and the delay of the Great Powers in withdrawing their warship from the Bosphorus.

The correspondent adds:—"In the midst of this tension the domestic factors are working with increasing force. The star of the Grand Vizier Kiamil is beginning to pale. Kiamil is unable to keep his promise, and the failure of British help is one of the most bitter disappointments of his life. His temper is now despairing. He has frequent quarrels even with most intimate friends, such as Jamal-ed-Din, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and the attitude of the Generalissimo, Nazim Pasha, is contributing towards the rehabilitation of the Opposition party—that is, the Committee. It is to the progressing weakness rather than to a sense of justice that the fact must be attributed that almost all the Committee leaders have now been released from prison. Should the Government not exhibit sufficient backbone in the course of the London negotiations it will speedily be set aside by the military party. Already Mahmud Sherkes and Ismet Pashas are regarded here as the coming men."

The Problem of Salonica.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, Nov. 16.

RELATION between the Bulgarian and Greek armies are far from amicable, and the fact that more serious developments have not occurred is due to the pacific intervention of M. Stancioff, the Bulgarian Minister in Paris, who is attached to the suite of the Crown Prince Boris.

It was not until November 7 that the Greeks commenced their serious advance, the army proceeding along the railway from Kirdjalar to Tekeli. While their headquarters remained at Topzin the Seventh Division by 2 p. m. on November 8 arrived at a point five miles from Salonica. At 5 p. m. the same evening two Greek officers and ten men entered Salonica, but the actual entry of the Greek troops occurred at 10 o'clock the following morning.

In the meantime the Bulgarians in three columns were approaching Salonica from the north-east. At 8 p. m. on November 8 the Bulgarian infantry and artillery commenced a battle with the Turks near Aivali, which continued until 9 p. m. At 2 a. m. on November 9 they advanced in two columns and occupied Aivali. At 9 a. m. the Turkish artillery opened fire and the battle continued until 3 p. m., when the Bulgarians had pursued the Turks up to a point less than two miles from Salonica. An envoy was then sent to demand the surrender of the city, but it was found that the Greeks were already in possession.

The Greeks now refused to allow the Bulgarians to enter the town with the result that the Crown Prince Boris and his brother Prince Cyril were obliged to sleep under the bridge of Aivali. An ultimatum was then sent to the Greeks, who were given to understand that the Bulgarians intended to enter the town by force, with the result that the Greeks abandoned their opposition. The Bulgarians together with a Serbian contingent came in directly after King George, having been kept outside for 24 hours. It will be observed that the Bulgarians were fighting the Turks on Friday evening; this was undoubtedly the cannonade heard that evening which was attributed to the Greeks. There was a further engagement on the morning of the 9th. This seems strange in the face of the Greek assertion that the Turks capitulated on the 8th, but Hassan Tahsia Pasha informs me that the draft only was prepared on the evening of the 8th, and that the capitulation was signed on the morning of the 9th. Further proof that the capitulation was not a fait accompli until Saturday is supplied by the fact that during the night of Friday the Turks were still digging trenches for the defence of the town.

The Greeks express discontent with the action of the Bulgarians in the town after the occupation by them, but the Bulgarians claim that they were on the spot and could have entered at the same time as their allies had they not been kept outside. They also complain of the action of the Greeks in hoisting only the Greek flag, in issuing proclamations in the name of King George only, in ignoring the Bulgarian language in proclamation, and in not providing barrack accommodation—in short, in acting as if the town belonged to them.

The incidents between the two armies are too numerous to recite in a telegram. Relations were further complicated by the action of the Greek authorities in seizing a locomotive while it was being driven from Seres by a Bulgarian officer and in placing sentries to guard the railway to Seres, which town was occupied by the Bulgarians. In consequence of these proceedings the Bulgarians addressed an ultimatum to the Greeks demanding the release of the locomotive and the recall of the sentries under threats of disarming the sentries by force. The Bulgarians suspected the Greeks of endeavouring to interfere with their arrangements for transport and food supplies and thus compel them to give the Greeks an excuse for requesting the retirement from Salonica owing to difficulties of commissariat. Eventually the Bulgarian regiment returned to Kukush.

Another incident arose from an attempt of the Greeks to seize the mosque of Saint Sofia, of which the Bulgarians had taken possession in order to provide accommodation for their troops. The Greeks interpreted this as indicating a desire on the part of their allies to dedicate the mosque to the Bulgarian church. The Bulgarians were forced on two occasions to drive the Greek troops away. The Bulgarians declared that they were not here to seize mosques or churches, but to defeat the enemy, and that they considered the ultimate right to occupy them a question for diplomacy. Further annoyance was caused them by the appointment of Prince Nicholas as Military Commandant de place. The Bulgarians for their part recognize only the authority of their own general. Their army of occupation here is 36,000 men with 108 guns, and the Greek forces are about equal.

Bulgarian Movement.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, Dec. 11.

The report that the 30,000 Bulgarian troops which were recently despatched on board Greek transports to Thessalonica are to return here has caused great concern among the population. The misfortunes attending the previous concentration in Salonica of enormous masses of troops are not forgotten, and it is earnestly hoped that the Bulgarian Government will be able to find a more convenient resting place. There is no suitable accommodation available, and it is further feared that the troops may bring cholera with them, which, in view of the present over-crowded condition of the town, would be a fearful calamity.

The proposals for the return of the refugees into the districts now occupied by the Bulgarians have fallen through owing to the opposition of the Bulgarian authorities who, I understand, have decided that no Mussulmans shall be allowed to return to these villages.

Further Greco-Bulgarian friction has arisen owing to the appointment of the Bulgarian Komitadj Damboulakoff as Governor of Langaza. It appears that the Bulgarian troops passed through on November 26, but did not occupy the town or hoist their flag. On the following day Greek troops entered the town and formally occupied it. On November 29 Damboulakoff arrived at the head of Bulgarian troops and ordered out the Greeks. On this point it is probable that Greece will have to give way. There is continual friction between the two States over a variety of incidents, some important, others unimportant. The Bulgarians do not mince matters, with the result that the Greeks find themselves consistently obliged to give way in order to avoid serious trouble.

Greek Accusations Against the Bulgarians.

Athens, Dec. 13.

The following Greek semi-official telegram from Salonica is published here:—

The detailed inquiry with regard to excesses and crimes committed by the Bulgarian army shows that they constitute a cause for the disturbances reported during the first days after the surrender of Salonica. According to this inquiry the excesses of the Bulgarians can be divided into three categories—1, damage to property; 2, crimes against the life and honour of private persons, especially Turks; and 3, offences—and these were the less frequent—due to misconceived political interest.

In the majority of cases Bulgarian soldiers and peasants gave themselves up to pillaging. At Vassilika, Agiaparaskovi, Apostola, Alibattalar, Seros, Langada, Avestohri, Bararitzza, Tohandi, Karaburnu, Vardar, Doiran, and Salonica pillaging and thefts of all kinds were committed, the stolen articles including horses, goats, sheep, barley, hay, jewels and other articles of value, large sums of money, carpets, furniture, clothes, and arms. Attacks were made on Austrian subjects, and the Austrian Consulate in consequence lodged an energetic protest. Unspeakable outrages were committed at Seros and at the other towns and villages mentioned above. At Doiran, despite the protests of the municipality, the Bulgarians seized and imprisoned the rich Turkish residents, who, after having secured their liberty by the payment of enormous ransoms, were ambushed by the Bulgarians and massacred, 60 of them being killed.

The political crimes were of little importance, as the greater number of the Bulgarians ardently desire the maintenance of the Balkan Alliance, especially a Greco-Bulgarian Entente, safeguarding their political interests.

King Ferdinand's Visit.

Salonica, Dec. 18.

Considerable mystery surrounded the arrival of King Ferdinand to-day, every attempt being made to keep dark the approaching visit. Even the Greek Royal Family were ignorant until yesterday evening that his Majesty was coming. No greater precision marked the time of arrival. King George was at the station to receive the Royal guest at 8-30 in the morning, when the hour of arrival was put back until 5 p. m. At 2-30 I received an intimation from a highly-placed personage that the Bulgarian Monarch would arrive between 4 and 6. As a matter of fact, the train bearing his Majesty arrived in at 3 o'clock, when no member of the Greek Royal Family was present. A guard-of-honour was provided by the 14th Bulgarian Regiment. King Ferdinand immediately proceeded in a motor-car to the Bulgarian Consulate, now the residence of Prince Boris and Prince Cyril, and met the Greek Crown Prince and Prince Nicholas en route. On arriving at the Consulate he was received by the Bulgarian Archbishop, who pronounced a short discourse and then presented the leading members of the community. Afterwards the Greek Prince, who followed up the carriage, had an audience. King Ferdinand, who will maintain a strict incognito during his visit, is supposed to remain here four or five days.

Dec. 19.

King Ferdinand called upon the King of the Hellenes yesterday evening, and the visit was returned this morning. The conversations were marked by the cordiality customary on such occasions, but no discussions of political importance have yet occurred.

According to information from a well-informed source, considerable discord continues to exist between the Veskivists, who claim Macedonia for Bulgaria, and the party whose cry is "Macedonia for the Macedonians," the latter of which includes Sandanaky and numerous Macedo-Bulgarian officers. In the Melnik region a clash between the two parties is anticipated after the declaration of peace.

The Albanian Problem.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, Dec. 17.

THE question of Albania is now arousing lively interest in Vienna and Budapest. While the idea of creating a neutral and independent Albania is warmly supported in some quarters, the acceptance of an international guarantee for Albania is vigorously criticized by writers like Baron Louis Doczi who was one of Count Andrassy's secretaries at the Congress of Berlin. Baron Doczi demands that Austria-Hungary should act in defence of her interest on her own account without regard for other Powers.

Alluding recently to the prospects of the meeting of Ambassadors in London, an experienced Ottoman diplomatist observed that the crux of the meeting will lie in the extent to which Austria-Hungary will support the idea of a big Albania. Some Albanians tend to claim as Albania a part of the Sanjak of Novi Bazar and the territory included within a line drawn from Mitrovitzza to Priishtina, Uskub, and southwards to Monastir. Any such boundary would naturally exclude Servia from the greater part of Old Servia and would cut a considerable slice off the territory allotted to Bulgaria by the Treaty of San Stefano. The idea of a big Albania possesses at least historical importance, inasmuch as attempts to realize it are believed to have decided the Balkan States to hasten their action against Turkey. They seem to have feared that recognition by Turkey of Albanian autonomy in accordance with the principles of decentralization recommended by Count Berchtold's proposal to the Powers might prejudice the claims of Servia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Montenegro to the eventual acquisition of Turkish territory. The rising among the Mussulman Albanians of the North-East last spring, the meeting of the tribesmen at Priishtina and their march southwards to Uskub together with the acceptance of most of their demands by the Ottoman Government seem to have convinced the Balkan Governments that no time was to be lost if the Balkan question were ever to be solved in accordance with their desires. Hence the rapid conclusion of their alliance and their victorious onslaught upon Turkey.

THE QUESTION OF BOUNDARIES.

Although Balkan victories appear to have placed the formation of a big Albania beyond the scope of practical politics there remain the grave questions of the delimitation of Albania and of its organization as a separate polity. Until the boundaries of Albania are fixed at least roughly principles like those of Albanian independence or Albanian autonomy can have little practical meaning. Without definite geographical boundaries and without administrative and financial organization there can be no Albanian State. At present no such organization exists save perhaps embryonically in the provisional Government established by Ismail Kemal Bey and his associates. Under the Turkish administration the Albanian vilayets were always a charge upon the Exchequer. For some years to come it is probable that this deficit will continue. Whether the cost of administrative organization be met by loan or by annual subsidy from the Great Powers it is evident that the smaller the area of autonomous Albania the lighter will be the charges both upon its population and upon the foreign sponsors of the new State.

There remain the intrinsic difficulties of finding a form of government acceptable alike to the Gheg-speaking Catholics and Mussulmans of the North and the Tosk-speaking Mussulmans, Bektashes, and Orthodox Albanians of the South. The great mountain range, Mali-i-Grabe, that runs East and North-East through the centre of Albania divides the country so completely that there is practically no communication between South and North except along the strip of coastland between the mouth of the Shkumbi and Durazzo. So complete is the segregation of the various categories of Albanians that some authorities favour the creation of three, if not four, separate autonomous. Others again urge that to create a Catholic autonomy in the North would be merely to establish a sort of Albanian Montenegro under Austrian influence, while to create an Orthodox autonomy in the South would be to prepare a special sphere of Greek influence. Italian interests would then demand the exercise of Italian control over Avlona and the central Albanian coast. The likelihood of local discord and of international rivalry would therefore be greatly increased. It is therefore suggested by travellers acquainted with the whole of Albania that the least undesirable solution of the problem would be the establishment of some central authority over a restricted Albania, situated rather in accordance with geographical facts than with ethnic considerations.

The limits of such an Albania would, according to these authorities, lie between the mouth of the White Drin below San Giovanni di Medua on the North and the mouth of the River Kalamas opposite the island of Corfu on the South. Its southern boundary would follow the course of the Kalamas inland and run North-East to the Grammos Ridge. Thence, following the watershed between the lake of Ochrida and the Adriatic, it would strike the Drin south of Dibra. The course of the Drin would constitute the remaining boundary. It is urged by the partisans of an Albania thus delimited that it would confine the Albanian problem proper within practicable limits. It would, moreover, permit the definition of the principle of Albanian independence in such manner as not to conflict with the legitimate claims of the Balkan Allies.

INTERNAL ORGANIZATION.

As regards internal organization it is urged that the first necessity would be the establishment and maintenance of order. For this purpose an efficient Gendarmerie would have to be created under officers not belonging to any Great Power. The employment of Italian and Austro-Hungarian officers would inevitably lead to friction; and, like the Austro-Prussian condominium in Schleswig-Holstein, might end in war. It appears, indeed, desirable that the Great Powers should refrain from direct management of or interference with Albanian affairs, and should exercise their control vicariously, possibly through subjects of neutral States.

The construction of roads and railways is an indispensable condition of Albanian development. As far as railway routes have been surveyed, it is stated that the least impracticable would run from Durazzo to the mouth of the Mat River, whose course it would follow to the source, whence through a tunnel it would reach the Zeta, a tributary of the Drin, and descend the Zeta to Dibra. Thence the line would follow the Radika to Gollitchuk, and from Gollitchuk would follow the Vardar to Uskub.

The problem needs to be approached in a practical spirit and with a determination to expose the "most interested Powers" to as little temptation as possible.

British Red Crescent Society's Appeal.

THE appalling number of Turkish sick and wounded that have come back from the front or are lying on the battlefield, are taxing to the utmost the Turkish Hospital arrangements, with the result that many are left untreated; and even if the war ends within a reasonable limit of time, they will need all possible help to alleviate their sufferings. His Majesty's Minister at Sofia also informs the British Red Crescent Society through the Foreign Office that there are many Turkish sick and wounded lying at Sofia and Philippopolis.

Only those who know Turkey can form any sort of conception of the enormous amount of suffering the present war is involving on thousands of helpless and innocent families: it is not the soldiers only who suffer, but even the inhabitants of the districts where war is raging, but the homes all over the empire whence all the men and boys have been taken to fight their country's battles. It seems hopeless to make any adequate attempt to deal with the vast amount of suffering, suffering that the approach of winter, when most of the country is under snow, renders all the heavier, but it is incumbent on us in the name of humanity to do all that lies in our power to mitigate it in however small a degree.

The British Red Crescent Society has already sent to Turkey one Hospital under the direction of Colonel Surtees, C.B., M.V.O., D.S.O., consisting of two surgeons, three doctors, six lady nurses and four orderlies; and proposes to send another as soon as funds permit, to attend to the sick and wounded and to relieve to some extent the general distress and destitution.

The undersigned on behalf of the Committee of the Society earnestly appeal to all who have pity for human suffering, for further funds to carry out the work of mercy in which it is engaged.

Donations may be sent to the Bankers of the Society, Messrs. Coutts & Co., 440, Strand, W.C., or to the Honorary Treasurer Mr. A. S. M. Ark, 9, Fenchurch Avenue, E.C.

The Aims and Policy of Serbia.

A Correspondent in close touch with the Serbian Prime Minister telegraphed to the Times as follows:—

I am authorized by Monsieur Pashitch, the Serbian Prime Minister, to communicate the following statement:—

At this time, when there seems so much misapprehension concerning the aims and policy of Serbia, I think that it is very necessary that the people of England should know exactly how things really are and thus be able to avoid being deceived by the efforts of ill-informed or unfriendly persons. Serbia desires especially that England should know the true situation, since that country not only helped Serbia to obtain her independence, but has always been the model upon which the liberal and democratic institutions of Serbia have been created and developed. I feel certain, therefore, that England better than any other nation will be able to appreciate Serbian policy and Serbian national necessities.

While we are anxious to preserve the most friendly relations with all other nations, near or far, we cannot depart from the principle that national needs must always dominate the policy of a Liberator nation anxious to develop normally. International concessions, and even friendships, must never be allowed to destroy the possibility of accomplishing the national destiny. The past has shown us that independence of trade and economic liberty are necessary for Serbia's development, and even for her existence. Since the moment, some years ago, that our economic independence was partially secured, the progress of the country has been so marked as to leave no doubt possible in our minds that Serbia must have complete economic independence and an outlet to the sea which shall be under no control save her own, after the sacrifices which she has made and which she may still be called upon to make.

It is the obvious truth that Serbia's desires are based upon no exaggerated ideas of possible aggrandizement nor can they in any sense be regarded simply as a basis for compromise. Serbian arms have conquered far more territory than Serbia intends to retain, but Serbian policy has established a minimum of territorial expansion which does no more than cover her national and her national necessities. For this minimum Serbia is prepared to make every sacrifice, since not to do so would be to be false to her national duty. No Serbian statesman or Government dare betray the future welfare of the country by considering for a moment even the abandonment of this minimum. Serbia's minimum requires to her national development is economic independence, save, possibly, in so far as regards a Customs union with her allies and a free and adequate passage to the Adriatic Sea on the Adriatic coast. It is essential that Serbia should possess about 80 kilometres from Athens to Durazzo. This corridor would be joined to what was formerly Old Serbia approximately by the territory between a line from Durazzo to Ochrida Lake in the south, and one from Athens to Djakova in the north.

History might be cited to show that Serbia's claims extend much further southwards. Indeed, Albania belonged to Serbia formerly until conquered by the Turks. The anarchy prevailing in Albania would seem to indicate that the whole country would be better off under the liberal régime of an established Government; but we do not ask for anything more than our national necessities demand. The future of Albania south of the Durazzo-Ochrid Lake line can well be left to the Powers to decide its destiny, although we feel strongly that it will be in the interests neither of the Albanians nor of Europe if autonomy be insisted on. The reports of Austrians and Italian Generals and of travellers such as Hahn, Steinhilber, Barbauld whose testimony cannot be suspected of Serbian leanings, show a deplorable state of affairs existing in Albania. The percentage of deaths by violence in Albania ranges from 80 to 75 of the total population. Europe may condemn the Albanians to continue in this state, but Serbia has a very manifest duty to alleviate Serbians from a continuance of such conditions. In the territories between Djakova, Athens, Durazzo, and Ochrida live about 10 per cent. of the 150,000 inhabitants are Serbians. More than half of the Albanian inhabitants are Christians, including the Mirdites. Austrian and Italian observers such as Hahn and Steinhilber admit that the Albanians in this district are of ancient Serbian origin, and to-day they possess many purely Serbian customs, such as the laws and blood brotherhood. Under Serbian rule they will enjoy the fullest liberty, schools in their own language, religious freedom, and security for life and property to a degree they have never yet known.

The communal laws of Serbia, which will come into force in the new regions acquired and apply to Albanians and Serbians alike from the most democratic system of local government known in Europe. Not only are minorities adequately represented in government and council, but the communal authorities in the judicial courts are the majority of minor classes. In regard of religious liberty in Servian territory to-day the Muhammadan priests are better treated than were the Orthodox, since the former receive from the State a fixed salary, whereas the latter's revenue varies considerably. It is probable that, so far from the Albanians in Servian territory being forced to emigrate, numbers will come in from Southern Albania. To-day in Servia Muhammadans and Albanians live peaceably and happily, and in the newly acquired territories, although these are fresh from the passage of the victorious Servian armies, all races and religions are settling down peaceably and contentedly under the new administration. The reforms set forth and promised in the Berlin Treaty, which were a dead letter until the present war, are now more than accomplished in the new Servian territories. In a few weeks there need, therefore, be no anxiety as to the future welfare of the Albanians, who will become Servian subjects in the accomplishment of Servia's national necessity of an outlet to the Adriatic Sea.

Not only will the Adriatic outlet enable Servia to have freedom of export and import, it will give her new neighbours, since every maritime nation will then be Servia's neighbour as much as Austria is to-day. This is especially true of England, and Servia rejoices that the period of lack of direct contact with England and English institutions will now come to an end. From Servia's new and growing ports steamers will go to the established ports of England, weaving closer every day the web of friendship and mutual advantage between the two peoples. This point of contact with England, secured by England's command of the seas, realizes for Servia one of her dearest and most lasting desires, which will enable her to develop freely and liberally, encouraged and stimulated by the freedom and justice of England. It is this desire for future and increasing relations with the nations of the West, and especially England, which makes it impossible for Servia to consider even for a moment the giving of any special economic advantages to any specific nation. To do so would not only prejudice her economic future, but would force Servia to place England and other nations at a disadvantage. This Servia will not consent to, any more than she will abandon her just outlet to the Adriatic. Servia cannot conceive that her settled determination on these points, which she is prepared to defend by all means in her powers, can be considered by any foreign Government as other than necessary for the well-being of Servia and dictated by a very real desire for permanent European peace and equal opportunities for all nations desiring to enter into economic relations with her.

Friendly with all nations, the enemy of none, but before all things true to her national needs and consistently following out those liberal ideas learned from England, Servia does not fear criticism and will not draw back before interested threats. Although at war, Servia has never proclaimed martial law, nor has there been any check upon the freedom of the Press in this democratic land. It is open to all to criticize freely and to denounce to the world whatever they may think wrong in Servia's policy, but we do not with all this unfettered criticism see anything which can make us alter our settled conviction that Servia's cause is national and just. I am convinced that all nations whose eyes are not obscured by interested desires will be with Servia in her determination to achieve her legitimate development.

A Genuine Book Bargain.The Mameluke of Slave Dynasty of Egypt from 1260-1517 A. D.

[When the Caliphs of Baghdad were no longer able to retain the territories, conquered by their predecessors, they bought multitudes of Slave from the Tribes of Central Africa and trained them as soldiers to fight their battles. The same policy was pursued in Egypt by the Fatimide Caliphs, and after them by the Fyrukite dynasty. The military slaves thus introduced were called Mamelukes. They soon began to lord it over the native inhabitants, and from them arose the Sultans who governed Egypt for two and a half centuries].

DEAR SIRS,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

if Britain lent money freely and gave all possible support to the Persian Government and Swedish gendarmery.

"Nobody understanding the risks of direct intervention has the slightest desire to see a move made while a European crisis is still pending except under the most imperative necessity. In any case a punitive expedition is not the way to deal with the difficulty. A British force entering Persia would have to go, not to chase elusive freebooters in a welter of mountains, but to keep open roads and hold the main centres of population. It could not soon withdraw and possibly never. Remembering the heavy task of holding India with a force none too adequate, the prospect is one from which the stoutest heart may shrink, but if Britain declines to tackle South Persia, some other Power will do the work we reject. We can not expect for ever to keep the Gulf inviolate by empty declarations. We do not say the time has finally come to undertake such responsibility, that is for the Government to decide, and we fear any intervention may have a tendency to spread, but it is just possible that a limited experiment might have substantial result. Those knowing the country believe that if Britain decided to keep open a single road from the coast to Shiraz and Isfahan, the whole of Southern Persia might become quieter and tribesmen elsewhere might cease depredations lest they also should feel the weight of British power. One thing is certain, that Southern Persia cannot long continue in its present state and there is not the slightest hope of regeneration from within.

London, Jan. 13.

The Persian Foreign Minister visited the British Minister at Teheran on Saturday and said that Government was sincerely anxious to improve the trade routes of Southern Persia, but that the embarrassments of the finances paralysed its efforts.

The murder of Captain Eckford had furnished Government with a fresh incentive to finish once and for all the question of policing the routes, and he submitted to the Minister a scheme drawn up by Colonel Hjalmarsen, head of the Gendarmery, to organise besides fixed posts for gendarmes flying columns to be stationed at Bushire, Dorasjun, Kazerun, Shiraz, Dehbid and Yazdikhast.

The scheme suggested the organisation and maintenance for three years of a force of 1,796 men at an estimated cost of £850,000, only half of which would be needed immediately. He asked the British Minister to obtain an advance from Britain of the money, which would be placed entirely at the disposal of Colonel Hjalmarsen. The Gendarmery would thus encounter no financial difficulties in the execution of the task.

The Premier, Sainassam-es-Sultaneh, had definitely resigned, and the new Cabinet of Ala-es-Sultaneh, not containing the Bakhtiari element, will assume office as soon as the Regent's authorisation arrives.

London, Jan. 15.

Replying to Mr. Hoare in the House of Commons Sir Edward Grey said that he was well aware of the difficulties of the Persian Persia.

News of the Week.

London, Jan. 9.

Baroness to Mr. Morrell in Commons, Sir Edward Grey said that it was improbable that powers would be willing to make a loan to Persia in the absence of a strong, stable Persian Government. Therefore the British and Russian Governments were striving for the formation of such a Government, but the attempt of Shed-ed-Dowleh to form a Government were not being encouraged.

Colonel Yate drew attention to the outrages on British subjects and property in Persia and suggested the formation of a strong body of Persian levies under British and Indian officers to assist the Swedish gendarmery.

Mr. Grey replied that the Imperial Government fully realised the unsatisfactory state of affairs, and was urgently considering what steps could be taken, though there were difficulties, financial and otherwise, in adopting at present the course which was suggested.

London, Jan. 10.

The Times in an article on the situation in Persia says: "Things are going from bad to worse, and will continue so even gendarmerie owing to the irregularity and insufficiency of its pay. The Imperial Government had advanced a further sum of £15,000 in December for the requirements of the Government of Persia.

Sir E. Grey said that he was now considering what more could be done to assist the Gendarmerie, reports of whose efficiency owing to the direction of the Swedish officers had impressed Government favourably.

The Murder of Captain Eckford.

REPLYING to British representations regarding the murder of Captain Eckford, Persia has expressed her boundless grief and has promised to make adequate reparation. The Governor-General of Persia has sent a long telegram to his Government explaining the circumstances of Captain Eckford's death. He admits that the party went out with his consent. The road had been safe for two months and there was no reason to anticipate what occurred. Captain Eckford was shot while riding between the advanced guard of gendarmes and a caravan, which his party had overtaken. The caravan itself appears to have been the main object of attack. The Governor suggests that the Governor of Behbahan, who is a Bakhtiari, should be sent with two thousand followers to assist in punishing the guilty.

Great Britain has officially requested reparation for the death of Captain Eckford, and severe punishment of the guilty. If Persia is powerless it will be incumbent on Great Britain to take steps to obtain reparation.

The Persian Minister in London has been instructed to convey the sympathy of his Government to the relatives of Captain Eckford.

The Swedish officer commanding the gendarmerie at Shiraz reports that the gendarmes escorting Captain Eckford behaved excellently and eventually saved the situation. He adds that this view is shared by Captain Eckford's English companions. The Swedish officers in Teheran are expediting preparations to send a force to Persia.

The Persian Minister called at the Foreign Office to-day. It is understood that he conveyed his Government's deep regret at the Eckford outrage.

The Persian Minister called on the 17th December on Sir Arthur Macpherson, Captain Eckford's nearest relative in England, and expressed his condolences. The Persian Government thoroughly realises the gravity of the situation, and officially declares that it will spare no effort immediately to suppress brigandage of the Bushire-Shiraz route. It is understood that the Bakhtiari chiefs will defray the expenses of the expedition and the Bakhtiari Governors of Luristan and Behbahan have been ordered to place themselves and their men entirely at the disposal of Mukhibir-us-Sultaneh, who is confident, if allowed a month to complete his preparations, that he will succeed in executing signal vengeance on the Boorah Madis.

The Consul-General for Persia in Calcutta has received the following official communication from the Foreign Office, Teheran, regarding the murder of Captain Eckford:—

"The road had been quite safe for the last two months, order prevailed, and caravans passed unmolested. Two English officers, with a number of Indian sowars, were accompanying a caravan, which was under the charge of a number of gendarmes cavalry, troops and guns on a shooting excursion. Between Khamzanijan and Deshtarian, Captain Eckford, one of the two officers, left the caravan and proceeded in advance and was shot by robbers who intended looting the caravan.

"The Persian Government has expressed its regrets and sorrow to the British Minister at Teheran and the Cabinet is doing its best to make due preparation. A large force has left Shiraz to punish the culprits. Stringent telegraphic orders have been sent to Sirdar Jung and the Governor of Koziloro to surround the marauders from all sides in order to give them proper punishment."

The Woes of Persia.

THE Honorary Secretary to the Persia Committee, Mr. Frederick Whelen, has sent the following communication to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs:—"At a meeting of the Persia Committee, held at the House of Commons on Monday, I was desired to draw your attention to the persistent attempts which are being made under Russian inspiration to overthrow the existing form of Government in Persia and to bring about the restoration of the ex-Shah. In this connection I have the honour to enclose two documents containing information which has reached this Committee from reliable sources. The first has reference to the steps which are being taken to restore the ex-Shah, and the second contains some account of the antecedents of his henchman, Saad-ed-Dowleh.

"My Committee feel that there can be no improvement in the condition of Persia while these repeated and determined attacks upon her Government and institutions are being organised under the protection of her powerful neighbour on the North. The Persian Government is a Constitutional Monarchy, and both Great Britain and Russia have given to that Government pledges of the most solemn and binding character that they will do nothing to hinder it in the task of internal re-organisation. Yet not only are suggestions made to the Persian Government that the summoning of the Mejlis, which is long overdue, would create the worst impression in Russia, but the authority of the Ministers who are faithful to the Constitution is being constantly undermined. Under circumstances such as these it can scarcely arouse wonder if the country is drifting into anarchy.

"I have the honour to submit, on behalf of my Committee, that any delay in dealing with this precarious situation may lead to results disastrous to vital British interests. The Parliament is such an important factor in the Persian Constitution that the machinery of Government cannot function while it is in abeyance. The obstacles which have been raised to the summoning of a new Parliament, as provided by law, should therefore be removed at once. Whatever may be said for or against the past action of Parliament, it would be difficult to deny that it has proved itself a jealous guardian of the liberties of Persia as a nation. If the Russian Government or that of Great Britain, having important interests in Persia, should desire to suggest changes in the Constitution of a nature to provide for its more harmonious operation, we feel sure that the Parliament, which alone has power to introduce such changes, would, when convened, carry them into effect, provided that they did not reduce the Parliament to practical nullity in the important affairs of State.

"The continued presence of the Russian troops in Northern Persia, in spite of pledges given to His Majesty's Government that they would be promptly withdrawn, is a further cause of disorder and unrest. The revenues of these important provinces are withheld from the Persian Government, and the condition of the provinces themselves is going from bad to worse.

"When the Mejlis has been convoked in accordance with the Constitution, my Committee trust that His Majesty's Government will do all that lies in their power to facilitate a loan to the Persian Government on reasonable terms and subject to such conditions as regards the expenditure of its proceeds as may be considered desirable."

Saad-ed-Dowleh.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, Wednesday.

It is reported here that England and Russia are now agreed that Saad-ed-Dowleh is not the man for the situation, and that he is advised to leave Persia. The report has given universal satisfaction. There have been two coups d'état in Persia during the last few years, and the principal agents of both of them were Saad-ed-Dowleh and Enir Bahadur, who is now at Vienna; it is for that reason especially that the return of Saad-ed-Dowleh has caused so much uneasiness.

It is not thought to be certain that the Regent will give his consent to the new electoral law proposed by the Commission which has been examining the question. The Constitution does not provide for legislation by commission, and the alteration in such a manner of a law passed by Parliament would seem to be unconstitutional. The return of the Regent is generally desired here.

The Record of Saad-ed-Dowleh.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN."

SIR,—According to news received from a trustworthy source, the Russian papers are freely discussing the probability of the ex-Shah's return to Persia. The Russki Slovo says that the ex-Shah has sent his tahsil-dar Mirza Abu Tharab Khan of Kashan, entitled Mukhtar-ud-Dawla, one of his most intimate favourites and courtiers, to discuss through the Persian Minister at St. Petersburg, who is untrustworthy, the question of the ex-Shah's return with the Persian Cabinet. The latter were almost persuaded to accede to this under certain conditions, but differences arose which for the moment put an end to the negotiations, and Mukhtar-ud-Dawla again returned to Odessa. It is said that Russia prepared, with England's concurrence, to leave the question of the ex-Shah's return to power to the decision of the Persian nation (!) and that the two Powers shall not intervene save in case their interests are threatened by disturbances; in other words, they will intervene if resistance is offered by the Persian people to the return of this perjured and discredited tyrant!

So far Saad-ud-Dowleh has not succeeded in forming a Cabinet, for Samsam-us-Sultaneh, the actual Premier, refuses to resign, and, though Saad-ud-Dowleh is supported by Russia and England, no respectable statesman is willing to serve under him. He is therefore endeavouring to induce some of the weaker members of the Cabinet to resign or to bring about a Cabinet crisis by abstaining from attending its meetings, so as to compel Samsam-us-Sultaneh to resign; but the Cabinet has ready a list of other candidates approved by the Regent (with whom they maintain constant telegraphic communication at Paris) who could take the places of any such defaulters. The Regent, who is on the worst possible terms with Saad-ud-Dowleh, encourages and supports the present Cabinet in their action.

The following brief account of Saad-ud-Dowleh's record, which will explain the disfavour with which he is regarded by his countrymen, may be of interest to your readers. His name is Mirza Jawad Khan of Tabriz, son of Hajji Mirza Abdur, of Khuy, the merchant. In his youth he succeeded in winning the confidence and favour of the former Mukhbir-ud-Dawla (who was then Minister of Posts and Telegraphs), and finally married his daughter and was appointed Controller of Telegraphs at Tabriz; but soon afterwards he offended his patron, and thereafter became a most bitter enemy of him and all his family. The importance of this is that he includes in this hatred Mukhbir-us-Sultaneh, who is now Governor of Fars and is said to be an excellent Governor, and who will certainly be driven to resign if Saad-ud-Dowleh becomes Prime Minister, or, worse still, Regent.

Saad-ud-Dowleh next entered the Foreign Office, and in due course became Persian Minister at Brussels, after the Austrian Government had refused to accept him in this capacity. He was responsible for engaging Messrs. Nans, Priem, and other Belgians, who were brought to Persia to superintend the Custom-houses and Excise. M. Nans, after his arrival in Persia, recommended the purchase of four or five gunboats to patrol the Persian Gulf ports, and a sum of 300,000 francs (= £12,000) was transmitted to Saad-ud-Dowleh by the Persian Government in part payment for these. This sum disappeared, and Saad-ud-Dowleh declared that the bank in which he had deposited it had burst, so a fresh payment of this amount had to be made by the Persian Government.

About 1905, a year before the Constitution was granted, Saad-ud-Dowleh returned to Teheran and became Minister of Commerce. During the agitation of the merchants of Teheran against M. Nans, he fell foul of the latter and supported the agitation, in consequence of which he was banished to Yazd by 'Ayn-ud-Dawla. Then he escaped from custody, and took refuge in the British Telegraph Office, but returned to Teheran in the autumn of 1906 after the proclamation of the Constitution. He was subsequently elected a member of the First National Assembly for Teheran. The President, Sams-ud-Dawla, was obnoxious to him, and he opposed him so violently that finally he aroused the indignation of all the deputies and was compelled to leave the Mejlis about June, 1907, during the Premiership of the Amin-us-Sultaneh. Thereupon Saad-ud-Dowleh attached himself to Muhammad Ali (the ex-Shah), and began to work against the Mejlis until he became an object of suspicion and dislike to all its members and supporters.

After the assassination of the Amin-us-Sultaneh (August 31, 1907) Mushir-us-Sultaneh became Prime Minister (which post he held until after the coup d'état of June 29, 1908), and he appointed Saad-ud-Dowleh Minister of Foreign Affairs—an appointment so unpopular that within a fortnight all the employees of the Foreign Office went on strike until the obnoxious appointment was revoked. Saad-ud-Dowleh, greatly incensed at this, determined to seek revenge, and took an active part in organising the abortive coup d'état of December, 1907. The Constitutionalists, having detected this conspiracy, demanded, amongst other things, the banishment of Saad-ud-Dowleh, who, however, took refuge at the British Legation, when the Dutch Minister, on account of his personal acquaintance with M. Hartwig, the then Russian Minister, afforded him protection. There he remained until after the coup d'état of June 29, 1908, when he came out, rejoined Muhammad Ali, the ex-Shah, and became one of his chief advisers.

Some months later he was again made Foreign Minister by Muhammad Ali, and M. Lavolky, in the "project" which he communicated to the British Foreign Office, specially mentioned him as a suitable candidate for office. After the intervention of the two Legations in April-May, 1908, and the dismissal of Mushir-us-Sultaneh from the Premiership, Saad-ud-Dowleh became temporary President of the new Cabinet (May 10, 1909). He supported the retention of the Russian troops at Tabriz, or at any rate of a minimum of 600 in the city and 400 more between there and Julfa, on the frontier. He sought to terrorise the Constitutionalists by means of the Russian troops, and said on one occasion, "If Rasht and Khurasan do not keep quiet I will send Russian troops there too." His arrogant and unconciliatory conduct was one of the principal factors in bringing about the advance of the Constitutional armies on Teheran. At one time even Muhammad Ali Shah was disgusted at his arrogance, but a reconciliation was effected, and he was supported by the Legation. When the Constitutionalists entered Teheran in July, 1909, Saad-ud-Dowleh telephoned to M. Barranovski, the Dragoman of the Russian Legation, "Il faut bombarder la ville," and two or three hours later the bombardment was begun, but the Legations remonstrated with Muhammad Ali, and stopped it. After the capture of Teheran by the Constitutionalists, Saad-ud-Dowleh remained at Gulahok under the protection of the British Legation until he finally left Persia for Europe a few days after the departure of the ex-Shah. During the "Lesser Autocracy" which lasted from June 29, 1908, until July, 1909, he sold for 100,000 timans (about £20,000) a commission for a monopoly in lamb-skins to a Russian commissionaire, which the Mejlis subsequently quashed.

If the chance be given him, he will become a second Samad Khan Shuja-ud-Dowleh on a larger scale. He is regarded by all patriotic Persians as a Russian tool and as a man totally devoid of patriotic feeling and honesty.—Yours, &c.,

December 11.

EDWARD G. BROWN.

Saad-ed-Dowleh.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GAZETTE" CORRESPONDENT.)

THE recent statement of Sir E. Grey in the House of Commons that he is informed that Saad-ed-Dowleh has not declared himself a partisan of the ex-Shah is surprising. Sir E. Grey evidently had not seen the account of an interview which the Baku correspondent of the St. Petersburg Boss Gazette had with Saad-ed-Dowleh and which was reported in the Times of November 22. The remarks made by Saad-ed-Dowleh at this interview could leave no doubt as to his true feelings. In this interview Saad made misleading statements, and said that the Persians were not opposed to the return of the ex-Shah and that England's objection was the only obstacle to his return. Apart from the utterances of Saad at Baku, is it forgotten that he was the ex-Shah's Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs and generally his right-hand man after the coup d'état of 1908, and that when the Nationalists victoriously entered the capital in June 1909, Saad took refuge at the Russian Legation with the ex-Shah? Saad's name figures largely in the protocol of 1909, which provided that certain staunch partisans of the ex-Shah specifically named were to be banished, never to return.

Saad-ed-Dowleh's recent return to Persia is the result of a deep-laid plot to bring about the restoration of the ex-Shah. Many attempts in this direction had failed, and the British Government faithfully adhered to their declared policy of not recognising the ex-Shah under any circumstances. It was evidently thought that a practical way of solving the difficulty would be to secure the presence of someone who would work in the interest of the ex-Shah and be the means of bringing about his restoration. Who could be better than Saad-ed-Dowleh, who had been Muhammad Ali's right-hand man not only in Persia but also in Europe—in Geneva, where he carried on active propaganda in favour of Muhammad Ali, and where his house was the meeting place of all the reactionaries, exiles, and followers of Muhammad Ali? It must be confessed that his activity and resourcefulness as a man of his age (for Saad is over 80) were remarkable. From Geneva he directed many of the agitations which have taken place without success in favour of the ex-Shah, and he made all the diplomatic and other arrangements in connection with Muhammad Ali's incursion of the year before last. And it is a well-known fact that he persuaded Prince Salar-ed-Dowleh to go to Persia in order to help Muhammad Ali's cause and raised funds for him.

The details of the plot for bringing back Saad-ed-Dowleh were arranged in St. Petersburg, where Saad's cousin is Persian Minister. M. Klemm, head of the Asiatic Department at the Russian Foreign Office (who is about to succeed M. Poklevski as Minister at Teheran), was the chief promoter of the scheme and visited Saad-ed-Dowleh at Geneva, and the latter on his part paid several visits to St. Petersburg. It still remains a mystery as to how the intriguers succeeded in inducing the Prime Minister to invite Saad to come to Persia. The explanation given by the Prime Minister himself is a very plausible one—it was an act of generosity and kindness, a desire to let this old man spend the remaining few years of his life in the bosom of his family and at home. But the mere fact of Saad's return produced the greatest excitement and indignation among the people, and protest meetings were held, and the Prime Minister was attacked on all sides for permitting Saad's return. Time has shown that the people were right, for proofs have come to hand that Saad was determined to repay the Prime Minister's act of generosity by executing a well-thought-out plan for bringing about a revolution and the restoration of his master.

His statements in Baku, to which reference has already been made, throw a good deal of light on what was concealed in his mind. For he had arranged (as his own statements at Baku prove it) for the ex-Shah's wife to go to Tabriz, where there would be no opposition, seeing that that city is under the de facto governorship of Shuja-ed-Dowleh, the notorious servant and supporter of Muhammad Ali. Shuja-ed-Dowleh, it will be remembered, has been kept in Tabriz by the Russian authorities in spite of strong objection on the part of the Persian Government. He wields great power, as he has the support of the Russian authorities and can depend on the Russian troops. The next step was for the ex-Shah's wife to proceed to Teheran (after the ground had been prepared by Saad) and there to induce her son, the present monarch, to abdicate in favour of his father. The ex-Shah's wife is actually in Tabriz, but Saad's plans have so far failed. Soon after his arrival in Teheran he set to work to bring about the downfall of the present Cabinet and to form a party of his own, but he has utterly failed, as everyone has refused to co-operate with him. He is now, there is reason to believe, doing all he can to start an agitation in the provinces and thus involve the Persian Government in difficulties.

The other members of the clique in St. Petersburg are doing their part of the work in order to bring pressure from the Russian side and to secure the appointment of Saad, if not as Regent or Prime Minister, at least as Minister of the Interior. The Novos Vremya recently stated openly that the Bakhtiari are opposed to the appointment of Saad-ed-Dowleh and that the Bakhtiari have the support of Great Britain, and that the failure of Saad to get an appointment is a defeat for Russian diplomacy. But the truth is that the chief obstacle is the expression of Persian public opinion against Saad—the most unpopular, the most unscrupulous man in Persia. The Bakhtiari are neither pro-Russian nor pro-English, but have the best interests of their country at heart. Their deeds during the past few years prove this. They are now, it may be added, on excellent terms with the Regent, Nasir-ul-Mulk, in whose ability and disinterestedness they have the fullest confidence.

Affront to the Persian Treasurer-General.

Teheran, Dec. 25.

M. MORNAUD, the Treasurer General, who is a Belgian, was a victim yesterday of a hostile demonstration on the part of the Bakhtiari. In the afternoon M. Mornard was requested to attend at the Premier's house, and on arriving there he found the courtyard and garden full of armed Bakhtiari who adopted a menacing attitude. In the Premier's house there were assembled the Ministers, excepting the Foreign Minister. After some discussion concerning the financial situation, in which M. Mornard pointed out the impossibility of obtaining funds unless the railway negotiations were brought to a conclusion, the Premier asked if any money would be available for the Bakhtiari, and M. Mornard replied in the negative.

The Minister of War, who is a Bakhtiari, then left the room, and almost immediately afterwards a terrific uproar occurred in the garden among the tribesmen who seriously ill-treated M. Mornard's coachman and his escort of gendarmes. Two of the Ministers at once protested against the unprecedented demonstration, and the Premier, going to the door, endeavoured to stop the uproar. However, it was not until the Minister of War, who had in the meantime returned to the council room, again appeared before the tribesmen that the din ceased.

The incident has caused a most disagreeable impression everywhere. The Belgian Minister has protested in the strongest terms to the Government against the insult offered to M. Mornard, and the British and Russian Ministers here have also made strong representations to the Premier, who has promised to mete out severe punishment to the demonstrators.

TETE-A-TETE

MANY months ago Mr. Abdul Wali Khan wrote to us stating that he was on his way to Tripoli; but beyond a letter from Egypt and one or two communications from Constantinople we heard nothing from him. We reproduced extracts from his letter sent to us from Egypt, but the Constantinople letters generally supplied information which had already been published in our columns. We received from him last week a more interesting letter, dated the 20th November, 1912, addressed to us from "Ghazi Enver Bey's Camp, Derna, Africa;" and the cover bears the postage-stamp of the Ottoman Government without any postal impression as well as two Egyptian postage-stamps with postal impressions showing that the letter left the Cairo Post Office on the 18th December. It appears from this letter that at least a small number of Afghans has reached Tripoli, and that they are pluckily assisting their Arab brethren who have not yet accepted the sovereignty of the King of Italy, in spite of the peace concluded by the Ottoman Government. This is fully confirmed by a photograph of some Afghan myahids in Tripoli published by the Shahhal of Constantinople. Mr. Abdul Wali Khan describes "the extraordinary pluck and coolness displayed by a handful of Afghans under heavy shell fire against two battalions of the Italians at Syed Abdullah," where they defeated their adversaries and captured their positions. He says that the encounter lasted nine hours during which the Afghans were shelled with cannon and were met with a hailstorm of bullets. They replied with their musket fire, each of them spending four hundred cartridges. Although only twelve in number they determined to fight to the last. They felt their position to be quite secure, though it became impossible for them to extricate themselves from a perilous situation, as they were surrounded by heavy odds on three sides in three large columns. "We were divided into three sections of four each," writes Mr. Abdul Wali Khan, "and fought desperately. It is unbelievable, but I write it on oath that it is solemnly true that the cowardly Italians retreated hastily, leaving thirty dead in the field, and thus through a sheer piece of good luck and our dogged resolution and resistance we won the day instead of falling prisoners. . . . We advanced further, secured the thirty rifles and ammunition, which we brought into the camp, and hoisted the Turkish flag on the conquered position. This complete rout of the enemy and our miraculous but glorious victory was watched by our popular and heroic Commandant, Ghazi Enver Bey, and the General Staff from a commanding hill, and on our return . . . we were heartily cheered for our determined resistance and ultimate success. This small piece of good work has made our brethren the Turks and the Arabs look upon us Afghans as belonging to a glorious and valiant race. Everywhere we are being hailed for our valour and the good Commandant himself complimented me in his Darbar Tent on the 15th instant in the presence of Arab Sheikhs and Turkish officers, remarking that 'the extraordinary bravery of you Afghans will ever remain uppermost in my mind and I am proud to have such volunteers in my camp.' He offered to each one of my men five Turkish pounds as a mark of recognition for their signal deed. This kind offer was at first thankfully declined, but at the Commandant's instance I persuaded them to accept it as 'tobacco money.' They reluctantly obeyed me and have again returned to their position facing the Italian 'blockhouse' or trenches. I shall also be going there after the 15th prayers. We have been photographed by the Ghazi himself and shall receive a few copies when they are ready." Mr. Abdul Wali Khan also describes the ceremony of the presentation of colours on the evening of the 15th November, when Enver Bey delivered a short address explaining the object for which they had assembled and invited the Standard-Bearer to unfurl the new flag of green silk with 'holy verses embroidered thereon. Arab soldiers marched in sections, kissed the cloth and then repeated the holy oath, vowing solemnly to defend their country and their faith against all non-Muslims. The troops then marched past

In quarter columns, but before they dispersed they drank in sherbet to the honour of Islam and the health of Ghazi Enver Bey. Mr. Abdul Wali Khan confesses that his acquaintance with Sennoussi does not extend beyond eight weeks, but he says that during this time he has learned enough to be able to say that Sheikh Sennoussi holds spiritual sway from the Aden Hinterland to the Sea, and the Atlas mountains in Morocco, and from the French Sudan and the whole of Egypt to Benghazi and Tripoli and in most other parts of the African Continent. He says he has intimate relations with some of the Sheikh's followers and their piety and simplicity recalls the memory of the Sahaba. There are large numbers of Sennoussi Mujahids in all the Turkish camps. A young Turkish officer, who had travelled very extensively in the East and the West, told Mr. Abdul Wali Khan in their mess that he had three interviews with the great Sidi Ahmed Shareef, and that he was convinced beyond doubt that here, at any rate, was a real Saint possessed of all the virtues of a true leader of Islam, and absolutely free from all religious affectation. Mr. Abdul Wali Khan closes his letter with the soldier's longing "to have another go at the Italians" in which he trusts he will not be disappointed. It appears from news received here since this letter was written that Enver Bey is now in Constantinople. We have yet to see whether this remarkable Turk has reached his fatherland in time to prevent the conclusion of a humiliating peace which would reflect even more discredit on the Kiamil Ministry than their conduct of the war. It is gratifying, however, to note that the roving Afghan has managed to wander from the North-Western Frontier right up to Africa in quest of war and to fight for his brethren and his faith.

WE HAVE great pleasure in giving prominent insertion to the following appeal and statement of the progress of her scheme for a Girls' School for Delhi which that enlightened and patriotic lady, H. H. the Begam Saheba of Bhopal, has sent to us:

"My proposal for the establishment of a Girls' School in Delhi, in commemoration of the auspicious visit of Their Imperial Majesties, was published in the Comrade and several other papers sometime in April last year. I now take the opportunity, through the courtesy of the columns of the Comrade, publicly to thank the Begams, Maharajis, Ranis and other prominent ladies for their kind support of my scheme in the shape either of financial help or of entire sympathy with the cause. I would, however, invite the attention of most of the Princesses and ladies who have not up till now made any response to my proposal, and I earnestly appeal to them to think over the matter which aims at the amelioration of their own sex and which is connected with the auspicious name of our beloved Queen-Empress Mary. I need hardly reiterate that the success of the scheme depends entirely on the united support of the Maharajis, Ranis, Begams and the ladies of rank in India. The names of those who have kindly promised financial help are given below:—

H. H. the Nizam	...	Rs.	50,000
H. H. the Maharani of Gwalior	...	Rs.	50,000
H. H. the Dowager-Maharani of Gwalior	...	Rs.	1,50,000
H. H. the Begam of Jajpura	...	Rs.	3,000
H. H. the Rani of Rajgarh	...	Rs.	2,000
H. H. the Rani of Naraingarh	...	Rs.	3,000
H. H. the Rani of Dhar	...	Rs.	5,000
Qaisar-ul-Jahan Sahiba of Bhopal	...	Rs.	7,000
Shahryar Dulahin Sahiba of Bhopal	...	Rs.	5,000

"BEGAM OF BHOPAL."

Those who have had occasion to see Bhopal when Her Highness first took over the reins of government and have also seen it at different times since then, and have compared the conditions of to-day with those of a little more than a decade ago, could not have failed to mark the progress made in such a short interval of time. To us it is a source of pride that Her Highness has provided for an unbelieving world an indisputable justification of the social laws of Islam, for Sultan Jahan Begam has not kept watch and ward throughout her extensive dominions by departing in the least from the canons of her faith. Her love for her fellow-beings is immense, but she has never forgotten the claims of her own sex. Throughout the long ages Man has been the Hunter, the Tamer and the Slave-driver, and what passes to-day by the name of civilization has only altered the form of the chase and has covered with gold and jewels and velvet and satin the swart galley-marks of the slave. Is it not a matter of shame to the "superior" sex that it is a woman, once more, who has sought to emancipate her sex in the only effective manner, and to offer it the only true liberty—the freedom of the soul? We trust even at this late hour of the day the men of India would come forward to make an atonement for their neglect of the claims of those who are as necessary for the existence of the world and its progress as they themselves. But we also trust Her Highness would once more justify the ways of God to Man and Woman by seeking to give salvation to her sex as she herself has found it. The price of a great woman is great, but the price of a good woman is above rubies, and we trust that when the scheme of Her Highness comes to be formulated a little more definitely, it will be manifest that her School would be the nursery for women who are good as well as great.

The sympathy aroused in Moslem India by the troubles of the Turks has been considerable and has yielded some practical results. Its most gratifying feature has been the spontaneous response it has evoked amongst hundreds of Moslem ladies in the country, some of whom have given away everything they had to help their suffering brethren abroad. The circumstance marks a welcome stage in the awakening of the Indian Mussalmans. Organisations like the Women's Branch of the Red Crescent Society, Punjab, which has been able to collect about Rs. 4,500 in Lahore and Amritsar in a short time and is pushing on its work with vigour, have a reassuring significance about the future of the community. But, though the growth of communal consciousness amongst the Moslem women in India has been marked and unmistakable, it only serves to show how much still remains to be done to create in the Mussalmans of India,—men and women alike—a sense of responsibility in full measure and a unity of purpose and endeavour. The energy and enthusiasm with which the Egyptian Moslems have been sending help to Turkey have been remarkable. Egypt with a population of ten millions has already sent sixty lakhs of rupees to Turkey, besides providing for refugees who have been brought to Egypt and fitting out several Medical Missions for Tripoli and Turkey. What is, however, still more noteworthy is the fine spirit of sacrifice and patriotic devotion displayed by Egyptian women. A recent example of such devotion has come to our notice which, we trust, will not be without its lessons in Moslem India. As the story of the misfortunes of Turkey became known, the wife of Hassan Rashdi Pasha could no longer remain at home and hear of the sufferings of her brethren in Constantinople. Since the beginning of the war she had no thought but one about its victims—though she shed no tears for the wounded and the helpless in Turkish hospitals. Having obtained her husband's permission, she at last left on November 8th for Constantinople where she has been working as a nurse in one of the military hospitals. From early morning till sunset she is with her patients and only leaves them for a few hours in the night when she goes away to Jalal Bey, her father. She has been sending weekly accounts of her doings to her husband. "I could have," she writes in one of her letters, "never dreamt of what I am doing here. The gaping wounds are not a sight that I can see without moving a muscle. But only one thought sustains me in my weak moments—the thought that the men received their wounds when fighting against their enemy in defence of their honour and their fatherland. The thought inspires me with new life and I rise every morning more than ever resolute in purpose and full of fresh energy for my work." In her latest letter she says—"I came across three men who had bullet wounds in their backs. I thought they were not the Turks, for the Turk always faces the fire and never receives bullets in his back. In spite of my utmost efforts I could not get rid of the feeling and consequently could not persuade myself to attend to the unfortunate men."

An Egyptian Lady and the War.

Not long after the war between Italy and Turkey broke out we suggested that some efforts should be made to collect and publish from time to time as accurate and comprehensive information as possible about the assistance rendered to Turkey by the Mussalmans of India and when no other plan was suggested we offered to publish this information ourselves if those responsible for the Relief Funds started in different parts of India took the trouble of supplying us the necessary information in a tabulated form, a specimen of which we published at the time. Much to our regret little was done to make this plan a success, and, although we received information from the Aligarh College somewhat fitfully for several weeks, even that was not supplied to us later on, and Karachi's was the sole Red Crescent Society which continued to comply with our earnest request. Had we had more time at our disposal we would have addressed our request privately to the authorities of every Turkish Relief Fund in India. But we did not feel justified in undertaking this task in addition to others which we had imposed upon ourselves in this connection at the expense of our readers, whose genuine grievances we have not ignored, even though we have not yet been able to remove them. In this difficulty we suggested to the Secretary of the Moslem League, which in our opinion could have legitimately undertaken this task, to utilise the fairly expensive staff of his office and collect the necessary information. But for reasons which were not given, nor are yet intelligible to us, the Honorary Secretary of the League, who was willing enough to adopt our suggestion, was not allowed by some eminent members of the League assembled at Lucknow three weeks ago to take up this work. We have, therefore, to fall back on our original suggestion that the authorities responsible for the various Relief Funds should supply to us the information which we desire regularly, week after week, in the subjoined form which should be filled every Sunday or Monday, for the seven days ending on the previous Saturday, and posted to us. Where the authorities of these Funds cannot fill the forms in English they should do so in Urdu, and should there be a sufficient demand for such forms in English or Urdu we shall be prepared to supply them to the various Funds, for ten weeks at a time, free of cost. We shall co-ordinate all this information and publish it every week in the Comrade for the information of a very large number of people anxious to know the true extent of India's assistance to Turkey. When commencing to supply information for the current period, we trust the authorities of these Funds would let us know the amounts collected previously and the manner in which they have been disbursed, stating separately what amounts had been sent for the relief of the sufferers of the war in Tripoli and the war in the Balkans. We received sometime ago a communication from the Secretary of the Madras Red Crescent Society, who supported this and wished us to issue a consolidated report of the work of all such Societies in India, and had promised to offer us all possible assistance in the compilation of such a report, including part of the expenses of such a compilation and its publication. This is a very necessary work, and we shall be glad to undertake it if the authorities of the various Funds come forward with similar offers of help. We may also mention here that on the return of the All-India Medical Mission we hope to issue a report giving details of its organisation and work. Dr. Ansari has taken with him a complete set of printed forms and registers for his field-hospital which would give us excellent data and we have supplied him, and the Assistant Director and the Manager as well, with diaries and note-books wherein they have been requested to enter all the necessary particulars of their daily experiences. In addition to this, we are keeping a regular file of all the letters received from the members of the Mission, everyone of whom has been requested to include us in his weekly correspondence. We trust these two reports would give to all those who are interested in the work of relief most valuable information. Once more we appeal to them all to render us all assistance in their power.

It will interest our readers to learn that Khwaja Hasan Nizami, of Delhi, sent a charm to H. E. Lady Hardinge for the speedy recovery of His Excellency. The following letter was received by him in reply from the A.-D.-C. to H. H. the Viceroy —

"I am directed by Lady Hardinge to answer your kind letter and to say how very much she and His Excellency the Viceroy have appreciated the kind sympathy and the prayers of the members of the All-India Sufi Conference. I am further to tell you that the charm which you so kindly sent has been framed and hung over His Excellency's bed. Her Excellency is much touched by your loyal sentiments."

WE ARE asked to state that the Orient Bank of India, Ltd., Lahore, have now received the formal receipts from Constantinople for the sums of Rs. 24,000 and Rs. 25,905 which were cabled to Turkey on behalf of the Zamundar Turkish Relief Fund and Peshawar Muslims respectively. The receipts are duly signed by His Highness Kiamil Paasha, Grand Vizier, and other officials of the Ottoman Government and have been forwarded to the parties concerned. These sums were previously acknowledged by the Grand Vizier by telegrams.

WHILE the whole country is watching with thankfulness the steady, though necessarily slow, progress of His Excellency Lord Hardinge towards recovery, "Rumours" and the Delhi Outrage.

little progress seems yet to have been made towards the detection of the culprit and of the organisation of which he was evidently a foul and wicked instrument. Vigorous efforts are being made to track him down, and we fervently hope they will be crowned with speedy success. As long as he remains at large, every Indian jealous of his country's honour and of the good name of his people will continue to hang his head down in humiliation and shame. Much speculation has been rife as to the class and community from which the assassin may have sprung. Much of it must, however, be mere frivolous and idle gossip while the identity of the culprit remains in the dark. The Indian Press has on the whole kept a calm and judicious attitude under the shock of the terrible crime, but a few of the less responsible newspapers have been indulging in curiously loose and wild talk. It is amusing to watch some of them carrying on a shady traffick in "rumours" for the edification of their clientele. The Nayat, a Bengalee newspaper published in Calcutta, seems in some mysterious way to have lighted on the "rumour" that "two Aligarh boys were under arrest in connection with the bomb outrage at Delhi." The "rumour" has been authoritatively declared to have been unfounded. We would, however, very much like to know how the "rumour" travelled all the way from Delhi and reached the extremist organ of the Bengalee Nationalists. Perhaps it was made to order to ward off the contingency of a more plausible "rumour" getting abroad about the Nayat fraternity. People have not yet forgotten the soil where the bomb has mostly flourished, nor the class of men who have been the most zealous exponents of the cult. And even if they were likely to forget it, the report of the Inspector-General of Explosives which shows that the composition of the Delhi bomb was much the same as that of the bomb thrown in Dalhousie Square, Calcutta, and of the one only recently thrown against the house of a witness in the Midnapore Case, is sure to refresh weak memories. Aligarh and those it represents must equally share with every other section of the people the humiliation and shame of the outrage till the culprit is brought to book. Everything is possible in this world where facts are sometimes more startling than fiction. One need not, however, lose one's dignity even under the stress of a trying ordeal. A Mussalman's pride that he has always been free from the taint of anarchism is as much beside the point at this moment as the loud professions of calm and pacific temper on the part of a Bengalee Nationalist. A foul crime has been committed and the culprit is still undetected. The stain of the crime is for the time being on every Indian and it is ludicrous to sing loose hints at creeds and nationalities. We can well understand why protestations of innocence have been rather excessive in some quarters. It is quite natural that some of the persons who were found in the building from which the bomb is considered to have been thrown should declare that they saw it coming from the opposite direction. It is equally natural that the Nayat should hear of "rumours" which may have to be contradicted officially. The officers of the C. I. D. under Sir Charles Cleveland have no easy task set to them, but it is not likely to be made easier by "rumours." Nothing could be less difficult than to produce evidence against an innocent person, for those who can create a secret organisation of terrorists and manufacture bombs, can create and manufacture a good deal more. But would it, or could it, satisfy Government to take an insignificant life for the life that was sought to be taken? It will not, in fact, be enough to capture even the real culprit, for there must be many more behind him whose well-planned assistance made the assassin's attempt all but successful. Unless the whole plot is discovered and the whole brood of terrorists is hunted down to the lair, the members of the C. I. D. would be all but worthless. We are confident that Sir Charles Cleveland and his assistants have realized all this and can afford to treat the "rumours" according to their deserts. What distresses us, however, is that "An Anglo-Indian Correspondent" should have deemed it wise and helpful to write to the Manchester Guardian in the following manner: "We may anticipate that explanations of the Delhi outrage will take two forms. It will be argued that the bomb is evidence of the continued existence and activity of the Hindustani organisation, to which the Anarchist crimes of 1908-9 were attributed, or, alternatively, that it was thrown by a Moslem fanatic maddened by recent events in the Mahomedan world. Certainly neither is inadmissible, and there are plenty of other possible explanations. Upon one point there is no room for difference of opinion. Lord Hardinge has been from the day of his arrival in the country personally popular with all the Indian communities. Such opposition as was aroused by the administrative changes announced a year ago by the King came from a section of the European community entirely in Bengal. But it is obvious that general popularity or approval is no safeguard against the individual bomb-thrower, whether actuated by a personal or imaginary grievance or by a simple hatred of the alien ruler." Now much of this was far too obvious to explain, and, if anything, the explanation was wanting in fullness, for "Anarchist crimes" have not been confined to 1908-9. As we all know, they have continued without any very marked interruption from the day when the first terrorist attempt was made. But the attempt of this Anglo-Indian Correspondent at enlightening a wofully ignorant public in England is likely to create in that country suspicions for which no basis in fact exists at the present moment and may react unfavourably on the nation's attitude towards Turkey. What is, however, far worse, its effect on Moslem youths in India could not be of a beneficial character. For obvious reasons we shall not dwell on this aspect of the question, but we hope that sancta simplicitas aping Sherlock Holmes would rather seek the ear of the C. I. D. if it cannot suppress its ambitions, and at least not publish such crude efforts at scenting guilt in the public Press or proclaim them from the house-tops.

We are glad to publish the following communication from Capt.

Lady Lowther's Fund.

We mentioned sometime ago that terrible accounts had reached us of the sufferings of Moslem refugees in Salonica and Monastir. Although it may never be confessed, it is a fact that in war time there is hardly any form of crime which is not committed by victorious soldiers against the civil population of the defeated country, and wherever may be said to the contrary in public, military authorities make no secret of it in private, that such crimes practically always go unpunished. The extent of criminality, however, varies in different armies according to the discipline enforced in times of peace. That some of the worst crimes known to humanity would be perpetrated by the victorious armies of the Allies went without saying, and it was also certain that they would remain unpunished. But we, who live in this country, can have little idea of the miseries of Turkish men, women and children after the victories of the Allies. The pent up passions of five centuries, which had been roused from time to time by the stirring up of the Balkan Christians by several European Powers, have now been let loose, and the pandemonium now existing in the Balkans can hardly be imagined by people used to peace and security. We have reproduced elsewhere some evidence of the guilt of the Allies, but it can easily be imagined that a full account of the horrors will never see the light of day. We have not hesitated to reproduce from the columns of the Times, which has not yet published any allegation against the Allies, an account of the alleged outrages of the Kurds Lazes in Galipoli. Apart from a desire to be fair to both the parties, we felt nothing could illustrate the attitude of a large section of the British Press like the silence of the Times about the outrages of the Allies and its prominent insertion of allegations made by a non-descript correspondent who had taken upon himself the task of investigating the alleged excesses of the Turks. Even these allegations are a unique comment on the attitude of such papers, for on the face of it mountains have been made of molehills, and mere suspicions and insinuations have been pressed into service for want of actual proof. The Porte, according to a Constantinople telegram of December 25th, has had to repeat the demand made to the Powers a month ago for Consular enquiry into the atrocities alleged to have been committed by the Allies in the occupied territory, and it yet remains to be seen whether the Powers return any other answer to this demand except repeating the favourite phrase used in the case of the horrors of the Omas of Tripoli—"military exigencies." Naturally the Muhammadans inhabiting the villages in the occupied territories have sought refuge, where they could escape the massacre, in large towns like Salonica and Monastir where their miseries and afflictions can at least come to the notice of European Consular authorities. But if these afflicted people have escaped death from bayonet thrust and dishonour worse than death in their own villages, they are now face to face with death from starvation and exposure for want of the wherewithal and in the absence of their household gods all of which they had to leave at home when they rushed to places of greater security. In view of this, and particularly because it appears that the Allies do not recognise the Ottoman Red Crescent in the occupied territories, we have been persuaded to apply to our own Government for arranging for the relief of these sufferers, particularly at Salonica and Monastir. We at first requested His Excellency to arrange through the London Foreign Office for the transmission of £100 to the British Consul-General at Salonica, and of a similar sum later on if food could be locally procured. Our request was conveyed to His Excellency only a day or two before his attempted assassination, but it was instantly communicated with His Excellency's own recommendation to the Secretary of State for India, and we have great pleasure in learning that the Secretary of State has already placed on our behalf £100 at the disposal of the Consul-General at Salonica, and we have now been asked what we intend to do as regards further remittances. In view of further details about the sufferings of the refugees, we have decided to send £900 more to Salonica and Monastir, and we are very grateful to His Excellency that, in spite of his state of health, he has had a telegram sent to the Secretary of State recommending that £500 more should be placed at the disposal of the Consular authorities at Salonica and £400 at Monastir. We believe we have been right in expressing on behalf of thousands of contributors to our Fund a request that at both these places the British Consular authorities should notify to those in need of relief that these amounts have been placed at their disposal by their brethren in India, and that the numbers of the persons thus relieved may be noted. We fear keeping detailed accounts in such a state of affairs as prevails at these places would be more than could reasonably be expected, but, while desiring that more attention should be paid to immediate relief of such distress, we have requested that a rough account should be kept of the disbursements of the Funds. We take this opportunity of thanking Sir James DuBoulay, K. C. I. E., Private Secretary to His Excellency, for his readiness to assist us in such matters in spite of the congestion of work in his office and the anxiety entailed by the attempt on His Excellency's life. Acts like these cannot go unrecorded on the minds of Indian Mussalmans, and it is a relief to find that the British nation is composed not only of Liberal politicians, but also of truly liberal gentlemen and statesmen.

The Viceroy's Health.

Bulletin 8-30 A. M., Saturday. "The Neuritis reported a few days ago in the Viceroy's right arm is improving. His Excellency's general condition is quite satisfactory."

Conventions.

Des Cartes' scepticism had made short work of every cherished belief, but he came at last to the bedrock on which he constructed his whole philosophy. "I think; therefore, I am" became his basis of construction. But if that should lead humanity to boast of its thinking powers it has only to study the conventions of various countries and civilizations to disillusion it. Nothing seems more difficult for mankind than to think; for the majority of human beings prefer others to do their thinking for them. How many of us derive any portion of our stock of wisdom from any source other than proverbial philosophy? The wit of one becomes the wisdom of many, and the beaten track is furrowed with such deep ruts that it becomes impossible for the crowd trudging along it to notice the vastness of the land and the multitude of its ways. Even when someone more courageous than others clears a new path for himself he is derided as a fool for his pains, because he has taken the trouble to justify Des Cartes' basis of belief that man is a thinking animal.

Conventions exist in all countries, but it is reserved for an island to be ruled by the narrowest and the most numerous conventions. Not that great individual thinkers are not born in islands. Genius is a law unto itself, and flouts both heredity and environment. For were it not so, all the wisdom of the world would have gone to continental countries leaving little for the guidance of the world's islands, such as England and Japan which can pride themselves on the splendid achievements recorded in their island stories. To compensate them for the scarcity of original thought, these convention-ridden sea-girdled lands possess a remarkable conservatism which helps them to make the best use of the contributions to original thinking which their philosophers have made. So much indeed do they think of their conservatism that they would not exchange it with the sum total of the world's original thinking, and although the existence of too many insular minds is bound to reduce the pace of a country's progress, there is this justification for their pride that they are immune from the constant changes which a too rapid rate of thinking entails.

The question, however, is not so much whether conventions have their use and value as whether insular conventions and great empires can go together. It is a matter for no little pride that a small island of the Far West has the largest Empire in the world and controls the destinies of hundreds of millions in many parts of the distant East. But this Empire, which owes its existence to the conservative instincts of Great Britain, is after all a recent creation, and it will not be amiss to pause and consider whether it can last even half so long as the other empires of the world, and particularly in the East, if for its continuance too much dependence is placed on England's insular conventions. We raise this question in no spirit of hostility to the Empire, for we have said it often enough that to us in the East it has brought manifold blessings and its continuance is essential for our progress. For us British conventions have all the novelty of original thought, and with such avidity have we fed on the viands of the West that many of us in India have become as insular in their tastes as any convention-ridden Briton. For us England has opened new vistas of life and thought, and has linked us not so much with a little island as with a new world. But while Europeanising and Angloising us with marvellous rapidity, England seems to have remained almost as circumscribed in her own conventions as in the days of Queen Bess when the East India Company was first formed. In ideas and customs, in speech and manners, in food and dress, an Englishman in India is but little removed from an Englishman in England, and instead of being liberalised by actual contact with the East he has a tendency to get more and more confirmed in his own insular prejudices. We do not know whether many Anglo-Indians would plead guilty to this charge; but even if they do, they would most probably suggest that their insularity is the secret of their success, for they preserve thereby the traditions of their own island home which has helped them to achieve greatness abroad. In the historic struggle between the Papacy and the Empire, Hildebrand insisted on maintaining the monastic aloofness of the clergy in order to dominate a debased laity. But in spite of his efforts, the Catholic Church has lost its worldly power, and the international position of the Pope to-day is a travesty of the claims enforced by the Papacy at Canossa. Bismarck's phrase, "Von Canossa muss die Welt kommen," would perhaps be as famous in history as Rome's verdict, "Dilectus est Cortesius," and it would be possible to justify the methods and policy of Hildebrand in the governance of the British Empire only when a few centuries have rolled over it and left it as mighty and strong as it is to-day. Perhaps the longest lived empires have been those which have been founded by an alien people who themselves suffered a sea-change in the process of changing the face of conquered countries, and when British statesmen assemble in the penetralia of their council-rooms it would repay them to consider this general question rather than debate too carefully whether this political concession or that would hold together a vast Empire of dissimilars.

In the governance of India the Mussalmans have suffered far more than others by the insularity of British conventions. One of these conventions is that blood and race provide the only lines of cleavage in the world, and when to this is added the convention that not only two hands are better than one, but that the result of their cogitation is invariably in the interests of the third, it is apparent that the Mussalman, who are much less familiar with the idea of divisions based on differences of blood and race, and themselves constitute a minority, must wear the badge of their tribe and suffer. In a book recently published by Mr. Wavell, F.R.G.S., under the title of "A Modern Pilgrim in Mecca," he makes the following observations which deserve the attention of British statesmen to-day:—

The Western school of statescraft rests on the axiom that the primary division of mankind is determined by racial and geographical considerations. The peoples of the earth group themselves into nations which, for purposes of government, form States. The State, in dealing with its neighbours, acts as a corporate body and in accordance with the code of morality incumbent on each separate individual belonging to it. Patriotism—that is, the allegiance and devotion of the individual to the State—is accounted the highest virtue.

In the Near East, however, these ideas are not accepted as axiomatic, quite the reverse. There the inhabitants of the world are classified according to their religious beliefs. The unit is no longer the nation but the "millah." The Oriental, be he Moslem, Christian, or Jew, regards his co-religionists as his compatriots irrespective of racial or territorial considerations. The Ottoman Empire, in view of an Eastern Christian, is merely an expression meaning those countries in which the Moslem "millah" at the present time dominates and governs the others. To the Moslem Turk, Greek, Frenchman, German, and Armenians all fall in the same category. They differ, he says, in many ways, but all are equally Christians and to him equally obnoxious. When Germany comes near war with France, "Good," says the Turk, "the Christians are quarrelling among themselves." When Russia invades Persia, "Here," says he, "is another attempt on the part of the Christians to injure Islam."

The British connection with India is now three centuries old, and for half of that period the British have ruled a daily increasing portion of India. And yet only the other day an Englishman, whose duties as a teacher of the young brings him in daily contact with Indians, asked a Mussalman why he and his co-religionists had any sympathy with the Turks in their misfortunes. The Turks were not of the same blood and race as Indian Mussalmans, and it could not enter into his philosophy that some three hundred million people, constituting a sixth of the world's entire population, were united together by a bond which was not that of blood and similar ethnic origin, nor yet of physical contiguity and territorial patriotism. Some have, however, begun to realize this, but seek for its existence an explanation in the past history of Europe. They regard the bond of religion, which unites Mussalmans in the twentieth century, as a stage of social and political evolution which they have themselves left far behind them in the Middle Ages. It is enough for most people to condemn an idea or a system if it can in any way be called medieval. But even if religious fraternity was a medieval system, does it deserve condemnation merely on that score when in conservative England some of the most cherished institutions bear the unmistakable stamp of the Middle Ages?

That, however, is another story. In European politics religion may not play to-day the same part that it did in the Middle Ages, but there is nothing to prove that even in Europe it has now ceased to play an important part. The main difference, however, between the Middle Ages and modern times is this. In the Middle Ages the creed of the king became the creed of the country; but to-day the creed of the country is imposed on the king as his own. Would a Catholic King be tolerated in England or a Protestant Queen in Spain even in these advanced times which make such a parade of toleration and emancipation? It is true that when the Spanish Armada threatened the freedom of England, English Catholics fought for the Protestant Queen—if, indeed, Elizabeth was a Protestant. For the synthesis of a World-Empire and a World-Religion had now been substituted different States, with divergent and often conflicting interests, and National Churches with differences of dogma and ritual. But can it be said that if England had been divided into Christians and Buddhists living in subjection to a Buddhist Queen, instead of merely Catholics and Protestants owing allegiance to a Christian albeit a Protestant sovereign, and if the King of Spain had sent the Armada, English Catholics would have opposed it in the same manner? That would not be a difficult speculation, but it relates to a remote period of time. Let us, therefore, judge the force of religion to-day by reference to less remote conditions, and it would not be amiss to reflect a little on the Dreyfus Case in this thinking France and the treatment meted out to the Jews, particularly in Russia, and to Mohammedans throughout Christendom.

It may be said that the intolerance of Mohammedanism is not the intolerance of a faith, but of a family system, based on bloodship.

We have a great temptation to ask in return if it is more intolerable to have many wives than to have many gods? But such a contention is just the admission which we seek to obtain from those who argue that the fraternity of faith is a relic of the Middle Ages. The bond of Islam is not the bond of a dogma or a ritual such as held together the Holy Roman Empire and the Papacy, and provides Christian clergymen with a theme for a reasonable sermon just at present. It is the bond of a common culture and a social polity that is the same in Morocco as in China, in Cabala in Cairo and Constantinople.

Mankind has evolved in the course of centuries certain customs and laws, systems and institutions which are the outward expression of its culture and civilization, and as different groups of men have different cultures and civilizations, their customs and laws, systems and institutions also differ. The lines of cleavage which divide man from man have generally been, as in the case of all other animals, those of race or country, and thus differences of heredity and environment have created differences of laws and institutions. But when patriotism is commended to us as the highest virtue even in these civilized days we must examine what it means. Could it mean merely a feline love of the environment, or is it only a love of one's own kind which all animals share alike? And yet when an Englishman says his country is better than the Fatherland of the German or that the Anglo-Saxon race is superior to the Celtic and the Slav, is he in reality so very superior in his affections to the animals with whom he would resent comparison? If patriotism has a rationale surely it can be nothing else but the similarity of culture and civilization—whether due to similar ethnic origin, geographical unity or identity of historical associations—expressing itself in similar laws and institutions. Now the rationale of the Brotherhood of Islam, or "Pan-Islamism," is exactly the same as the rationale of patriotism, with this difference, however, that the Islamic fraternity has not achieved an identity of laws and institutions through the identity of ethnic origin or geographical unity, but has received it as a direct gift from God. Customs in India may and do differ from customs in Turkey or Morocco, and the laws governing the Afghans may not tally in every particular with the laws governing the Egyptians. But in the main the principles underlying the social synthesis are the same throughout the Islamic world, while they are not so and have never been in Christendom. It is not only one God, one Prophet and one K'aba that the Mussalmans of the world have in common, but in every degree of longitude and latitude they hold the same views of the relations of husband and wife, of parent and child; of master and slave and of neighbour and neighbour. They observe in every country the same sumptuary laws and the same rules for physical purification. They follow among all races, whether Arab or 'Ajami, Turk or Tajik, the same laws of marriage and divorce and of succession and endowments. And they do this in the twentieth century of the Christian era exactly as they did in the sixth and hope to do so to the last syllable of recorded time. Baghdad may be sacked, the Moors may be driven out of Spain, or the Turk may turn again home to Asia Minor. The Afghan may be ruled by one of his own faith, the Central Asian may be subjected to a ruler of an alien creed, and the Chinese Moslem may own allegiance to a Manchu King or to a Republic composed of four other elements besides his own. But there is still the One God to worship and the one Prophet to follow, and through calm or storm there is always the one unaltered and unalterable book to soothe and to stimulate and the one K'aba to act as the magnetic Pole for all True Believers from all points of the compass. But this spiritual unity would have been of no avail if it did not provide a social unity, and as it has been decreed that in all essentials the Mussalmans of all ages and all countries will have a common social polity. This the code of Christ, as understood by Christians, did not provide even in the Middle Ages, with the result that in spite of the advance of civilization the hand of every Christian nation is against its neighbour, and each recurring Christmas sees not the dawn of peace on earth and goodwill to all mankind but an armed camp, and the substance of man is devoted year after year not so much to the uplifting of his kind as to perfecting the instruments of his own domination. And yet a common civilization such as this which Europe has now united it against the Moslem interloper in Christian Europe, but it is incomprehensible to Europe how those can share each other's sorrows and miseries who share the common heritage of Islam and all that it signifies in this world and the next.

Hardly less dark than the thick mist in which conventions envelope the truth about the extra-territorial patriotism of the Mussalmans is the mist which throws a veil over the face of reality. Before the Allies declared war on Turkey they had demanded from her "autonomy in Macedonia in the spirit of Article 23 of the Treaty of Berlin under the control of the Powers and of the Balkan States." The conditions of the continuance of peace which the Allies sought to impose on Turkey were considered to be such as all could not accept without losing all honour and prestige, and when Sir Edward Grey was asked in Parliament whether he would have recourse to arbitration if the action of the Powers desiring peace did not result in success, he replied that he would rather not contemplate failure. Such a declaration could by no means be construed into an admission that it was just and reasonable for the Powers to compel Turkey to accept the terms of the Balkan League. And yet it was a colleague of Sir Edward Grey who, while admonishing the more bellicose of the Great Powers for their desire to plunge Europe in the horrors of Armageddon, declared his belief that there never existed a better justification for war than in the case of Turkey and the Balkan States. Believing for a moment that the pacific optimism of Sir Edward Grey was not the cant of one who welcomed war while he talked angelically of the virtues of peace, how can we avoid the conclusion that in that case it was Mr. Winston Churchill who wore the mask of a canting hypocrite?

Both are Right Honorable gentlemen, and both share alike the responsibility for the governance of the British Empire. We have no desire to judge between them and shall be content to leave the matter at that. But even the First Lord of the Navy would concede that if the Turks had accepted the conditions sought to be imposed upon them by the Balkan League, his clear case for war would have no longer existed. The Balkan States appeared to have been convinced that the Turk was unfit to rule over the Christians of Macedonia, and its autonomy was, therefore, necessary in order to extend, in the words of a third and perhaps the most important Minister of the British Crown, "the area of freedom and good government." And yet we do not know if the colleagues of Mr. Lloyd George had at any time before the war wished to alter the boundaries in the Balkans, whether of good government or of evil, for we have the public declaration of the Powers that the status quo ante would be preserved. In view of this additional contradiction, what are we to believe? Are we to understand that British Ministers had decided among themselves that if the evil government of Turkey succeeded better in war than she had done in peace, and held a parade of its soldiers at Sofia, they would virtuously interfere in order to preserve the status quo; but that if she was found to have been caught unawares and lost on the field of battle, British Ministers would equally virtuously come forward to extend the area of freedom and good government by giving autonomy to Macedonia?

But the cant of Europe does not end here. Had the Turks tamely submitted to the demands of the Allies and conceded autonomy to Macedonia, the Balkan States could not have found in that decision anything to which they could object. The Turks did not do so, and had to pay the penalty of their refusal on the stricken field. But where is the autonomy of Macedonia to-day? We publish elsewhere a letter from a presumably Christian correspondent of the Near East in Salonica. He would very much like to know in what country he is living. The heterogeneous character of Macedonia is not only known to the Chancelleries and the council chambers of Europe, but has become a byword even in its kitchens. Whether such a mixture of races and creeds and languages could ever develop that communal feeling which Aristotle deems to be essential for an independent polity is very much open to question. But now that the Turk is out of Macedonia it is doubtful if that question will ever arise. The Greek army was the first to enter Salonica and is now in possession. But the Bulgarian komitadjis are not so ready as the Turks to recognise the claims of Greece to be the ruler of Salonica, even if Bulgaria's Tsar is willing to let this important port of the Aegean go to Greece as the price of their alliance. But whether Greek rules Macedonia or Bulgar, it appears for the moment certain that the Allies have no thought of the Treaty of Berlin and Article 23. As we said in the issue of the 9th November, the liberation of Macedonia was no more the motive power of the war than the fanaticism that moved Peter the Hermit. The miracle of the union of Greek and Bulgar, Serv and Montenegrin was no more worked by the banner of freedom than by the sign of the Cross. With all the garnish of the phraseology of Christianity and humanity it was impossible to disguise the real dish that had been prepared out of sheer desire for expansion and territorial aggrandizement. Did not M. Chedo Miyatovich, a former Serbian Minister in London, confess to a representative of the Central News: "War was inevitable. It is quite true that the Turks were bad administrators and they have not governed their European Christian provinces as they ought to have been governed. But let me assure you that even if the Turks were the very best administrators, if they had introduced liberties and reforms in Macedonia, we would still have taken the very first opportunity of trying to liberate our brethren from Turkish rule." Asked what in the hour of victory "liberation" may mean, did he not say: "I can assure you that all the talk of no territorial results following the victory of the Balkan States is quite beyond the point. Now there is no talk of autonomy; now we are fighting for territory." Is there no publicist or statesman in Europe who can soar above the cant and hypocrisy of "liberation" and say that only the claims of Macedonia and her Christian population can be recognized by Europe and not the territorial ambitions of the King of Greece or the Tsar of Bulgaria?

It would, perhaps, be some consolation to Mr. Lloyd George to know that the area of freedom and good government has at last been extended and the Jews of Salonica, whose treatment at the hands of the Greeks is described by Europeans themselves and published elsewhere, are having a foretaste of that freedom and good government. The Salonica correspondent of the Near East writes that the Greeks' "want of tact, of administrative adaptability, and even of commonsense, is so amazing that one is quite disheartened when contemplating the future of this particular town should it remain under its present control." But this is not all. He writes of the "feeling of insecurity owing to the nature of the Greek license prevailing throughout." "A cock and bull story is got up against the Jews and in the most senseless manner several are arrested and thrown into prison. . . . Some low class Greek accuses a Jew of having stolen his horse, his watch, his umbrella, even on a rainy day, his—whatever article he covets for himself; whereupon the Jew is tried up and 'run in' and the Greek is allowed to go off with what he wanted. . . . The hopeless part of all these cases—and there are far too many such—is that when the authorities are appealed to about them they seem helpless, express all manner of regrets and piteously ask, 'But what are we to do?' The fact is they do not seem to have any idea of organisation or of impartial and just government. . . . If what is rumoured be all, or even partly, true, there is nothing to choose between the Balkan Christians and the Turks."

If we turn to the record of the Bulgarians it is if anything, dyed a deeper colour in the gore of the victims. From Salonica itself comes a telegram of the Press Association which states as follows: "A Bulgarian band chief named Dumbulakoff is terrorizing, pillaging, and murdering the Greeks and Turks alike in the Nigrita district to the north-east of Salonica. . . . Dumbulakoff took the Turkish villagers of Ligovan outside the village and made them a target for the rifles of his band, the Greek military authorities not daring to interfere because they were too weak and they have been ordered to avoid quarrels with their allies. Six Mussalmans (four men, a woman and a child) were found murdered on Saturday morning just outside Salonica." A correspondent sends to the Near East the account of another Bulgar band at Cavalla which we reproduce elsewhere. He relates the story of 150 victims from among prominent Mussalmans and leading Jews called away from their houses and led to a lonely spot in batches of twos and threes. They have never related what passed within the building to which they were escorted. "But," writes this correspondent, "their bodies, pierced through and through with bayonet thrust, lie heaped up in that ditch and tell eloquently what their lips can never say." A Greek official telegram from Salonica has been published in Athens in which the excesses of the Bulgarians such as "damage to property and crimes against the honour and life of private persons, especially Turks," have been enquired into in several places. It states that "unspeakable outrages were committed at Seres and at the other towns and villages mentioned above. At Uoiran, despite the protests of the municipality, the Bulgarians seized and imprisoned the rich Turkish residents who, after having secured their liberty by the payment of enormous ransoms, were ambushed by the Bulgarians and massacred, sixty of them being killed." The Daily Chronicle publishes similar accounts of the massacres of Moslem Serbs on the testimony of an eye-witness. This is good government with a vengeance, and the most afflicted Turk and infuriated Indian Mussalman could not wish the Right Honourable Mr. Lloyd George the enjoyment of greater freedom or a better government than this to which men of his own faith have reluctantly borne such ample testimony.

When Mr. Asker Ali wrote to the Spectator complaining of the attitude of the Labour Party, who, "will not tolerate even the association of anyone connected with them with the work of charity to relieve the destitute and the starving of this afflicted nation," and appealed to those "who welcomed the slaughter and suffering as ushering in the millennium in Eastern Europe at least to raise their voice against the cruelty and barbarism of the policy which seeks to extend the area of freedom and good government. . . . in those regions by the extermination or expulsion of their inhabitants, whose only sin is that they profess a different faith from the invaders," the Editor of the Spectator responded to the appeal with the following remark:—

We cannot believe that any body of Englishmen desires the extermination of the Turk, or even his expulsion from Europe as an individual. What we and many Englishmen desire is a very different thing—the putting an end to the government of Christian European provinces by the Turks. For such a task they have proved themselves utterly unfitted. When in reply to this the Secretary of the London Moslem League asked "whether in the millennium that has been ushered in in Eastern Europe the Turks as a community are banned and it is only permissible for individuals to enjoy Europe's hospitality," the Editor of the Spectator was still more determined to indulge in the cant of freedom and good government and replied as follows:—

We meant and mean that Turkish rule in Europe (except for a time in and around Constantinople) is over; that it is well that it should be over, and that all well-wishers of the Turks will rejoice to see their rule confined to Asia. The history of the Ottoman Turk in Europe shows him utterly incapable of successfully governing European and Christian races. It is a great mistake for the Jewish Moslem League to allow Muhammadanism to be identified with the Ottoman race. The Moslem faith is in no sort of way bound up with Turkish supremacy.

It would be interesting to learn from this organ of the Tories when exactly its party discovered the Ottoman Turk to be "utterly incapable of successfully governing European and Christian races." But what we would like to know more particularly is why this utterly incapable person is to be entrusted with the rule of Europeans and Christians "in and around Constantinople." Even if the Spectator had not put in the saving clause indicating that this arrangement was merely temporary, there was no likelihood of our ignoring it. Has not Europe yet discovered a more capable governor for the capital of the Byzantine Empire, the city named after the first Christian Emperor of Rome? The Ottoman Turk has ruled in Europe for many centuries; but it seems that the lesson taught by his history of the governance of Europe, learned after the lapse of all this time by the Spectator, has not yet been fully grasped, and he would, therefore, be permitted to continue his misrule over some European and Christian subjects not only with the permission but at the explicit desire of Christian Europe itself. If this is not cant, by what other name are we to call it. What have the jealousies of the German and Slav to do with the "liberation" of European Christians? Again, what concern has Serbia with a port on the Adriatic, or Austria with the economic condition of Serbia? Are not all these hopelessly irrelevant when the only "Cause" for which the war was waged, was the liberation of Europeans and Christians from the yoke of the Mussalmans and the Turks?

But the most amusing bit of all the cant in which Europe has yet indulged is the diplomatic struggle now going on between Bulgaria and Rumania. Tsar Ferdinand marched on Tsargrad in order to assist the Christians of Macedonia in throwing off the yoke of the unspeakable Turk who worshipped a God other than his own. Christian Rumania certainly failed to take a hand in this pious enterprise, but it could not be that she did not rejoice in the success of the piety of her neighbour at Sofia. What is it then that we hear of compensation? Should the Bulgarian liberator of Christian Macedonia do penance for his piety and receive flagellation at the hands of his Christian neighbour of Rumania?

One more instance of the cant of Europe and we have done. The Editor of the Spectator, who must, we suppose, be counted among what he calls the "well-wishers of the Turks," will rejoice to see "their rule confined to Asia." It was no other than the greatest leader of his party who obtained a guarantee from Europe of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire at the Berlin Conference. But when a Tory journalist rejoices that Ottoman rule would now be confined to Asia, can we expect from the shadow of Gladstone to obtain from Europe a guarantee of Turkey's Asiatic Empire at the Conference of London? France has already spoken through the mouth of M. Poincaré about French "interests" in Syria. Need we wait long then for the revival of the Frank Crusade for Christian possession of the Holy Sepulchre? The grievances of Armenia are not likely to remain embedded in the pigeon-holes of Europe's Chancelleries, and the Muscovite has already proclaimed his firm intention of marching his Cossacks into Armenia "to prevent disorders" as he has been preventing them in Northern Persia. How long, we ask, is this cant to go on? Time was when kings and nations took up arms in order to extend, not "the area of freedom and good government," but the boundaries of their own empire, and let loose the dogs of war for their own glorification. But that was barbarism. Modern civilization, when it marches forward in the wake of ancient savagery, utilizes for its purpose not the crude and ineffective weapons of ancient days, but makes use of instruments of destruction fashioned with the aid of science and perfected through the organization of its industries, and, calling the war a mission of mercy, "liberates" people who never realized before its advent that their necks were sore with the yoke of tyranny.

We in Asia have much to learn from Europe. Its science and its organization of industry provide for us a lore which can be of incalculable use to us. But we pray to the All-Merciful God that He would keep the book of Europe's effective cruelty and its cant closed and sealed and hidden from our eyes. To us, who have sat at the feet of one of Europe's greatest Powers, it is a matter of deep regret that our lesson should be of such a mixed character. But if a Mussalman tries to free the British nation from its narrow conventions and exposes the cant of its public men, he is labelled as disloyal. When he warns the powers that be of the rocks ahead, his warnings are considered as threats. But for our part we are prepared to continue in the path we have deliberately chosen for ourselves, undisturbed by suspicions and hopes of the future.

Verse.

Even to-day we see clearly enough that the attitude of the Government of India towards His Majesty's Indian subjects is far more considerate than the attitude of the Liberal Cabinet in England, and we believe that this is the result of the endeavours of those who, like ourselves, have never failed to reflect the thoughts and feelings of the people in this country. A Government such as ours must depend on the indigenous Press for its knowledge of things as they are. Only the other day the Vienna correspondent of the Times wrote in condemnation of the policy of the late Count Aehrenthal who worked upon public opinion through the Press. "A Press bureau," he wrote, "is a very doubtful blessing to any country or Government. In its essence a police institution, it serves to prevent the formation of healthy opinion, to corrupt some journalists and to cow the incorruptible. Intended to mislead the public in a sense favourable to the Ministers of the day, it frequently ends by misleading Ministers as to the trend of public feeling." We wish some of those who desire that we should write differently would take these remarks to heart and reflect on the conditions of things in India for a moment. We have stated often enough what the Mussalmans feel on the subject of Turkey's afflictions, and we have now tried to explain at length why they do so. Those who think that we are leading the Mussalman public to the brink of ruin seem to know this country but too little. They have yet to realise that journalists, too, are human beings and have their own feelings, and that in times of great national excitement it is not often they who kindle the conflagration, though they, too, are likely to be consumed by a fire which only elements outside their own community can extinguish. We see the danger of Mussalman excitement as well as the Government, but we fear we alone know the inwardness and intensity of Moslem feeling, and our duty lies not in quarrelling with fate and merely wishing things had been otherwise, or in misrepresenting the reality, but in appealing to Government with all the persuasiveness at our command to rally round itself seventy millions of His Majesty's Indian subjects that have never felt the least desire to seek a change of rulers and are yet amenable to reason and to considerate treatment. It is true that both in the case of Persia and of Turkey the Government of India have shown great consideration and sympathy for Indian Mussalmans, and if they were at liberty to disclose what they have done, our Moslem fellow-countrymen would find that the Government of India have not failed in doing what was in their power to do. But what the community needs at the moment is some patent results of the Indian Government's efforts in their behalf not only in Persia and Turkey, but also in this country, where the modification of the Partition of Bengal and the action forced upon the Government of India in the matter of the Moslem University have added greatly to public excitement. We have never despaired of the beneficence of British rule for India and for the Mussalmans, nor have we reason to despair to-day. But we appeal to Government's sense of what constitutes statesmanship not to ignore the fact that conditions have been wholly abnormal for the Mussalmans of India, and that all they need is the overt manifestation of Government's goodwill and sympathy with them in their difficulties at home and afflictions abroad.

It is the Public Service Commission that will have to adjudge the claims of Mussalmans in the public service: but Government officials have it in their power to adduce the evidence they possess which would tend to show what real injustice has hitherto been done to Mussalmans in the name of equality and fair treatment. Again, Lord Minto's pledges are yet unredempted, and the so-called self-governing local bodies, which elect representatives of general territorial electorates for Provincial Councils and themselves deal with important questions affecting the daily life of millions of Mussalmans, have a wholly inadequate Moslem representation on their Boards. It is true that in the case of the Moslem University the Government of India have more than once unsuccessfully represented to the Secretary of State the Moslem point of view. But when the same Government could have a settled fact unsettled for a cause that was far from righteous, why need it lack the courage to go up once more to Lord Curzon and save him from his India Council friends? The fate of Persia is still hanging in the balance, and never did the Mussalmans need the assistance of Lord Hardinge more than to-day when his experience and temperate counsel can save England from the perils of Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy. Turkey has not yet been admitted to the Allies, and peace and war hang in the balance. Must it be only Germany and Austria, and even Italy, that should be put out of the European Concert's coercive policy? We sent last week a fervent personal appeal in a cable to Lord Morley in whose statesmanship and political honesty we have not yet lost confidence. Cannot the Indian Government support our appeal for consistency and actually even if it is too late to back "the wrong horse"? There are some of the directions in which the Government of India can help those who feel for their co-religionists—and fear for them! It will be an honourable office label of "Loyal" and "Disloyal" on all shades of feelings between servility and sedition, for to rally the big phalanx of the Moslem community round Government is work for a statesman and not the office boy who affixes the customary labels.

MORNING.

Fair smiles the Morn and lo! all Nature's proud
To wear the livery of Dawn's roseate light,
E'en from the far hills' sky-embosomed height
To yon low shrub with head in reverence bowed!
Hark! from yon drifting mass of golden cloud
Outflows a thrilling strain of wild delight,
And mead and grove, with dowy blossoms bright,
Send back an answering strain as sweet and loud.
'Tis Nature's joyous hymn that mounts above
To the Great Source of Light and Life and Love:
The same as on Creation's Primal Morn
Burst from the thrilled heart of the Universe,
When the quick-glancing shaft of Light new-born
Bade the Dark dregs of Chaos to disperse.

EVENING.

How sweet and peaceful is the evening hour!
All toil and strife, all jarring accents rude,
And murmurs of the bustling multitude
Have ceased. There breathes around a mystic power,
As the calm heavens their holy influence shower
Upon the silence and the solitude!
A soft breath steals, by Zephyr's wings pursued,
From yon lone rose that nestles in her bower.
The mighty heart of Nature heaves a sigh,
A smile of love comes o'er her placid face,
As, bending o'er the Earth, the azure sky
Enfolds her form within his soft embrace;
And voiceless hymns of joy ascend on high
To the great Source of Love and Peace and Grace.

NIGHT.

Night rests in hallowed beauty!—'Tis the hour
To gaze into the eyes of heaven above
And read in them the quenchless light of Love
And drink deep rapture from their mystic power.
The eager soul now scorns her earthly dower
Of mortal passions, and aspires to prove
Her essence of the Eternal Powers, that move
The Universe to Life and Light and shower
Celestial beams of Loveliness around.
At such an hour, when Heav'n its infinite store
Of Love and Light reveals, she spurns the ground
And on unfagging pinions seeks to soar
Back to her God, enfranchised and unbound,
As ere the garb of mortal life she wore!

NIZAMAT JUNG.

Muhammadian Art.

THE exhibition of Muhammadian Art held two years ago at Munich amply demonstrated the antiquity and the comprehensive range of that very interesting art which Moslem culture has given to the world. The richness and variety of this important phase of Oriental Art in its various ramifications in Egypt, Spain, Sicily, Poland, Russia and India are not generally realised. The influence of Mussalman Art on the arts of Western Europe is also very vaguely recognised. The influence of Western Art on the arts of Persia is more emphasised by Western art-critics than the cross-influence of Islam which made itself felt in Europe. Dr. Martin has recently discovered a portrait by Gentile Bellini copied by Behzad, the best Persian miniature painter of the sixteenth century. The nature of Western influences in these copies show more than anything else the different aims of Eastern and Western design. In the very manner in which Western models were sometimes adopted in Mussalman Art, as in the Bellini portraits, one realises "that the Eastern artist was the master of a science of pure linear, non-plastic design, of which even a great draughtsman like Gentile Bellini was ignorant." On the other hand, as M. Gaston Migeon has pointed out, in some cases Western craftsmen have gone further than the Mussalman artists, and in their work have literally copied certain definite Mussalman forms and motifs as in some of the capitals at the cathedral of Chartres. The Mussalman influences, clear though rather rare in the early Middle Ages, become insistent and numerous in the Romanesque period owing to the continued arrival of Eastern work, because of the increasing facility with which the Western craftsmen assimilated them. In Gothic times the same influences were frequent in many objects of Western industrial art, e.g., in many examples of diaper casting known as Diamondries, in the silk textiles of Italy and, as shown by Mr. Wallis, in the first efforts of Italian potters. In the monuments of central Italy, M. Emile Bertaux has noted many instances of Oriental influence particularly in the tomb of Bonifazio, Prince of Austria, at Canossa.

There are ample evidences, therefore, to show that Islam has shed its influence directly on the arts and crafts of Europe and not merely through the medium of Byzantine Art. Apart from the question of influences and points of contact between European and Muhammadan Art, the intrinsic value and integrity of the art-culture of the followers of Islam as a distinct contribution to the Art of the world demand serious consideration. In India Muhammadan Art has assumed very interesting phases chiefly in its architecture. The traditions of Persian paintings imported and introduced by the Mogul Emperors have also stimulated indigenous Hindu traditions, and have influenced various minor schools of quasi Mussalman character which still survive in Jaipur, Delhi, Agra, Lahore, Lucknow, Patna and Hyderabad. The Mogul, Indo-Persian or more strictly Indo-Talimurid Art in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries has contributed a brilliant chapter to the history of Indian Painting. The character of these Indo-Persian paintings is sometimes misapprehended by critics and denounced as "debased Persian," and it is erroneously asserted that "Persian painting dies away in India." These opinions are apparently based on inferior examples. For in the best examples one cannot but notice, in spite of happy combination of Persian with Indian technique, certain vitality and originality which compare favourably with contemporaneous Persian tradition. They have a richness and a flavour which reflect the splendid and varied romantic life of the Mogul Court and were designed to appeal to a cultured and leisured aristocracy, "the leading spirits of a time closely akin in temper to the Elizabethan Age in Europe."

Unfortunately many of the best examples are buried in the British Museum and the Paris collections, and in various private libraries in India. The Calcutta Art Gallery and the Lahore Museum have collected some very rare specimens. The famous collection of Colonel Hanna has travelled to Washington after the Indian Government's refusal to secure the same. The subject has, however, hardly evoked any interest with the educated Muhammadans of the present day. The claims of literary fame and political aspirations seem to divorce artistic culture which is one of the finest heritages of Islamic civilization. When will Aligarh rear up its young artists? An Art Club is as much a necessary equipment for the training of our young men as a debating society or a cricket club. We should like to see the authorities at Aligarh interesting themselves in this matter. The threads of Muhammadan Art traditions can only be picked up and readjusted under the guidance and through the intelligent interest of the cultured Muhammadans of India. The examples of the old Mogul paintings of India have already afforded inspirations to the "new" Indian School of painting founded by Mr. A. N. Tagore, Vice-Principal of the Calcutta Government School of Art. His "Aurangzeb examining the Head of Dara" and "Shah Jahan's Dream of the Taj" exhibited at the shows of the Oriental Art Society of Calcutta have amply demonstrated the artistic possibilities. Mr. Tagore's illustrations of the Rubaiyyat of Omar Khayyam lately published by the "Studio," London, display a poetic charm and rare power of a sympathetic interpretation of the text of the great Persian poet which one hardly expects from an artist whose mental training and nationality are so different from the mystic of Nishapur. A far more interesting piece of work is his picture of a Majnun or "The Mad Musician." The subject and the manner in which it is treated are so characteristically Mussalman in feeling and temper that one hesitates to believe it is the work of a Hindu artist. The only reverse case of such international exchange of thought in recent times, known to us, is that of a Bengalee Mussalman's sympathetic studies and criticisms of Vaishnava lyrical poetry of medieval Bengal. From this point of view the Hindu-Muhammadan problem seems to suggest a new solution. It is one of the characteristic signs of the times that civilisations of a different nature meet face to face not in inimical combat, which, alas! they have done many times in India before, but in a friendly embrace which leads to a liberal interchange of thoughts and ideals.

The lack of artistic culture has been one of the characteristic drawbacks of the Indian educational system. This has led to a decadence in the tastes of the Indians in recent times, to which the Hindus and the Muhammadans have alike contributed. Our Hindu brethren have already cast the seeds of a new artistic revival in Bengal. It has opened up a very interesting field which invites earnest workers from both the communities. One of our young friends, Mr. Hakim M. Khan has already done very useful work in this line of very great promise. His "Rose-Bud" exhibited at the annual exhibition of the Indian Society of Oriental Art in last February was very widely appreciated and was purchased by His Excellency the Viceroy. Mr. Hakim Khan's success has also invited other workers, particularly, Mr. Sami-us-Zaman. His "Birth of Nur Jahan" was a notable piece of work exhibited at the United Provinces Exhibition the year before. We should like to see many of our young friends following in his footsteps.

CORRESPONDENCE

Mussalman and the Allahabad Law College.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—It is very laudable indeed to talk of high ideals which the Mussalman should keep before them, of the bridging over of the gulf of separation between the Muhammadans and the Hindus, and the mitigation of the existing tension. But when we enter into realities, see the practical side of every question, realise the difficulties which beset the Mussalman in their vocations and the thorny path which they have to tread, we wonder whether they can be satisfied with seeking separation in the enlarged Councils alone. Will they not be justified in demanding separation in Universities, in colleges and in schools as well as in various departments of administration? Have they realised the mischief done to them by their being slack in this direction? The sooner they turn their attention and get their numbers fixed in Municipalities as well as in every department of administration and Government service, the better it will be for their community. In my opinion it will go a long way in mitigating the existing ill-feeling between the two great communities of India, though at the outset it is likely to enrage the Hindus. If the Muhammadans fail to do this they will be neglecting the interests of their community in search of a shadow which for some generations to come will not be materialised. The basis of my argument for complete separation is certain facts connected with the Law College, Allahabad, which have come to my knowledge during my recent visit to that place as well as certain other matters which I will discuss later on.

Formerly there was one Professor of Law in the Mutt College, Allahabad. As the number of students increased two more Readers were appointed to assist him. Later on it was considered desirable that the law class should be developed into a Law College and that there should be one Principal who should devote his whole time to the institution. Accordingly Dr. Wier was appointed. Last year, owing to the increase of work, it was considered necessary to add two more Readers to the staff. In view of the fact that the existing staff consists of two Christians and two Hindus it was expected that, if not both, at least one of the new appointments would go to a Muhammadan. A committee consisting of the Hon. Dr. Sunder Lal, Dr. Wier, Dr. Satish Chander Banerji and Mr. Sorabji was appointed to test the candidates as to their lecturing qualifications and to select two out of their number.

Without any Muhammadan on the committee to safeguard their interests it appeared a foregone conclusion that a Muhammadan, who belongs to a disinherited race of the earth, had no chance whatever. Dr. Wier is a new man and one may be allowed to say that he is not fully acquainted with Indian politics and prejudices. The fears of the Muhammadans have been justified by the result that both the appointments went to Hindus. Up to this time it need to be remarked by persons who had vested interests in such affairs that there was a dearth of competent Muhammadans for such posts. But it is an open secret that among the applicants were Mr. Agha Haider, M.A. (Allahabad and Cantab), LL.B. (Cantab), Bar-at-Law; Mr. Muhammad Raof, B.A. (Cantab), Bar-at-Law; Dr. Sulman, B.A., LL.B. (Cantab), LL.D. (Dublin), Bar-at-Law. The first two are of several years' standing.

On inquiry another important and significant fact has come to my knowledge that for several years it has been the practice of the Boards which appoint Examiners both in the LL.B. and in the High Court Examination to appoint only one Muhammadan Examiner, and that too in Muhammadan Law, as if Muhammadans were not good enough to be appointed Examiners in any other subject. There is no such bar in the case of Hindus.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Jan. 9.

The Servian Government has informed the Powers of its willingness in the interests of general peace to withdraw Servian troops from the Adriatic coast immediately peace is concluded.

The Servian Government hopes that the Powers will take this moderation into account and not ask for other sacrifices which may be beyond its power to make.

According to telegrams from various sources the Powers are agreed as to the necessity for the cession of Adrianople to Bulgaria with the reservation of the mosques and tombs of the Caliphs, which will be made extraterritorial under international control. It is announced that Bulgaria would accept such reservations if asked.

A Cetinje telegram states that the King has issued a fervid Christmas manifesto to the troops pointing to the possibility of having to fight to secure their ancient capital. It is believed that he refers to Austrian opposition to Montenegro's possessing Scutari. It seems to be generally believed that the Powers are preparing to undertake concerted action at Constantinople regarding Adrianople should a deadlock continue for a couple of days, though according to the latest report in Constantinople the Powers are likely to accept a proposal of Britain to preserve Adrianople to Turkey subject to the dismantling of fortifications and other restrictions. Official circles in Constantinople charge the Powers constituting the Entente, especially Russia and France, with encouraging the Allies, but they trust to the sense of fair play of the nations, especially of England.

It is stated in Paris that the demarche of the Powers at Constantinople will probably be deferred to the end of the week. The Powers are agreed regarding Adrianople. There are some divergencies with reference to the Aegean Islands, the Entente Powers supporting their cession to Greece while the Triple Alliance is desirous of leaving a number to Turkey.

London, Jan. 10.

The Ambassadors resumed their meeting at the Foreign Office on Thursday afternoon.

A Belgrade message states that the Turks are deserting Adrianople. They report that famine prevails there, rations having been cut down to four ounces of bread. There is no other food. Surrender may be expected daily.

The meeting between the Bulgarian General Savoff and the Nazim Pasha at Sofia was abortive. It transpires that the Nazim suggested the re-visitualing of Adrianople, and then raised the question of the possession of the city. General Savoff replied that the first point was settled by the armistice and the second was a matter for the Peace Conference.

All sorts of possible compromises such as the creation of a neutral zone at Adrianople have been put forward and discussed during the past week, but have been found impracticable for one reason or another.

Consequently the Powers have acquired the conviction that the cession of Adrianople to Bulgaria is unavoidable, and it is understood that measures are already being discussed for an eventual demonstration for the purpose of putting pressure on Turkey.

The Ambassadors yesterday held a meeting lasting for two hours to consider the representations to the Porte on the subject of the cession of Adrianople.

The opinion is generally held in Turkish circles that any step by the Powers, even though supported by a naval demonstration, with a view to compelling the cession of Adrianople, is doomed to failure, though the dismantling of the fortifications would be accepted.

The Porte has sent a circular to the Ottoman Ambassadors declaring that unless the Balkan delegates by the end of the week accept the Turkish proposals for peace, the Ottoman delegates in London will be instructed to return to Constantinople.

A slight engagement has taken place in the vicinity of Lake Dozlik. The Turks repulsed the Bulgarians who were attempting to cut the telegraph. Thirty wounded have arrived at Constantinople.

It is stated in Vienna that Austria supported by Italy demands the liberation of Scutari, Janina and Prizrend in autonomous Albania.

The Times says that according to information from Bukharest Rumania, as the negotiations with Bulgaria were not making progress, decided on the immediate armed occupation of the territory which she claims as the price of neutrality.

The Austrian and Russian minister remonstrated and succeeded in obtaining a postponement of action for two days.

Some quarters think that this announcement is designed to bluff Bulgaria into yielding. There is every reason to hope that the Powers will not tolerate such a wanton attempt to embroil them.

With the possibility of a critical situation between Rumania and Bulgaria, the arrival in Constantinople of M. Philipescu, Rumanian Minister for Agriculture, excites attention. Action by Rumania at the present moment will certainly stiffen the attitude of the Porte. Reuter learns that conversations between the Rumanian and Bulgarian representatives in London have been resumed and at the conclusion of an interview between M. Mishie and Dr. Danoff the latter telegraphed to Sofia.

The meeting of Ambassadors drafted the text of a Note which will probably be presented to the Porte on Monday. It is understood that the Note is colourless and advises the cession of Adrianople, but that there is no question of pressure.

London, Jan. 11.

The deadlock in the peace negotiations is maintained.

In an interview with Reuter's representative, Reshid Pasha emphasised that Ottomans were determined not to abandon Adrianople nor the Aegean Island. He asked, why should all the concessions emanate from one side. If the Balkan Allies did not accept Turkey's proposals by the end of the week the Turkish delegates would be immediately recalled. He also affirmed that if the Conference was to be reassembled it was a matter for those who abruptly suspended it.

The Ambassadors met again at the Foreign Office on Friday night and sat for two hours.

The Tribuna (Rome) states that the Servian Minister on Thursday formally notified Italy of Servia's decision to withdraw troops from the Adriatic immediately peace was concluded.

The European situation is regarded with growing uneasiness owing to the continued unbending attitude of Turkey and the menacing attitudes of Rumania. All the Powers are decided as to the necessity of Turkey's giving up Adrianople, and have agreed that the Note presented by the Ambassadors at Constantinople shall be followed up by much stronger representation.

The London papers are unanimous in denouncing the action of Rumania, especially at such a critical moment.

The semi-official journal Alir at Sofia approves the suggestion of a London newspaper that Rumania be entrusted with the task of organising the new Albania.

The report of a skirmish at Tchataldja is officially denied in Sofia.

The Bulgarians have mined the coast of the Sea of Marmora.

The Bulgarian Minister of Finance has arrived in St. Petersburg.

London, Jan. 12.

There was no sign on Saturday night of the removal of the deadlock in the Peace Conference or of the settlement of the differences between Bulgaria and Rumania.

The delegates in London declare that they are awaiting the result of the presentation at Constantinople on Monday of the collective Note from the Powers before packing up to leave.

It is understood that the Powers' Note makes it clear that Turkey must yield Adrianople while recommending her to leave the question of the Archipelago to the Powers.

The opinion in Sofia and Cetinje is strongly in favour of a rupture of the negotiations. The Montenegrins are angry at the repeated sorties by Turks at Taraboshi in spite of the armistice.

The Turkish Government has decided to submit the question of peace or war to a great national assembly to be held in the palace on a day to be appointed by the Sultan.

Later,

Reuter learns that the Balkan delegates are only prolonging their stay in London in deference to the Powers and the hope that the Powers' Note to the Porte will moderate Turkey's attitude. Otherwise they will leave London and hostilities will recommence.

London, Jan. 14.

The Conference of Ambassadors was resumed yesterday. There is an impression in Turkish circles in London that the position of the National Assembly will be known to-day when the delegates will leave London as it is impossible to abandon Adrianople. The Ambassadors last night agreed upon a Note which will be presented to the Porte forthwith.

Dr. Daneff and M. Mishu had another conference yesterday on the question at issue between Bulgaria and Rumania. Dr. Daneff declared afterwards that there was nothing that could not easily be arranged.

The presentation of the Note of the Powers has been delayed for a day or two, Germany having made certain comments necessitating the submission of the Note again to the conference of the Ambassadors in London.

Later.

Reuter learns that at a meeting of the Allies this morning it was decided to present Turkey simultaneously with the Powers' Note and a separate communication breaking off the conference and intimating that the Commanders in the field have been instructed to terminate the armistice.

London, Jan. 16.

The exceptions taken by Germany to the Note of the Powers related to a previous draft not to the final one which has already been despatched and would probably be presented on Tuesday or to-day.

The Note of the Balkan States will naturally only take effect if the Porte refuses compliance with the advice of the Powers. It is intended to convey the direct result of such a refusal.

In an interview with Reuter's representative the delegates of the Balkan States said that they were ready to leave England immediately after delivery of the Allies' Note.

Well-informed people in London consider that a little fighting would prove the shortest way to peace, as Adrianople is not expected to be able to resist another attack.

In well-informed quarters there is little hope of avoiding a resumption of hostilities.

Evidently Constantinople is the centre of the hesitations and anxieties, to which international jealousies contribute not a little.

The National Assembly has not met nor has it been even actually convoked. The Porte is fearful of disaster from internal disruption if the Assembly decides on peace and from defeat if it decides on war.

King Ferdinand with his Ministers is proceeding to Mustafa Pasha to meet General Savoff and the Commanders of the four Bulgarian armies.

London, Jan. 16.

An Athens telegram states that the Turkish cruiser Medjidieh escaped from the Dardanelles in the fog on Tuesday night and passed unobserved through the lines of Greek destroyers guarding the entrance to the Straits. She appeared off Syria at noon yesterday and bombarded the powder and coal stores without result. She however wrecked the electric power station, and the town was in darkness last night.

The commander of the Greek auxiliary cruiser Macedonia which was moored at the quay having a rudder repaired sank his ship after landing the crew in order to prevent its being destroyed.

The Medjidieh then sailed for Asia Minor. Two persons were killed during the bombardment of the coal store.

The Allies met to consider the situation and decided to await the Porte's reply to the Powers before presenting their Note. The delegates afterwards had interviews with the Ambassadors.

The date of the presentation of the Note of the Powers at Constantinople is still uncertain. The German Ambassador is awaiting instructions.

The Porte has ordered the delegates to remain in London till the Note is presented. The delegates of the Allies yesterday decided to await the departure of the Turks before leaving.

The Bulgarian-Rumanian difficulty is still unsettled, but it is semi-officially declared in Bucharest that the negotiations are pursuing a normal course and that Rumania will not mobilise.

There are various indications that the project of a naval demonstration has been dropped owing to opposition of the Triple Alliance. It is understood that the European Ambassadors in London strongly condemned the Balkan representatives and not those of Turkey for the present circumstances. The project for a naval demonstration has therefore been dropped at any rate for the time being.

It is semi-officially stated in Rome that Italy concurs in the policy of the Triple Alliance to leave several Aegean islands to Turkey for various grave reasons. Italy maintains that if Turkey knew she was to lose all the islands she would have no interest in helping Italy to restore order in Libya under the provisions of the Treaty of Lausanne which she is now doing very loyally. Moreover Italy wishes to re-establish and develop a whole network of interests in Turkey and is therefore obliged to cultivate good relations with her. The statement says this may be resented by Greece, but Italy can support Greece in other matters.

A semi-official communication published in Athens enumerates repeated pro-Greek demonstrations in the Aegean Islands including the Islands occupied by Italy which it says the Italians have in every case rigorously suppressed.

In view of the reports that there are ten thousand destitute Moslems in Monastir and that thousands of others are suffering extreme hardships around Adrianople and Tchataldja, and further that women and children are starving in villages in Thrace, it has been decided after a meeting of the committee of the Mansion House Relief Fund that a fresh appeal should be made. It is estimated that at least fifty thousand sterling is required to touch even the fringe of the distress. Up to the present only £10,730 has been subscribed.

Alleged Outrages by the Allies. The Bulgarian Record.

(PRESS ASSOCIATION FOREIGN SPECIAL.)

Salonica, Dec. 16.

It is to be hoped that peace will speedily be concluded, as the present strained relations between Greeks and Bulgars are fraught with danger. Some incidents have already ended fatally. The other day, for example, a Greek soldier entering a tramcar brushed against a Bulgarian soldier who had already found a place. The Bulgarian snatched off the Greek's cap and trampled it under foot. The Greek drew his bayonet and killed the Bulgarian.

A Bulgarian band chief named Dumbulakoff is terrorising, pillaging, and murdering Greeks and Turks alike in the Nigrita district, to the north-east of Salonica. He is reported to have entered the Greek church of Ligovani during service, which he interrupted, instructing the priest to pray in future exclusively for the Tsar Ferdinand and to omit the name of the Greek King from his prayers. Dumbulakoff took the Turkish villagers of Ligovani outside the village and made them a target for the rifles of his band, the Greek military "authorities" not daring to interfere because they were too weak and they had been ordered to avoid quarrels with their allies.

Six Mussalmans (four men, a woman, and a child) were found murdered on Saturday morning just outside Salonica.

A Correspondent sends to the "Near East" the account of a curious incident of the war in which five Bulgar komitadjis are alleged to have forced the Ottoman Kaimakam to surrender Cavalla which is a garrisoned town of some 30,000 inhabitants. He suggests that there was a small Slav element of some 150 Bulgars in Cavalla, who had been done away with before the war broke out by the strong and fanatical Greek element in the town with the complicity of the Greek Metropolitan, and that what followed this unbelievable surrender of all the Moslems and Greeks to five Bulgars was done out of revenge for the fate of the 150 Bulgars. He writes:—

"In Cavalla no organised massacres took place. A list of suspects had long been made—some for being connected with the disappearance of the Bulgars, others for acts of oppression and betrayal in the long-drawn-out struggles between the bands in past years.

"Every day prominent Moslems, turbulent Cretan boatmen—the scum of the population—and leading Jews were called away from their houses and led off to a lonely spot near Cavalla where a small building stands on a piece of rising ground. Behind the hill a large ditch had been dug. The one hundred and fifty odd that in batches of twos and threes, had been escorted to the hill had never related what passed within the building. But their bodies, pierced through and through with bayonet thrust, lie heaped up in that ditch, and tell eloquently what their lips can never say."

The following Greek semi-official telegram from Salonica has been published in Athens:—

The detailed inquiry with regard to excesses and crimes committed by the Bulgarian Army shows that they constitute a cause for the disturbances reported during the first days after the surrender of Salonica. According to this inquiry the excesses of the Bulgarians can be divided into three categories—1, damage to property; 2, crimes against the life and honour of private persons, especially Turks; and 3, offences—and these were the less frequent—due to misdirected political interest.

In the majority of cases Bulgarian soldiers and peasants gave themselves up to pillaging. At Vasilikhi, Agia Paraskevi, Apollonia, Allimantia, Gera, Langa, Agioschani, Peristia, Tsimoni, Karaburnu, Vardar, Doiran, and Salonica pillaging and thefts of all loots were committed, the stolen articles including horses, goats, sheep, barley, hay, jewels and other articles of value, large sums of money, carpets, furniture, clothes, and arms. Attacks were made on Austrian subjects, and the Austrian Consulate in consequence lodged an energetic protest. Unspeakable outrages were committed at Seres and at the other towns and villages mentioned above. At Doiran, despite the protests of the municipality, the Bulgarians seized and imprisoned the rich Turkish residents, who, after having secured their liberty by the payment of enormous ransoms, were ambushed by the Bulgarians and massacred, 60 of them being killed.

The political crimes were of little importance, as the greater number of the Bulgarians ardently desire the maintenance of the Balkan Alliance, especially a Greco-Bulgarian Entente, safeguarding their political interests.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, Dec. 14.

If anybody would tell us in what country we are really living, and are likely to live, we should be exceedingly grateful to him. For the time being, although we have some Bulgarian patrols, we are, to all intents and purposes, Greek. Letters coming via the Pirens addressed "Salonica, Turkey," have the last word obliterated by the postal authorities, and "Greece" substituted. In this connection a correspondent in a local paper very pertinently asks why, seeing the real Greeks are not a tenth of the whole population, all official notices of what we may not do are in Greek? Over nine-tenths of the people are of other nationalities, and may be breaking all manner of new rules and regulations in ignorance; whereas, the Turkish authorities had their notices printed in two or three of the local languages, so that all might understand. But if ever a brand new administration did every thing likely to set the component parts of the social edifice against one another, the present administration here is out-doing its prototype. The want of tact, of administrative adaptability, even of common sense is so amazing that one is quite disheartened when contemplating the future of this particular town should it remain under its present control. To the ordinary outsider it would seem the most elementary policy to try and conciliate the different elements of the population: the Jews, who are in the majority; the foreigners, and even the unfortunate Muhammadans. Instead of that, every element, except the Greek, is being rubbed up the wrong way, and made to suffer the greatest inconvenience and feeling of insecurity owing to the general Greek license prevailing throughout. A cock and bull story is got up against the Jews, and in the most senseless manner several are arrested and thrown into prison until the representatives of the Jewish community succeed in bringing home to the authorities the utter stupidity of the accusation. Then these latter wring their hands, say how grieved they are, and make all sorts of excuses, but the authors of the trouble remain unpunished, and all sorts of petty acts of persecution still go on. For instance, some low-class Greek accuses a Jew of having stolen his horse, his watch, his umbrella, even on a rainy day, his—whatever article he covets for the moment; whereupon, the Jew is tried up and "run in," and the Greek is allowed to go off with what he wanted. When appealed to, the authorities say, "But what are we to do?" The reply to this, of course, is, "Learn what your subordinates are doing, leave the Jews alone in peace, and maintain order among your own people. And if a Greek accuses a Jew of doing this, that or the other, then both in, and have the thing at once thrashed out before a magistrate; punishing the guilty one, whether Greek or Jew, instead of letting the former go off with his plunder and punishing the latter."

A Jew, known to your correspondent, had a small coffee house, and playing therein at backgammon, as is the custom in almost every coffee-house in the East, were a Turk and a Jew. In stopped some gendarmes, who accused the tenant of allowing gambling in his coffee-house; trussed him like a fowl for roasting, and marched him off to prison, where he has remained for three weeks, during which time his little place has been sacked and his money appropriated. Fortunately, an influential Jewish gentleman, known to the King, took up the case, and brought it before the higher authorities, who, at least, knew nothing about it, but who maintained it was impossible under the enlightened laws of Greece that a man could be kept in prison for such a length of time without a hearing. The hopeless part of all these cases—and there are far too many such—is that when the authorities are appealed to about them they seem to express all manner of regrets, and piteously ask: "But what are we to do?" The fact is, they do not seem to have any sort of organisation, or of impartial and just government.

Although many refugees have been sent away to Bosnia and elsewhere, a recent census showed that we had still some 100,000 here, and others have since come in. These immigrants are from some thirty-one towns and villages, the average of twenty-nine of them working out to 514 souls. The other two, Istip and Kotschaga, where took place the massacre of Christians two or three months ago, show 6,827 for the former and 6,605 for the latter. These figures speak for themselves, and leave no need for any official inquiry as to what really took place in those two towns; the inhabitants knew the revenge that awaited them and they fled. All the same, they are now being sheltered, fed, and cared for by the British Red Cross Society in an encampment some three or four miles outside the town, where they will probably have to be kept all through the winter, as they dare not go back to their now ruined homes. What the Bulgarians are said to have done in the east the Servians are reported to have done in the west in the district of Pristina, Philan, etc. If what is rumoured be all, or even partly, true, there is nothing to choose between the Balkan Christians and the Turks. We can only trust that what is related is false.

(FROM THE "JEWISH CHRONICLE'S" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, Dec. 25.

The Jewish community is in mourning by reason of the crowning act of a series of attacks upon Jews which have taken place during the last few days, and which have remained unpunished. Yesterday two Jewish merchants were at five o'clock in the afternoon assassinated by Sellenes (? Hellenes) in the open street. Consternation prevails among the whole Jewish community. There are being organised imposing funerals as a mark of protest and indignation.

Alleged Turkish Outrages.

(FROM A "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Gallipoli, Dec. 14.

It has been repeatedly stated during the past few days that since the arrival of Laz and Kurd troops in the Gallipoli district massacres and the burning of villages have taken place almost daily. In spite of the notorious turbulence of the soldiery from the Black Sea, one is slow to take these reports seriously. The majority of the population of this district consist of Greek Christians, and, unfortunately for his own cause, the Greek Christian has shown again and again that he is always on the look-out for profit from the over-ready sympathy of Europe and is always ready to represent as purposeful cruelty and oppression, misfortunes which are sure to befall any community, Moslem or Christian, in a country such as Turkey in time of war.

Nevertheless, though I came to Gallipoli in a spirit of scepticism, I am now bound to admit that the peasantry of this region have been and are still being abominably misused by the troops stationed here. I am not at the time of writing in possession of lists of casualties such as would justify my speaking of a "massacre" because the murders of which I can speak with certainty are of a more or less sporadic nature. But it is quite possible that the very circumstantial reports of wholesale slaughter in six Christian villages are based upon truth, for, up to the present, the people of these villages are unaccounted for. It was first reported on November 28 that the hamlets of Mavrea, Bearamitch, Karatchali, Almali, Grabusa, and Keshan had been burnt. The work was variously ascribed to Bulgarian komitadjis, and—with more appearance of probability—to Laz soldateska—bands of deserters from the Turkish Army, who have formed limited liability brigand companies and have been terrorizing the countryside for a long time. In any case the fate of the wretched villagers is unknown. They may have fled to the mountains; or they may have been butchered as they tried to escape from their burning homes.

Another occurrence, which may, when details can be obtained, come under the head of massacre, and is of a more serious nature in that it would appear to involve more responsible persons than undisciplined Regulars, took place only the day before yesterday. This was the bombardment of the village of Sharkeni. In this case firing seems to have been heard from the hills behind the village, whereupon a Turkish warship was informed that the place was being attacked by Bulgarian komitadjis. The commander, according to several Greek witnesses, took on board all Moslem women and the local Turkish authorities and forthwith opened fire upon the barracks. These barracks were then inhabited by persons whose homes had been destroyed in the earthquake. They had lodged there since August. Many of them are said to have been killed and wounded. They are all Greek Christians, as is almost the entire population of Sharkeni. These, then, are the only two charges of anything approaching the scale of massacre, and there has not yet been sufficient circumstantial evidence to prove either of them. But I mention them because, in the light of atrocities which I already know to be beyond all doubt, they are more than likely to contain at least a substratum of truth.

The whole province of Gallipoli—i.e., the whole peninsula on this side of the Dardanelles—is terrorized by the most unruly troops in the whole Ottoman Army. Not only are the ill-disciplined Lazs and Kurds from Trebizond and Erzurum stationed here but the notorious Adana battalion, the self-styled "Kassap Taburu" (Butcher regiment), which played a great part in the Adana massacres of 1909, is posted on the heights above Iyrgos. Two companies of these fellows have already made a kind of visting round through the neighbouring Greek villages, in the course of which they have amply sustained their evil reputation. A very significant evidence of the conduct of the troops in this neighbourhood is the open sale in cafés and in the streets of Gallipoli of spoons, brasswork, trays, shawls, and such goods, which can only be looted from the farms and small shops of neighbouring hamlets. A Laz irregular, offering for sale a couple of dozen gaudy sashes at a tenth of their value, is hardly likely to convince any impartial purchaser that what he sells he came by in the ordinary course of his military duties. Silver spoons, clocks, and cheap cameras are not included in the equipment of the Ottoman soldier. Yet I could buy any of these at an incriminating price from almost any soldier in this neighbourhood within half an hour from now. The village is already full of fugitives, and to question these is, almost invariably, to elicit a tale of unprovable, but not incredible, atrocities committed by the soldiery.

Without having recourse to witnesses such as these, whose testimony cannot be proved, I can give instances of crimes committed against the employees of reputable Europeans living here. Last Friday a Greek named Yanni, an old servant of the French Vice-Consul here, was arrested on no pretext in the market place of Gallipoli. He was taken to the police-station and there apparently "interrogated" as to the whereabouts of a Greek named Kyriako, reputed to be wealthy. Yanni was his neighbour and was believed to be in his confidence and to know, if not his whereabouts, at least where his money was hidden. According to the statement of his widow, who told me her story this morning in the presence of the Vice-Consul, Yanni knew the whereabouts neither of the man nor of his money, and could not therefore have given any information about either. It is not known what form the "interrogatory" at the hands of the soldiery took. The woman did not see her husband for four days after his arrest. She then went to the Kaimakan to ask for his release. There was no charge against the man. He was a quiet drudge of a fellow, who never mixed in politics and rarely left his farm unless to go to market. The Kaimakan pleaded inability to interfere with the doings of the military. On Wednesday Yanni was dead. His widow described the appearance of his body to me as follows—"He was stripped except for a shirt and his boots and a handkerchief round his head. His arms were bound on his back. They were black. His throat had been cut and the blood from it had soaked the handkerchief."

An equally brutal murder was that of two employees of M. Henri d'Adranal, brother of the French Vice Consul. These men, Alexis Nano and his son, lived at the village of Kyreski, where the elder Nano kept a small shop. He was known to be possessed of money and was killed by a band of Laz irregulars which continues to insist that district and to terrorize the peasantry. When inquiries were first made concerning the death of the two men, the Turkish authorities denied all knowledge. Later it was given out that Nano and his son, being found abroad at night after the hour at which martial law decrees that all civilians must remain indoors, were shot by the patrol. As a matter of fact, eye-witnesses declare that the man's house was broken open by the soldiers after he had locked himself up in it, and that he and his son were dragged out into the street and there decapitated. Cases of the beating and torture of villagers to make them give up money are common. It is the practice of the soldiery to force an entry into houses, under the pretext of searching for hidden weapons, and thereafter to steal or destroy as they please. There is no remedy.

Some days ago the French Vice-Consul reported to the civil authorities here that the bodies of three men were lying by the roadside at some little distance from the town. He asked that they should be identified, believing that they might be the bodies of French subjects. In reply he was smilingly told that he was under a delusion. The "bodies" were the carcasses of dead bullocks and had already been removed. Two days ago three bodies, now quite unrecognizable, were washed up by the sea.

It needs only a visit of a few hours to this district to show that the non-combatant peasants are in a state of terror, and investigation proves that, with all allowance for Greek timidity and chingunousness, that terror is well founded. There is no doubt that the people are being robbed, tortured, and killed every day. The important question remains, is the treatment to which they are subjected merely the outcome of lack of discipline among the troops, or is it—for this is the theory seriously advanced by responsible persons here—part of a deliberate attempt on the part of the authorities to fill the place of the Greek element with Turkish fugitive peasants from the interior? One hesitates to give any credence to this charge, which seems characteristic of the Greek mind; yet one is almost overcome by the series of circumstances which lend it strength. It has long been a grievance with the Turks that both agriculture and commerce in this fertile province are mainly in Greek hands. The soil, favourable to viticulture, affords little scope for the growth of cereals. Moslem agricultural industry is therefore hampered, while the Christian thrives. In towns and villages, as elsewhere, the Turkish shopkeeper or small trader has no chance against the Greek. There is not a Turkish merchant in all Gallipoli. The fact that Greek has ousted Turk here has more than once been unfavourably commented on by Turkish officials. At the present moment, when destitute Turkish fugitives are still pouring in from Thrace and Macedonia, there is some chance of repopulating this province with Turkish stock. To do this one must thin the Christian population; and the unshakeable conviction of Greeks here is that this is being deliberately done by turning loose the unruly companies of Kurds and Lazs. Chance can hardly be responsible for this assembly of the most fanatical and turbulent Turkish troops in the district of all others where they have no sympathy with the population. The Greeks here naturally sympathize with the Hellenic cause. They would not be human if they did not. The troops stationed here would at the best entertain strong race and religious antipathies towards them. At present these antipathies are at the highest pitch. Nothing has been done to soften them. A massacre on a large scale would, as the Christians say, make room for a Moslem population, and, whether that is to come or not, murder, robbery, torture, and theft are daily committed by the Kurd and the Laz.

Gallipoli, Dec. 17.

Seven Jews, fugitives from Sharkeni, are here, having come in a small boat, leaving behind them all goods and merchandise; and bringing a detailed account of the bombardment and killing of villagers which took place five days ago. They say that on December 12 five envoys from a band of komitadjis came to Sharkeni and called upon the Governor to surrender the village. Their comrades, reputed to be over a thousand strong, were lying up in the hills behind Sharkeni, awaiting an answer, and prepared to attack if no surrender were made. It appears that the Governor temporized with the envoys, and immediately telegraphed for help to Gallipoli, whence 850 Lazs were sent off in a gunboat. According to the Jewish fugitives these men had no sooner disembarked than they began firing right and left among the villagers. The testimony of the fugitives has been embodied by the French Vice-Consul in a report, and, save in respect of the numbers killed and wounded, bears the stamp of truth.

It is more than probable that the komitadjis band contained numbers of Greek insurgents; probably the former inhabitants of Keshan, Mavres, and the rest of that string of depopulated villages to which I referred in my last message. There are, beyond doubt, many gangs of Christian franca-tireurs who ally themselves with the Bulgarian komitadjis. This may explain why the Lazs, on their arrival, went to work as though they had been sent, not to defend the village, but to suppress a rising of the villagers. They are said to have killed and wounded between 50 and 60 harmless people, and to have robbed everyone worth robbing. The komitadjis opened fire from their position on the hills, accounting for five or six of the Lazs; and the gunboat, having taken on board the Governor, the official staff and a number of Moslem women, joined in the fray, bombarding the hills, and, incidentally, the barracks in which the peasants had taken refuge. In the evening the Laz soldiery were re-embarked and the boat went away. Since then 300 more Lazs have been sent overland to Sharkeni.

The reply of local Turkish officialdom to charges of theft and murder made against the troops is interesting. Yesterday I called on the chief civil and military authorities of Gallipoli, and, without breaching the subject myself, was told that in the first place (khan, heaven!) there had been no outrages here; and that, in the second, regrettable incidents of that kind always did take place in time of war. The somewhat Irish charm of this unsolicited confidence was enhanced by an inquiry as to whether I had not come across evidence of similar atrocities committed by the Bulgarians.

I should have liked to test the truth of these denials and explanations, but instead I am forbidden to visit any of the villages from which come stories of murder, robbery, and burning. Neither may I visit any of the districts of the interior in which the troops complained of are stationed. I may only ride abroad under the escort of two mounted gendarmes; and these men are very definitely instructed as to what I may be permitted and what I may not be permitted to see. So, even with ostentation, they led me out yesterday, through deserted vineyards, past empty farmsteads, across country now suggesting forlorn and tattered Turkish landscapes, and revealing mountain country finer than the north of Wales, until at last we came into a village, Kabakli.

At Kabakli some thirty Greek souls remain. The hamlet, large and straggling, was much dismantled by the earthquake of July. A battalion of Turkish soldiers is camped here; but these men are the old Redifs. Neither Laz nor Kurd is to be found within a great distance of Kabakli. I wished to visit some station of the Laas. I should have liked to go to Bulair, because there, I know, things have happened which it is well worth the while of the Turks to conceal. However, my escort had their orders, and might not take me there. Instead, I was encouraged to question the villagers of Kabakli. True to their breed, these latter are inveterate tale-bearers. But they had nothing worse to tell of the troops quartered among them than that they were apt to take fodder, straw, and fuel without paying. Throughout my visit to this village I had a discreditable but persistent suspicion that I had been brought as a school-inspector may artlessly be brought into contact with the most promising class. The refusal to let me visit the Laas encampments, or the villages of Bulair, Sharkeni, Mavres, and the rest of the scenes of so-called "massacres" is in itself an admission that there, at least, is to be found some justification for the complaints of the Christian peasants.

Returning, I traversed the entire length of the village of Gallipoli. The earthquake has done much damage. Most of the houses still standing have cracked walls and crumpled roofs. Not a minaret remains. Many buildings are so twisted and tilted as to give the effect of a violently distorted perspective. The main street is badly out of drawing. But earthquake effects are hardly responsible for the fact that a good half of the shops and houses still standing are no longer inhabited. Neither can it be against another earthquake that so many of the inhabitants bar their doors, shutter their windows, and sleep with firearms loaded and ready to hand.

Some few of the men from the Black Sea shore are still posted in the town. One easily distinguishes the Laas from the ordinary Turkish soldier. The Laas is doubly and trebly belted with cartridges. He wears two knives—"throat-slitters"—in a double sheath, not unlike that of the Highlanders' sean-dubh; and he is never without a sword. His bearing is alertly predatory; and his rifle, even in the streets of a town, never leaves his hand. I passed two or three groups of these men in the street, and noted that they enjoyed a decided isolation.

When I came to the house in which I am lodged my entry was a little delayed. The sound of horses hoofs and the sight of the uniforms of my escort had sent the women of the house flying to hide in the cellars, whence they emerged fearfully and with hesitation. Until my arrival here—they believe the presence of a European to be some safeguard—these Greek women have led a life of terror, cowering in rubble-choked cellars in dread—although they do not know the phrase a "brutal and licentious soldiery."

The British Attitude.

Franz Honorary Secretary of the London Moslem League has addressed the following letter to the British Press:—

The Committee of the London All-India Moslem League solicits the courtesy of your columns, to give public expression to their conviction that, having regard to Sir Edward Grey's assurance of England's absolute impartiality, a heavy responsibility lies on British publicists and politicians not to damage the prospects of peace by partisan utterances calculated to encourage an uncompromising attitude on one side or to create resentment on the other. When a Peace Conference assembles it is with the object of finding bases of settlement on mutual compromise and conciliation. That was the rule observed when the Treaty of Portsmouth was concluded, which brought to a close the Russo-Japanese War. Whilst the discussion are proceeding we conceive it to be the duty not merely of the combatants but of their respective backers to use as little provocative and minatory language as is possible. On the present occasion an important section of the Press of England, a professedly neutral country, instead of showing moderation and a spirit of conciliation and compromise on both sides, has, whilst encouraging the winners, indulged towards the losers in language lacking in both dignity and impartiality. The Journal has been particularly unfortunate in its expressions and prejudged the discussions by referring to the haggling of the "loser."

By allowing the Conference to be held in the metropolis of the British Empire, England has constituted herself the peacemaker and in some sense the umpire in this present war. If it be her desire to prevent further hatred and suffering, the achievement of which will undoubtedly earn for her universal gratitude, she must endeavour through her Press and her public men to hold the balance evenly. To place the Allies in a position to urge claims which the Turks cannot either with honour or with safety to themselves accede to, is helping the deliberate wrecking of the peace proposals. Turkey must concede much; but there is a point beyond which she cannot go without the loss of that honour which alone constitutes the life of a nation. To place before her the alternative of a moral death and the abandonment of what she considers to be essential for her safety, or a continuance of the war is hardly consistent with the attitude of a peacemaker.

England's neutrality in this war has been but nominal; not only have Ministers of the Crown used language calculated to encourage one set of combatants, but infractions of the King's ordinances are reported to have been permitted in disregard of the rule laid down in the "Alabama" case.

The council of the All-India Moslem League a little while ago adopted at Lucknow a resolution that the Guild-hall speech of the Prime Minister "had shocked the feelings of the loyal Muhammadan subjects of the Empire." These words have drawn upon the Council, from a quarter usually considered as the champion of fair play, the following remark: "It strikes me that these worthy people had better get over their shock as soon as they can."

We have no doubt that the Council of that great and representative Moslem organisation have already recovered from the shock, but will England recover as quickly what she has lost—the confidence and trust of the Moslem peoples in the sense of justice of the British nation?

The French Attitude.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, Dec. 22.

Statement by M. Poincaré.

THE declarations of the Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Poincaré, in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate yesterday were chiefly remarkable for four points. The first was the information by which he supplemented the statement issued in London regarding the results of the Ambassadors' deliberations. Regarding the future of Albania, he said textually:—"It is agreed that the autonomy of Albania constituted under the sovereignty, or, rather, I think, under the suzerainty of the Sultan, shall be under the supervision of (contrôle par) the Great Powers, including France." Regarding the Serbian port on the Adriatic, he said textually:—"It is likewise agreed that the port opened to Serbia on Albanian territory shall be free and neutral, and it shall be served by an international railway under the same European supervision, with freedom of transit for all merchandise, including munitions of war. Serbia will besides have the benefit of freedom from Customs duties."

M. Poincaré was able to state that all the Great Powers were disposed to accept these proposals, and he thought he could add that Serbia would follow their advice. He was therefore justified in asserting that the Ambassadors seemed to have succeeded in eliminating one of the chief causes of European discord.

The rest of the Prime Minister's statement in the Chamber was mainly a very clear and able survey of the course of the crisis up to date. He took occasion to emphasize the persistence and efficacy of the Russian alliance and Entente with Great Britain, and also the fact that none of the Powers of the Triple Entente had desired to complicate the difficulties of the hour by systematically opposing to one another the two great political groups. Throughout the speech there was a manifest strain of sympathy for the Balkan States, and speaking of Serbia M. Poincaré said:—"If in the interest of the peace of Europe she is asked to sacrifice some of her ambitions, it is, to say the least, just and necessary to obtain for her full room to live and breathe."

He concluded by calling attention to the danger of general conflagration, which might result from the rupture of negotiation between the Balkan Allies and Turkey. In case of rupture Europe would doubtless revert to her original idea of mediation, which, it will be remembered, was formulated under the auspices of M. Poincaré himself. France in any case would continue to support with all her might, and, if necessary, to evoke the endeavours of the Powers on behalf of peace. At the same time she remained firmly determined to defend her interests and her rights, to maintain "the great traditions of France in the East, and safeguard, above all, that sacred heritage, the national honour."

It had been supposed that M. Poincaré would delay for some days his statement on foreign affairs to the Senate, but he evidently thought it best to complete what is always a difficult task at once. In the Senate his references to the aspirations and achievements of the Balkan nationalities were even more emphatic than in the Chamber. He traced the rise of modern Serbia from the patriotic ideas of Kisa Garaschawine in 1844, through the efforts of Michael Obrenovitch, after 1860, and recalled how those aspirations had appealed to Frenchmen like Lamartine, Michelet, Victor Hugo, and Gambetta, and he referred to an enthusiastic letter written by Gambetta on the Serbian question in 1874. France would be denying her generous traditions if she did not regard with sympathy the efforts of these rising nations. The most natural and most equitable solution of the problem—the solution which offered the best prospects of permanence and stability—was that the Balkans should henceforth belong to the Balkan peoples—the Bulgarians, the Greeks, the Servians, the Montenegrins, and the Albanians.

He reminded Turkey that although she must now inevitably lose a very great part of her European territory, she would still have a flourishing Empire of considerable extent in Asia, and that she ought to concentrate her efforts and her hopes upon that Empire, a course which would enable her to live on terms of friendship with the great European Powers, and particularly with France. In this connexion he advised Turkey to give heed to the representations which for many months past the French Ambassador in Constantinople had been making in agreement with the Powers in favour of reforms in the Lebanon. "I need hardly tell the Senate," he continued, "that in the Lebanon, and particularly in Syria, we have traditional interests, and that we mean to see that they are respected." There had been no differences between the British and French Governments on this point. "The British Government has declared to us in a very friendly manner that it has no intention of acting, and that it has neither political designs nor aspirations of any kind in these regions." The French Government was very firmly determined to maintain in Asia the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, but it would not abandon any of its traditions in that part of the world, it would not repudiate any of the sympathies which it had acquired there, it would not allow any of its interests there to suffer. If war unhappily were reopened in the Balkans France would resume without discouragement her effort for conciliation. She would do her best to prevent the conflagration from extending to the rest of Europe, but at the same time she would remain ready with patriotic energy to defend against any assault her influence in the East and the prestige of the French name.

The "Times" Support.

The "Times" supports M. Poincaré's statements about French interests in Syria in a leading article. It says:—"We are glad that M. Poincaré has specifically denied that there have been any differences between Great Britain and France in regard to Syria and the Lebanon. The British Government, he was able to assure the Senate, have declared to the French Government in a very friendly form that they have neither political designs nor aspirations of any kind there. This statement, it may be hoped, will put an end to the systematic circulation in certain French newspapers of the wild stories of British intrigue in these regions, which they have made a prominent feature in their issues since the beginning of the present crisis."

French Claims in Syria.

Paris, Dec. 23.

The reference in your leading article to-day to M. Poincaré's observations on the subject of the special French interests in Syria and the Lebanon causes great satisfaction, and the Temps fires a kind of feu joyeux in the shape of a two and a-half column article on the subject of France and Syria. After once more noting M. Poincaré's declaration regarding the attitude of the British Government, the Temps proceeds:—

French opinion will, no doubt, consider it a great success to have obtained from Great Britain no distinct a recognition of French interests in Syria and in the Lebanon. All those who are acquainted with the affairs of the East have long desired that a conversation on this subject should be opened between Paris and London, and no one could have wished for a more favourable issue of that conversation.

A sketch is given of the recent efforts of France to assert her influence in Syria, and it appears that in 1905 Sir Edward Grey and M. Paul Cambon had "worked out various agreements on this subject." The French Embassy at Constantinople, however, declared that these could not be carried out. What M. Poincaré now has in view is, to begin with, to ensure the execution of the scheme of reforms in the Lebanon. According to the Temps, the French Embassy at Constantinople "seems never to have understood the general bearing of this scheme any more than it appears to realize what French policy in Syria ought to be." It is pointed out that the elected Council of the Lebanon has 12 members, of whom eight were elected in consequence of the support of French diplomacy, but none of the eight speaks French. Similarly, the last ad interim President of the Lebanon Council, "who was also maintained by French support," did not know a word of French. Yet French, it is claimed, is the official language, and was formerly employed in the correspondence of the Governor with the Porte. French diplomacy has not even succeeded in obtaining in reasonable time the names of the candidates proposed by the Porte for the Governorship. The new statute, drawn up by the Porte with the help of the last Governor, Yussuf Franco, in response to complaints of the Lebanon Committees, is described as most unsatisfactory. The leading Maronites, "devoted to the French cause," do not find their attitude or the "moral and material instruments which they hold in reserve" appreciated or turned to proper account by French diplomacy. M. Poincaré is going to change all that, and the Temps thinks that his policy in obtaining British assurances regarding the special nature of French interests in those regions, "which are, above all, moral interests," represents "good diplomatic business, wisely conceived and methodically pursued."

Three weeks ago the Temps published a letter from Beirut on British propaganda in Syria containing most extraordinary charges with regard to the action of the commander of the cruiser "Barham," anchored off Tripoli, in Syria, who told the Governor that if he had to land bluejackets they would only be relieved by British troops, who would come to stay. It was further stated that Lord Kitchener's secretary had been at Beirut and had visited Damascus, Jaffa, and Haifa, where meetings of Mussalmans were held in his presence. Everywhere the object in view was a rising, massacres, and an appeal for British intervention. The French colony and the French Syrian protégés were deeply stirred by this "audacious propaganda," which they were vigorously resisting with the desire that France should permit no change in the traditional connexion.

It is not stated whether the Temps gave any credence to these reports or whether they are connected with its satisfaction at M. Poincaré's declarations. Curiously enough, the Excelsior yesterday published illustrations of "the French influence in Syria"—reproductions of photographs showing a reception of the battleship Henri IV. by the Maronite Patriarch and that vessel anchored at Beirut.

New Governor of the Lebanon.

Constantinople, Dec. 23.

The Ambassadors of the Great Powers and Nouradunghian Effendi, Minister for Foreign Affairs, to-day signed the protocol of the Lebanon Convention. Ohannes Bey Kouyoumdjian, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, an Armenian and a Catholic, has been appointed Governor of the Lebanon for five years, with the approval of the six Powers.

The protocol introduces various modifications in the Organic Statute of the Province. It makes certain alterations in the mode of elections to the Administrative Council, the membership of which is increased by the addition of a Maronite delegate for the district of Dar-ul-Kamar and a Druse delegate for the district of the Shouf. The Budget is submitted to the control of the Administrative Council, and the police force is increased to a total of 1,200 men. The protocol further declares the old accounts with the Government to be the subject of definite liquidation. In a separate note the opening of the two ports is agreed to—one for the Maronites and the other for the Druses.

The Lebanon Militia.

Paris, Dec. 26.

The Temps, which is evidently "partant pour la Syrie," returns to the subject of the new statute for Lebanon, and has a great many more or less relevant criticisms to pass upon it. One of the things which it notices is that the increased Lebanon militia is to have attached to it "one of the foreign officers entrusted with the reorganization of the Gendarmerie in Turkey." Now the majority of these officers are Italians or Germans. The Temps would hope that "there has been no thought of confiding to any save Frenchmen the duty of instructing the Lebanon militia. The first instructors of that militia were French officers directly called in by the Lebanon. Did no one know this in French quarters at Constantinople? Was there any reason for fresh arrangements inferior to the old arrangements? Let the Lebanon have the free disposal of its resources, and it will police itself."

It will be seen that these criticisms, like some preceding ones, take the form of an attack on the French Embassy at Constantinople.

Naval Engagements.

(FROM THE "ENVOYER HERALD" CORRESPONDENT.)

Smyrna, Dec. 15.

I have just arrived in Smyrna from Constantinople and am in a position to deny the reports spread concerning the Turkish Bala.

We saw the Torghout Reiss in perfect condition at Nagara.

On the night of the 13th, four torpedo boats went out of the straits; we met them coming on the morning of 14th.

On the 14th at 11 A. M. the Medjidie went out alone, we were following. She went out at full speed as far as the eastern shore of Imbros and returned shortly afterwards and waited under Capo Hellas.

Eight Greek torpedo boats came up. After a furious cannonade, the Medjidie made them turn tail. Two of them were damaged, I believe, as steam was rising. Later, two other torpedo boats and one submarine came out full speed, backed up by the rest of the torpedo flotilla. There was a regular pandemonium of firing and then sudden silence and a big black cloud rising off the Sea.

The Medjidie put up a splendid fight against 10 torpedo boats and 1 submarine. It is a pity she did not retire after having beaten 8 torpedo boats off in the first engagement. She could have done so with honour and also it would then have encouraged the rest of the fleet to dash out on another day.

If only some of the other boats that remained skulking in safety at Nagara had been in attendance with her it might have been a very different story.

(THE "AGENCE OTTOMANE.")

According to a telegram addressed by the Commander of the fleet to the Generalissimo, the Turkish fleet made a victorious sortie from the Dardanelles on the 16th December.

The Turkish squadron went out of the straits towards half past eight in the morning and engaged the Greek fleet. An artillery duel took place at distances ranging from 3,200 to 7,750 metres. The battle lasted an hour and a half and the "Averoff" was struck by 3 or 4 Turkish projectiles, and some of her guns were silenced. The Greek fleet eventually fled in the direction of the Piræus.

The Turkish men-of-war sustained no damage and the officers and men displayed great courage in the accomplishment of their duty.

Constantinople, Dec. 20

The late Grand Vizier, Ghazi Ahmed Mukhtar Pasha, yesterday presented to the Sultan the commander of the battleship Kheyr ed-Din Barbarossa, who gave His Majesty details of the recent naval engagement with the Greeks off the Dardanelles. The Sultan expressed himself greatly pleased with the behaviour of the Turkish officers and men, and ordered his salutations to be conveyed to them. At the same time he presented the Kheyr ed Din Barbarossa with the historic flag which was flown by the battleship Mahmudieh when she bombarded Sevastopol.

Constantinople, Dec. 19.

Interest in the war with Greece has been stimulated by the naval demonstration made by the Greek fleet off the Dardanelles on Monday. The Turkish fleet steamed out of the Straits in the early morning and was fired upon first by some Greek small craft, and later by the main Greek squadron, including the "Averoff." According to eye-witnesses who watched the fight from foreign merchantmen or passenger steamers and from the shore, the fire of the Turkish fleet was not very accurate, but that of the Greeks was detestably bad. In fact, during the hour and a half of firing that followed the emergence of the Turkish fleet they scored only one hit, and that a trivial one, on the Turkish flagship. Finally they withdrew. The "Averoff" seems to have been hit, though the nature and extent of the damage, if any, that was done her is a matter for conjecture. The whole affair was unimportant from the military point of view, but has cheered up the Turkish fleet, which now realises that the Greeks are the reverse of expert gunners. One of the passenger steamers which watched the engagement carried on board the Indian Red Crescent Mission, composed of Moslem and Brahman doctors, which has since arrived here. Its arrival has been saluted by the Turkish Press as a further proof of the sympathies of Hindustan for the Ottoman cause.

Turkish Successes.

It is officially announced that according to a telegram received from the commander of the forces at Jannina, the Greek sustained considerable losses in the battle which quite recently took place on the Hondrahi Derelki line to the east of Jannina. The Greek were driven back in the direction of Papsa Kenpru and Kanber Agha.

The Greek forces were composed of two regiments of infantry, numerous bands and a battery of mountain artillery.

According to a telegram from the Commander of the Western Army under date December 13, the Turks made a violent attack against the enemy's forces landed at Ayia Saranta which retreated in great disorder after having sustained severe losses.

The forces of the enemy consisted of regulars and bands with a battery of mountain artillery and machine-guns.

At the time of telegraphing the Ottoman forces were pursuing the Greeks in the direction of Santi Quaranta and Himara.

According to a Vienna telegram to the "Agence Ottomane," advices from Cattaro report that it may be taken for granted that Scutari will not surrender. The re-victualling of the Montenegrins is becoming extremely difficult if not impossible.

The Campaign in Epirus.

The Hellenic military authorities have communicated some details concerning the recent movements in the only remaining theatre of operations south of Scutari in the west. After their defeat last month at Monastir by the Servians the Turks drew off southward in the direction of Koritza and Yanina. The retreating Turks were hard pressed by the Greeks near Florina and lost a number of guns and prisoners, but succeeded in rallying at Koritza, which they occupied in some strength. Ali Riza Pasha, after restoring the Turkish organization at Koritza, marched south to Yanina with some 20,000 Regulars. Djavid Pasha was left with about the same number at Koritza, but on December 13 or 14 he also retired upon Yanina with 5,000 men. The remainder of the Turks, two days later, attacked the Greek cavalry at Bikhista. They were repulsed, and the Hellenic troops, concentrating from Florina and from Kastoria via Kostenitza attacked the Turks, who held the crest of the Morava Planina and the Zangoni gorge. The Greek attack was made on December 19, and after suffering considerable losses the Hellenic Army under General Damianos forced the defile and drove the Turks south and west beyond Koritza, which was occupied in force. Part of the defeated army retired in the direction of Yanina being pursued by the Greeks, but the majority dispersed among the hills. Three of the few remaining Turkish guns were captured.

In the Yanina district Essad Pasha's force of between 10,000 and 12,000 Regulars, reinforced by the remnants of the two Turkish armies from the north under Ali Riza Pasha and Djavid Pasha, had intrenched itself in a crescent-shaped position to the south of Yanina, the two horns of the crescent resting on the mountains to the north of that place. The Turkish lines ran through Bezhanli, Rapsista, Peristeri, Bezduni, and Kastritza. To the south of these lay the Greeks under General Saponitzakis, between Dodona and Kritovo, with a small mixed force under Riciotti Garibaldi at Drisko on the Yanina-Metsovo road. On December 20, 21, and 22 the Turks made a series of attacks on the Hellenic lines. On the first day there was serious fighting on the Greek left at Dodona, and after a whole day's engagement, during which the Greek divisional commander lost his only son and Djavid Pasha is believed to have been killed, the Turks were repulsed, on the second day (Saturday) the attack was general all along the line, but again the Turks were unsuccessful, and on Sunday a final assault on the Greek centre at St. Nicholas led to the same result. The Turks have now retired behind their positions, and the Greeks are expecting their Northern Army to advance from Koritza, while further reinforcements are moving westwards along the Metsovo road towards Drisko. The campaign in Epirus thus bids fair to be localized within a few days in an investment of the last remaining Turkish Field Force in Europe in the immediate vicinity of Yanina.

A Terrible Incident at Derkos.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

When an army is holding a defended front of nearly 40 miles it is almost impossible to have at once an accurate and detailed account of all that happens during any given phase of the operations. The staff of the army itself is as often as not at sea. It is therefore only to be expected that certain incidents during the fighting at the Tekstallja Lines should only be coming out now. Reports from Constantinople state that on the 17th of last month the Bulgarians began their attack upon the Turkish lines with a very heavy morning assault upon the most advanced fort at the northern end of the lines. At the time very little was said about the happenings on this flank. Both the Bulgarians and the Turks had reason to keep quiet concerning the early morning incident. The country just south of the Derkos inlet is very broken, hilly, and wooded. The approaches, therefore, to the Derkos fort are masked by a large area of scrub, which it would be impossible for any army to clear satisfactorily. Before it was light on the morning of the 17th a company of Bulgarians crept up the glades and overpowered the night outposts. They bayoneted every living soul in the work.

There was a thick fog at the time. The Bulgarians had barely established themselves in this bloody manner when the Turkish commandant, who for some reason had been away during the night, returned to this post. He and his adjutant, when he reached the reverse of the work, realised that something was wrong. Hidden by the mist they galloped back to the camp where the fortress reserves were lying. The reserve of this particular work was a Kurdish battalion which has just arrived from Anatolia. On hearing the commandant's fears the Colonel of the Kurdish battalion called out his command and, under cover of the mist, marched his men silently to the reverse of the work. They in turn fell upon the Bulgarians, who were resting upon their success and piling the dead bodies of the garrison up as a breastwork. It needs no special powers to imagine how the Kurds took vengeance.

Before the work was retaken the Bulgarians had sent back word of their success. Shortly after daybreak a wind sprang up from the direction of the Black Sea and blew the mists away. The head of the Bulgarian brigade debouched from the cover of the Darkos woods and began to march confidently up to the position which they believed was theirs. The Kurdish colonel had been waiting for this, and his rifles dealt a fearful punishment to the Bulgarian brigade.

Red Crescent Work at Constantinople.

The following is an extract from a letter received by the President of the British Red Crescent Society from Dr. Clemow, Physician to the British Embassy at Constantinople—

I should like to add a word of the very warmest appreciation of the work that the Turkish Red Crescent Society has done here. One of the members told me a day or two ago that he had heard that some unfavourable mention of it had been made in some English paper or papers. I cannot conceive anything more unjust or contrary to the fact. The Society has acted with an untiring zeal that has aroused the admiration of all of us here; it has co-operated in the most generous way with the various local and foreign organisations for helping the wounded and sufferers from this terrible war; and it would be a monstrous thing that any adverse criticism of its work should be published in England, or, if published, that it should remain without contradiction. Should you hear any adverse criticism I would beg you to contradict it, not only on my authority, but also on that of the members of the British Red Cross Mission here, who are as annoyed as myself that such false statements should be made.

British Relief Work at Constantinople.

The following is an extract from a letter from Lady Lowther to H. E. the Viceroy, dated the 12th December, 1912, which His Excellency has kindly sent to us—

In the midst of the severe task which we have taken upon ourselves your sympathy and help is the greatest encouragement.

We have about 3,000 women and children, destitute soldiers' families, whose bread-winner is at the front, wounded or dead. We have 3,000 women and children refugees in mosques and camping near the gates and 2,000 women and children under our "Special Refugees Sub-Committee" lodged in houses and places where we can have complete control and care of them—and which we hope to increase to over 5,000—and to keep alive through the winter.

We have, with the kind efforts of all, collected over £18,000, the largest sum I believe collected in this war for a single country, but it is small compared to the numbers—the Prefect reports 150,000 refugees who need what he can give—however, half-naked, half-starving as they are—impossible as it may seem.

Only this evening I heard of several hundred refugee women and children abandoned on the icy hills between the town and Tehtaldja, without food or shelter for days—too weak to struggle on.

Also, it is a city of horrors, though it smiles like a city of dreams.

Fighting appears very simple to those outside the area; it is only we—in the heart of the volcano—who know what pain and despair comes with it. As our need is great, so our gratitude is great. Will you be so very good as to cause to be conveyed to Lord Carmichael and to Lord Pentland all my sincerest thanks, also to His Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad whose noble gift is truly appreciated and to Nawab Salar Jung Bahadur whose Begum also sent some most generous donation separately acknowledged.

May I add also Sir George Roos-Keppl and all the other subscribers mentioned in your list of November 18th, 1912.

I wish I could thank them myself, but the relief and joy their kindness is bringing to shivering and starving thousands will be a greater reward than any gratitude I can express.

A Genuine Book Bargain.The Mameluke of Slave Dynasty of Egypt from 1260-1517 A.D.

[When the Caliphs of Baghdad were no longer able to retain the territories, conquered by their predecessors, they bought multitudes of Slave from the Tribes of Central Africa and trained them as soldiers to fight their battles. The same policy was pursued in Egypt by the Fatimide Caliphs, and after them by the Eyubite dynasty. The military slaves thus introduced were called Mamelukes. They soon began to lord it over the native inhabitants, and from them arose the Sultans who governed Egypt for two and a half centuries].

DEAR SIRS,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

Mongolia, acting quite independently, entered into the Russo-Mongolian treaty with the object of preserving her historic position against China. Kutukhka warns China against harbouring any intention of deciding the question by force of arms.

All-India Moslem League.

At a meeting of the Council of the All-India Moslem League on the 19th January, 1913, the Hon Mr Shafi, Barrister, Lahore, was elected President for the next annual sessions of the All-India Moslem League. The League's sessions will be held at Lucknow on the 22nd and 23rd March, 1913. The Honorary Secretary of the Central League has been authorised to revive the U. P. Moslem League.

The McCormick Case.

The sequel to the Arnold case, in which Mr. Canning Arnold applied for sanction to prosecute Captain Andrew McLean Finnie, District Superintendent of Police, Meiktila, on a charge of perjury in the Arnold trial, was before the Chief Judge on the 16th January 1913. Mr C. Campagne on behalf of the petitioner argued that the matter for admission, the circumstances out of which the application arose were fresh in the court's mind and he detailed so much of them as were necessary for his argument. Mr Arnold was convicted of defaming Mr Andrew and sentenced by His Honour to one year's rigorous imprisonment. Captain Finnie was a witness for the prosecution. Counsel entered into further facts and then proceeded to refer to Doctor Evers' evidence at the session trial, where he swore that he did arrive at the Victoria Point on 22nd July 1911, that he saw Captain Finnie frequently, that he spoke to Finnie and asked him whether he wished him to examine the girl, and Captain Finnie said "No, it is not necessary." He swore further that he went for a trip while he was staying at Victoria Point with Finnie, and that the latter had dropped him at Mahwani and returned on the afternoon of the 27th, that he on July 31st travelled back with Finnie to Mergui in the Government launch "Mercury." Counsel filed an affidavit by the wife of Mr. A. W. Buchanan, now Treasury Officer of Moulmein, and in 1911 of Victoria Point, to the effect that Dr. Evers frequently visited her husband at Victoria Point in July 1911. Counsel then proceeded to show that Captain Finnie saw Dr. Evers at Victoria Point although he denied it all through. Counsel submitted that it was the purpose of Captain Finnie to make the court believe that he never saw Evers, and that he had no opportunity of consulting him, and that he did not arrive till Captain Finnie left Victoria Point. Counsel submitted it had been established beyond reasonable doubt that Evers was at Victoria Point, and that Finnie knew that Evers had been asking to go to Victoria Point to bring the microscope and slides. That was established by the exhibit of Captain Finnie's own diaries.

Continuing, counsel said that there would be only one matter for His Honour to consider and that was whether or not his prosecution was in the interests of public justice. Counsel submitted that His Honour would have very little difficulty in determining whether Finnie had committed perjury, and that sanction should be granted.

The Week.

Mogador.

Two French are organising a big movement to quell anarchy coupled with treachery in Mogador country. Sharp fighting occurred on January 18th near Mogador. The Moors lost 500 killed and French casualties were twelve killed and sixty wounded.

Two French columns which have been heavily engaged with the Moors who are in revolt have returned to Mogador in a most exhausted condition, their casualties being 23 killed and 26 wounded.

Mongolia.

A telegram to the Times from St. Petersburg states that the Mongolian Mission will remain there for two or three weeks, and will be received by the Tsar, Premier and other Ministers. The head of the Mission is a firm Russo-phil and the recent treaty between Russia and Mongolia was concluded under his auspices when he visited Russia in 1911.

The Mongolian Mission paid a visit on the 15th instant to M. Sazonov, the Russian Minister, the interview lasting half an hour. The Tsar will receive the Mission on Saturday.

A telegram from Urga states that Kutukhka, in answering a telegram of Kuusshikai, sent in October, urging a China-Mongolian union, says there can be no question of a union. He says that Finnie was head of the police in Mentila district. He had to work up cases every day against the people. He had to give evidence in courts of law, and by reason of his being a Captain and Superintendent of Police there was great reliance placed on him.

There was, counsel submitted, no excuse for him. He did not make the statement once but he adhered to it all through, and counsel submitted that there were sufficient grounds for this court to grant sanction. Counsel asked the court to admit the application.

The Chief Judge passed orders. His Honour said, looking at all of Finnie's statements in connection with Dr. Evers, it was evident that those set out in the petition were based on his memory only. It was also evident his recollection about Evers in connection with the case was decidedly faulty. His Honour, however, saw no ground for believing that Finnie made those statements knowing or believing them to be false. The Court rejected the application.

The Delhi Outrage.

At a meeting of the Delhi Municipal Committee on Tuesday morning, Major Beadon, who presided, presented the following note in connection with the proposal before the Committee in regard to the house in Chandni Chowk from which the bomb was thrown at the Viceroy on the 23rd December:—

"The outrage which took place in the Chandni Chowk on the 23rd December, 1912, has placed on this city a stigma which it is impossible to remove entirely. It is incumbent on the Municipal Committee as representing the citizens of Delhi to show in a practical form the abhorrence with which the outrage is received. Accordingly I suggest for the consideration of the Committee that the house from which the bomb is known to have been thrown should be purchased and demolished. The details of the final scheme need not be decided at once, but it may be accepted that an unmistakable gap should be left in the frontage of the street, so that all men who pass by may be reminded not of the shame of the deed, but of the feelings of resentment and disgust with which the outrage was regarded by the loyal citizens of Delhi. In the space which will be left open a tablet should be erected with an inscription embodying the above sentiments. Furthermore it can be taken for granted that no State procession will ever be allowed to take place through the Chandni Chowk so long as the procession has, perforce, to pass along close under a row of houses. Now that Delhi has become the Capital, State ceremonies must take place periodically, but unless the Chandni Chowk is rendered safe for such, this historic street will be left severely alone. I suggest for the earnest consideration of the Committee that the Chandni Chowk be converted as soon as possible into a broad open street by the removal of the trees and the central pavement—a scheme which has already been under consideration for some years but which has not been carried out for want of the necessary funds."

A suggestion was thrown out by an Indian Member that action be postponed, the committee waiting for proof that the bomb was thrown from the house in question.

Eventually, however, the Committee formally accepted the suggestion contained in the note.

The All-India Medical Mission in Egypt.

We publish below a most interesting letter received by us from Dr. Mukhtar Ahmad Ansari, Director of the All-India Medical Mission for Turkey, photographs of which are also published in the Pictorial Supplement. The letter, though written on board the ship, was posted from Constantinople on 31st December, 1912, and had as a Post Script the following welcome news:—

"We have reached Constantinople in all safety. Details by next mail. Great reception. Mehmet Ali Bey (Inspector-General of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society) and Bassim Omar Pasha (Vice-President) saw us. Guard of Honour and Band."

S.S. "ROMANIA."

Near the Dardanelles.

30th December, 1912.

My last letter from Aden had not much news, as there was none to give. But this, which I am sending from s.s. "Romania," a day before our arrival at Stamboul, will contain some news which will interest you.

All our lectures and demonstrations were over on the 25th of December, the day before our arrival at Suez. I had arranged them in such a manner that only the revision, should we be disposed to do so, should be done during our voyage in the Mediterranean Sea. Most of the men have availed themselves of the classes; only

Abdur Rahman of Peshawar, Qasi Bashiruddin Ahmad and Obiragbuddin have missed nearly half of the lectures owing to their indisposition. I mean, however—should we be favourably placed—to continue the classes for the first three weeks at least thrice weekly in order to make up the deficiency as well as teach them any new matter that may require doing so.

The night before landing at Suez, in order to save the uniforms from getting overused and dirty, I had thought of going ashore in Mufti; but on second thoughts I asked the men to put on their uniforms, and I had every reason to be very glad of having done so as you will see later.

We reached Suez on the morning of the 26th, and after the medical inspection was over I found on inquiry that a representative of Thomas Cook was awaiting our party with a launch for us and a tug for our baggage. He had also brought a letter from their office at Alexandria. After our transport department—Shuaib Qurnashy and Abdal Wahed Khan being the foremen—had our baggage removed to the tug, our party left s.s. "Sardegna" after a hearty farewell, in some cases very touching, from the passengers on board, amongst them being also H. H. the Maharani Holkar of Indore and her suite of ladies going to Europe.

Captain H. V. Bagshawe, R. A. M. C., also met us on the launch. He was sent by General Byng, the General Officer Commanding the Army of Occupation at Cairo, on the instruction of H. E. Lord Kitchener. He had come from the headquarters at Cairo in order to give us assistance at disembarkation and during our journey to Alexandria. He was very courteous and exceedingly agreeable to us and travelled with us by train to Alexandria and was with the party until our boat left the quay at Alexandria. He proved himself of very great use to us. I am going to send a letter to Lord Kitchener and General Byng thanking them for their kindness in giving us such valuable assistance. I will also send a private letter to Dr. Bagshawe.

The Port Medical Officer at Suez was very considerate to us and just had a little soiled linen removed from our holdalls for disinfection. The Customs Officer, who was an Egyptian gentleman, showed his appreciation and sympathy and only opened a box or two, probably in order to swear he had gone through the formality. A small crowd of Egyptians had gathered there and they were very enthusiastic and showed us every courtesy and consideration. Here we were also met by Mr. Abbas M. A. Barry, Government Agent, Army of Occupation, Suez, who accompanied us everywhere and made himself very useful.

The Manager and Shuaib were sent to the port railway station in charge of all the heavy baggage and deck chairs which were registered to go to Alexandria in a van. We found the charges exorbitant and had to pay £6 for the freight. The rest of the party went to a hotel in town, marshalled by a picturesque dragoman, and had their lunch which also proved rather expensive. But it was necessary to fortify ourselves against a long journey by train to Alexandria. The Manager and Shuaib joined the party at the hotel after having arranged about the baggage. There was a large crowd very much interested in us waiting outside the hotel and making all sorts of enquiries about us, and on learning the object of our Mission the shouts of Markaba were heard over and over again.

Captain Bagshawe brought us an English newspaper through which we learnt the news of the dastardly attack on the life of H. E. the Viceroy and of his having been wounded. The following telegram was despatched by us at once:

"26. 12. 1912. P. S. V. Delhi.

"Convey sympathy and deep concern All-India Medical Mission to His Excellency. Pray his speedy recovery and long life, 'Ansari.'"

The party reached the station at 11-45, and found an immense crowd standing all round our baggage and watching our men. It was very hard work to dispose of all the baggage, the second class carriages being very few. However, we accommodated ourselves and the luggage higgledy-piggledy and made ourselves as comfortable as was possible under the circumstances. The early part of the journey to Ismailia was very dusty. The line passes along the Canal through sandy tracts. This uninteresting part of the journey finished at Ismailia where we changed to another train. Here our transport department did excellent work. The journey from Ismailia to Beba was a little more cramped, though the scenery around made up for the discomfort in the train. The change at Beba was accomplished under stress of time and a jabbering crowd of porters who wanted "Bakshish" from every single member of the Mission. But our Manager was too wise to let them have more than their due, having previously ascertained from Captain Bagshawe and the Railway Inspector the exact amount payable to the porters. The journey from Beba to Alexandria was accomplished in a most congested train, but full of very sympathetic Egyptians and Turks. The men were fascinated and the gentleman helped himself half a dozen times from a tin of biscuits we were carrying for the whole party until the Manager, having discovered his selfishness, admonished him mildly and took the tin in his own charge. At last a brilliant idea struck me and I ordered ten baskets for 24, which was highly appreciated by the party, the contents of the baskets and the tea-pots disappearing as if by magic.

It was by the merest chance that Dr. Bagshawe and myself rescued the van containing our registered baggage from being carried to Cairo instead of Alexandria. It would have probably meant a day's delay and a lot of inconvenience, if not missing our boat at Alexandria.

During our journey an Egyptian gentleman drew the attention of the Manager to a note in Al-Moayyad about our Mission. It simply mentioned the numbers of our Mission and wished us success in our undertaking. Our train arrived at Alexandria at 8 p.m. Here we were met by Thomas Cook's agent who took charge of our baggage and had it removed to their van. There was a large crowd of hotel agents at the station, and what with their shouts and with their jostling and pushing it would not have been possible to decide where to stay for the night if we had not followed Captain Bagshawe's plan and cleared out of the station with Cook's agent to see a few hotels for ourselves before deciding which we were going to stay in. We had to select a hotel which would be cheap as well as good. We were lucky in having received special concession at the Hotel Metropole where, owing to the influence of the Egyptian landlord, the Proprietor took us at 6 shillings per head (inclusive), the ordinary charges being 10/6. The Manager and myself, who had come in advance of the party, remained in the hotel till the rest of the party arrived there and went round with the hotel Manager who showed us all the rooms. We drew up lists and allotted the rooms to the individual members when they arrived there. Our hotel was situated facing the sea and was very clean, commodious and comfortable.

In the morning Cook's agent had several carriages ready for us, and we started to see the Turkish refugees sheltered in one of the Khedival palaces in Alexandria, Palace Ras-el-Tin. Dr. Himmat, the Medical Officer in-charge, was kind enough to have met one of the party at the railway station and was good enough to send a man in the morning to fetch us to the palace. He had also promised to request H. H. the Khedive to meet us, if possible, in the palace. We arrived there at 10 o'clock and were met by Dr. Himmat and his staff. He took us round the inoculation department and the dispensary. In the quadrangle of the palace, we saw about 1,000 Turkish refugees of all ages, and we were met here by a deputation of the notables amongst the Turkish refugees. We were taken up to the drawing-room of the palace where Dr. Himmat addressed us in English and described to us some of the most touching and pathetic scenes which his rescuing party had beheld at Kavalla. He mentioned particularly the atrocities perpetrated by the Servians in throwing away from the windows the Turkish sick and wounded, there to die of cold, starvation and disease. He mentioned a good many other inhuman deeds done by the Balkan armies during their occupation of Salonika and Kavalla; amongst them the murder of the weak and innocent women and children, the insults and injuries to the women, the spoliation, burning and looting of their hearths and homes, and the unspeakable miseries caused to these innocent non-combatants. The description of these refugees reaching the shelter of the Khedival yacht, which brought them to Egypt, was specially touching and pathetic,—how they described it as "the ship of safety," how they kissed the very steps which took them to the boat with tearful gratitude. These and many scenes depicted by him, you could well imagine, went straight to our hearts and made us even more determined to do all that lay in our power to lessen the sufferings, to sympathise with and soothe the bleeding hearts of our fellow-Muslims in Turkey. Dr. Himmat assured us we had several hundreds of thousands waiting with forlorn hopes most eagerly for any succour and assistance that a Mission like ours would give to them. He assured us that the work awaiting us there was far more than many Missions like ours would be able to cope with. This news, though it made our hearts very sad, provided us with another justification for our having come all the way to do what we had some tribulations we might find ourselves too late to perform. I made a suitable reply to Dr. Himmat's speech thanking him for the good wishes he had expressed and for the valuable insight which had been given to us by our visit to the Ras-el-Tin and by his speech. Dr. Himmat then announced that H. H. the Khedive was unable, owing to the Friday prayers, to receive us on that day, but His Highness hoped that we would visit Egypt on our return when we would be granted the pleasure and privilege of being presented to him. A Turkish journalist, Djafar Effendihadeh Omar Sirat, who was also amongst the group of notable refugees, made a speech with tearful eyes which we unfortunately could not understand, but which was briefly translated to us by Dr. Himmat. He expressed gratitude and appreciation on behalf of the Turkish refugees and gave us the fullest assurance that there would be thousands of Turks like him awaiting most anxiously our arrival amongst them.

We were then introduced to Madame Nouredin Bey, wife of a former Consul-General in Bombay and now P. S. to the Khedive, who was acting as the matron in-charge of the women refugees. She is a Turkish lady of education and refinement and spoke French most fluently. She took us round the female wards and showed us how the Turkish families were housed in the palace and also the food given to them. Some of the babies were born there.

After saying farewell to Dr. Himmat, Nouredin Bey and Madame Nouredin Bey we drove back through the city and met with a very sympathetic reception from the crowd wherever we passed. Owing to our long stay in the Ras-el-Tin Palace we had to give up our visit to the sights of the city and we only visited Cook's office for our embarkation tickets and to convert some Circular Notes into gold.

After lunch in the hotel we drove to the docks where we found the gates closed against the crowd. We were admitted as a special favour and on inquiry we were told that the Khedival special was waiting in the dock station ready to leave for Cairo. We arrived at the quay and found a tremendous crowd of Egyptians awaiting us. On the boat Dr. Himmat, in the presence of some 100 Egyptians, made another speech on their behalf in which he praised the Mission and wished them God-speed. A suitable reply was made and after a photograph had been taken, our attention was drawn to the lusty shouts of the crowds on land. There were banners bearing the Red Crescent carried by the crowds, and burning speeches were made by several persons denouncing the atrocities of the Balkan armies and a poem in Arabic was read by a gentleman in our honour. Then began the loud, lusty and continuous cheering from the crowds who continually kept it up until our boat was out of sight. And not being content with that several boats full of people followed our steamer for a long distance cheering us and singing Arabic songs. The following are some of the cheers which they repeated over and over again:—

Captain Bagshawe waited after saying good-bye to us until our boat was out of sight.

On the morning of the 29th, after a very shaky voyage, we arrived at Piræa, the port for Athens. Here a very searching examination of our passports and our party was made by the Greek port officials. We were advised not to use the Foz to avoid unpleasantness, which we followed, although I think unnecessarily. As the boat was going to be in harbour for seven hours, we decided to pay a visit under the guidance of Cook's man to all the sights of the Greek capital. We visited the Acropolis, the amphitheatre, the stadium, and the museum and drove through the principal streets of the city. Here we saw young lads and consumptive-looking men dressed in shabby grey uniforms awaiting orders for the front. On our return to our boat we saw a hospital ship in which the wounded were brought from Salonika and medical aid is sent to the sick and wounded. Our boat had already left with the doctors and nurses. We also saw a transport ship just leaving the harbour full of provisions and some soldiers. Whilst we were in Athens we despatched three telegrams to (1) the President of the Red Crescent Society, (2) the British Ambassador, and (3) Cook, informing them of our arrival.

We are already nearing the Dardanelles and in sight of the island of Tenedos (Turkish name, Bozada), where a fleet is at anchor whose nationality is the point of discussion. Some say it is a Greek fleet, others say that the result of the naval engagement a week previous being uncertain, it is impossible to say what fleet may be at anchor.

We are due at Constantinople to-morrow morning. I will let you know in detail any news I may hear during our stay there.

MAJOR SYED HAMAN BILGRAMI, President of the Lucknow session of the Moslem Educational Conference, received the following letter from the Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay which, however, reached too late for him to make the necessary announcement at the Conference:—"I am directed by my Government to thank you as well as all the contributors to the Red Crescent Society. I avail myself of this opportunity to request you to kindly communicate these thanks to the delegates of the different Provinces of India, who may be present at the Conference."

WHILE Enver Bey's return to Constantinople have been due to nothing but a supreme sense of duty, one can not help regretting with him, that the grave crisis in the affairs of the Empire nearer home should have compelled him to relinquish a task of a peculiarly important and fruitful character in Northern Africa. The Frankfurter Zeitung publishes a letter which Enver Bey wrote to one of his German friends, Dr. E. Jaechh, the well-known authority on Balkan affairs, after leaving Cyrenaica, describing his activity among the Arabs. Cyrenaica, he says, was his kingdom, which was rapidly progressing and organising for independence and defence. He had established ten popular schools, attended by 1,000 children, and two girls' schools, with 150 pupils. He also sent 20 young Bedouins to the military schools at Constantinople, five others to the School of Medicine five to study for veterinary surgeons, five to prepare for chemists, 60 to the school for non-commissioned officers, and a number of others to small arms factory and to a trades school. In Cyrenaica itself at the great Castle of Burgueb he had established a training college for artisans. He had also acquired a small farm for teaching agriculture. The training in these cases was combined with military discipline, and after two years the young men were designed to act as perambulating instructors, teaching their respective trades from village to village. For purposes of administration the country was divided into districts under sheikhs assisted by councils, which were responsible to Enver Bey for the application of the civil and military laws. The standing army was to consist of three regiments of infantry, each regiment consisting of three battalions, each battalion of three companies of 150 soldiers, and 15 women acting as supply servants. This infantry was already in existence. In addition three companies of machine guns and three gun batteries (each of four pieces) were to be formed, and further three squadrons of cavalry (or rather mounted infantry) of 800 men each and two companies of gendarmes for police work, or rather for carrying out the orders of the administration, since perfect security reigned throughout the country. These and many other reforms all required money, about £T.9,000 monthly. The Arabs were perfectly willing to permit themselves to be taxed directly, but Enver Bey preferred an indirect system. All necessaries came regularly from Egypt, their value in the aggregate amounting to about £T.25,000 per month. Enver Bey intended to impose an import duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem on foodstuffs and 50 per cent. on other goods. This gave him regularly £T.8,300 per month. The export of camels was subjected to an export duty, and this gave him another £T.2,500 a month. He was thus very comfortably off with about £T.11,000 per month. He had opened a motor road from Sollum to Benghazi, and several other roads through the mountains and into the interior, and was thus able to control all the traffic. For daily needs he used paper money, which had been issued to the value of £T.10,000. Of this sum one-half had been redeemed by him before his departure, and the other had been deposited by him in gold at Alexandria. In addition he left £T.10,000 in gold in the Treasury in Cyrenaica. In fact he and his people were in no need of anything. A few days before the conclusion of peace a large amount of ammunition and arms had arrived, and the magazines were full of provisions. Of rice alone there was a store of 150,000 kilogrammes and of barley about 1,000,000 kilogrammes. Enver Bey left the country with great regret, but he felt his duty called him elsewhere, and he made every arrangement for continuing the resistance after his departure.

LAST week we stated in a note that at our request His Excellency the Viceroy had a telegram sent to the Secretary of State that, in addition to the £100 already placed on our behalf at the disposal of the Consul-General at Salonica and Monastir.

for the relief of Moslem war sufferers, £500 more should be placed at the disposal of the Consular authorities at Salonica and £400 at Monastir. Believing that the greatest need of these refugees was food and clothing we had specified that the amounts placed at the disposal of the Consular authorities were to be devoted to the prevention of death through exposure and starvation. Since then the following telegram has been received from the Secretary of State: "The following wire has been received from the Consul-General by the Foreign Office with reference to the Comrade subscription. Telegram begins. Please convey to the Editor of the Comrade the gratitude of the International Commission for his offer. There will be no difficulty in satisfying the request contained in the last para., but as we are spending £100 per diem in supplying food for over 5,000 refugees in camp, it would make matters easier if I might read 'prevention of death through disease' and devote the money to the camp hospital now being installed. End of message." In the absence of the Foreign Office telegram to which the Consul-General's telegram is a reply it is not possible to be sure what the last para. to which reference is made contained, but it is probable that the reference is to the keeping of accounts by the authorities so that they may be sent to us in due course for publication in the Comrade. It may, however, refer to the request which we made, that the numbers relieved out of these funds may be noted if that could be done without great inconvenience. In view of the difficulty of sending to us very detailed accounts we had stated in our letter to the Private Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy that we needed no vouchers or other details of daily disbursements or names of persons relieved, and had requested that His Excellency's telegram should be so worded as not to give the impression that the main consideration was accurate and detailed book-keeping instead of instant relief of terrible distress. From the telegram of the Consul-General at Salonica it is clear that there was greater need of medical relief than we were led to believe from information received from London, and consequently we have informed him through His Excellency the Viceroy and the London Foreign Office that we have no objection to add 'the prevention of death through disease' to the other objects of the Fund and to allow the Consul-General to use the money for the hospital. If the whole or part of the All-India Medical Mission could be spared from Constantinople we should have liked it to be split up into three or four smaller units and to proceed to Kopia in Asia Minor, and to Salonica and Monastir. But that cannot be ascertained for some time, and in view of the urgent need of medical relief at Salonica at present we have authorised the Consul-General to use the whole or part of the funds placed at his disposal for that purpose. As the Consulate at Monastir is also under the Consul-General at Salonica, he is in the best position to judge of the needs of the two places, and we have authorised him to use his discretion as to the form of relief and utilise the funds for Salonica and Monastir to save the maximum number of lives in these two places, the funds being transferable from one place to another according to their comparative needs. There is a much greater likelihood now of the war being resumed and our Mission must, therefore, be completely at the disposal of the Turkish authorities. But if the war is not resumed and after consulting the Turkish authorities it is found preferable to split up the Mission into smaller units to relieve distress, by way of medical or other relief, at more than one place, we shall apply to Government for necessary help on hearing from Dr. Ansari. We may mention here that when leaving Bombay the Mission was not able to obtain from the Bombay Press all the forms and registers for use in its field-hospital, and in view of the fact that Shipping Companies are disinclined to take any parcels for Constantinople at the present moment we found ourselves in some difficulty. That has, however, been removed through the kind assistance of His Excellency the Viceroy, who has agreed to our consigning by steamer such of the forms and registers as it would be too costly to send by post to His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, the documents being sent to Sir Gerard Lowther with a covering letter from His Excellency so that there may be no question of contraband and they may reach their destination without stoppage by the Allies.

In addition to amounts already sent by draft to the Grand Vizier at Constantinople for the relief of war sufferers we have sent by telegraphic remittance to-day through the National Bank of India, Ltd., Delhi Branch, £5,000. We await the next letter from Dr. Ansari which, we trust, would inform us clearly in what form further relief should be sent from India. It appears, however, that Dr. Ansari and Dr. Muhammad Hasan, the Directors of the two Medical Missions sent from India, have already represented to the authorities of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society the views of Indian contributors, for we have received a cable dated, Constantinople, 21st January, from Bassim Omar Pasha, Vice-President of the Central Ottoman Red Crescent Society, Dr. Muhhtar Ahmad Ansari and Dr. Muhammad Hasan, conveying sincere gratitude to brother Moslems in India for generous subscriptions for the benefit of the Turkish wounded, the war sufferers and the refugees, and informing us that a complete list of those who had sent money to the Central Office of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society with their full addresses is being sent "to facilitate immediate telegraphic receipts." This will assure the contributors from India that the amounts sent by them are duly received in Turkey. In view of the terrible extent of the distress caused by the war we trust the generosity of the Musalmans in India would increase, and much larger sums than have yet been sent would be forwarded either to us or to Mr. Ameer Ali or direct to Turkey by the donors. We would once more press our request that sufficient data should be regularly supplied to us by the different Relief Funds in India for the preparation of a weekly report of such collections. If money is sent to us we shall take the earliest opportunity of forwarding it to Turkey in the form in which the Turkish authorities require. We regret that in some quarters efforts have been made to run down this Fund or that. For our part we think people in this country should have the amplest freedom to contribute their subscriptions to whatever fund they like according to the amount of confidence they feel in the organisers. Such of them as repose confidence in us will, we trust, never have occasion to regret it. This is all we have got to say for ourselves, and we think it is enough. It is highly undesirable that anybody should try to create a "corner" in such charity and spread rumours and throw out insinuations adversely affecting the organisers of other Funds. We can confidently assert that we have never done so ourselves and have no desire that while others contribute the cash we should take all the credit. It is not tactics such as these that increase the confidence of the contributors, and the sooner this is realised by all the better. The Mission that we sent out was despatched on the receipt of a cable from H. H. the Aga Khan and the Right Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali on the 9th November, stating that Turkish hospitals were completely disorganised. On hearing this, we asked Mr. Ameer Ali by cable whether he could purchase equipment for a field-hospital for such a Mission out of Rs. 30,000 which we proposed to cable to him. On receiving his assent by wire we cabled the money without the least delay by stopping Rs. 21,000, which had already been sent to the Turkish Consul-General at Bombay for transmission by wire to the Grand Vizier, and by adding another Rs. 9,000 to the amount. We learnt from Dr. Ansari's cable sent to us on reaching Constantinople that the equipment purchased for us by Mr. Ameer Ali and sent by him on the 30th November, which should have reached on the 21st December, had not arrived; but just as we were about to cable to Mr. Ameer Ali about this, we received another cable from Dr. Ansari, stating that he had received the Bill of Lading, and we learn to-day from him that some portion of it was expected to arrive on the 10th January. We do not see how the Mission could have proved useful even if it had been possible for it to leave India a week earlier than it did. Nor can we understand how we could have acted otherwise than as we did in sending the Mission after having requested Mr. Ameer Ali to purchase equipment for the Rs. 30,000 cabled to him on the 16th November. Neither Mr. Ameer Ali nor we could foresee, when arranging for the purchase of the field-hospital equipment, that an armistice would be concluded and that fighting would cease. But from the letters received from Dr. Ansari, and published elsewhere, as well as from the telegram of the British Consul-General at Salonica, it appears that there is room in Turkey for more medical relief than already supplied by the several small units of the British Red Crescent Society's Medical Mission and the Ottoman Red Crescent. It is difficult enough to be the Printer, Publisher, Editor and Proprietor of a newspaper in these days; and it has not made things easier for us to be in addition to all these the Organiser of a Turkish Relief Fund which has collected more than two and-a-half lakh of rupees and of a Medical Mission of such dimensions as we have sent out. But if we are required to possess the virtues of a prophet as well, we do not know how it would be possible for us to acquit ourselves with credit. We, therefore, decline the honours of prophecy and are quite satisfied that we have been only a humble follower of Mr. Ameer Ali. We may, however, assure him that, so far as we are concerned, no attempts have been made to divert the funds intended for him and that we are as anxious as he is to see that the money is given with satisfactory guarantees for its proper application. He has assisted us so greatly in the purchase of equipment for the Mission that we harbour none but grateful feelings towards him and shall deem it an honour and a privilege to assist him according to our light and our capacity. We are already to some extent carrying out the same programme as he has followed himself, but we are sure we are only meeting the wishes of our contributors in relying on a Non-Moslem agency for the relief of war sufferers only where a Moslem and preferably an Indian agency is not available. This combines moral value with material aid and is in our opinion the best course to pursue. How else could we secure services of twenty-four capable men, including seven doctors of great ability, without paying a pie for it and manage things so economically?

The election of M. Poincaré as President of the French Republic has been acclaimed as an event of international significance in Europe. A man of undoubted force, capacity and political eminence has been entrusted with the responsibilities of a position which only colourless and proved mediocrities had hitherto been called upon to fill. And the wisacrus of the European Press have discovered in this circumstance a whole world of meaning. The fact, it has been suggested, marks a notable change in the temper and psychology of the French nation. The era of warring and remorseless factions in the domestic politics of France has ended; and by summoning their most virile and clever statesman to the highest office in the State, the French people have quietly announced their resolve to maintain their national dignity and assert a united national will in the problems of the weltpolitik. To us however, M. Poincaré appears to be the symbol of an entirely new spirit that has recently come to birth in the French Republic. Those who have been closely watching for sometime past the activities and adventures of the French foreign policy, need not be told what that spirit is. It is bodied forth, complete in every lineament, in the French administration of Tunis and Algeria and in the recent deal about Morocco. That spirit, in brief, is aggressive Imperialism inspired by a peculiarly ferocious and hungry Finance. If M. Poincaré's personality sums up the highest national aspirations of France, the utterances and acts of that statesman during his brief premiership give us a correct measure of the political instincts of the French people to-day. France was not very long ago the cradle of every sentiment that nourishes the best hopes of man, his love of freedom, his passion for justice and equality of opportunity, his hatred of all that is iniquitous and mean. The descendants of Rousseau, the inheritors of some of the most glorious traditions in human history, afford the world to-day the spectacle of a nation, wallowing in materialism and driven by earth-hunger and insatiable lust for gold, that has deprived millions of their freedom and imposed on them the tyranny of its parochial manners and conventions. M. Poincaré has been, after the Russian Foreign Minister, the most active figure in European diplomacy since the Balkan League challenged Turkey to battle. His entire efforts have been devoted to support Russian policy and thwart those who have no great love for Muscovite initiative or dominances in the affairs of the Near East. He loudly gave the Balkan Confederacy his blessings and proclaimed the formula of "the Balkan for the Balkan peoples" as the true basis of discussion for European diplomacy. And, above all, he has been with strange and ominous persistency pegging out French claims on Syria as if Turkey's Asiatic possessions were already ripe for promoting French imperial ambitions. Such is the man whom France has delighted to honour and the rest of Europe has hailed as a new and powerful accession to the forces of the world's peace!

We have written enough about the atrocities committed by the Balkan armies in Macedonia, Albania and Thrace. Fresh details, to add to this chapter of horrors, have come to hand. A deputation of merchants from Salonica arrived in Vienna on 2nd January to beg that steps might be taken against the atrocities practised by the Greeks in Salonica, and appealed to official quarters and to the Press. The deputation published the following statement:—"In our case we appeal to all competent personages that Europe may know that the Jews in Salonica are still in fear of death, and that their possessions are not safe. On December 24, two Jewish moneychangers, Frances and Ampir, were on their way home early in the afternoon, when they were fallen upon by Greek soldiers, who, assisted by native Greeks, murdered them in the cruellest manner, and robbed the corpses of their money, and this in the centre of the town on Mawdandelouhan Place. ... No night passes without Turkish or Jewish shops being plundered, while in the business quarter of Sibi, where the Colonial warehouses are situated, the owners have been forced to engage watchmen for their protection. But it has already happened that these guards have been enticed away by Greek soldiers, while their companions have robbed and plundered without disturbance. A journal, which appears in French, and which reported these cases, was suspended for some days. All this has happened under the eyes of the Greek authorities, while the diplomats looked on inactive ... The Greeks went to war in the name of humanity. We now appeal to the humanity of Europe with the petition 'come to our aid.' Telegraphic messages from Constantinople received in Vienna reported that three members of the English Balkan Committee were travelling in Macedonia. They went over from Salonica to Monastir, going on to Kavala. Then they wished to go to Serres and Drama, but the Bulgarians forbade them to visit those cities in which the Bulgarian bands had perpetrated fearful crimes among the Muhammadans. A number of Senators, among them Ferid Pasha and the ex-Grand Vizier Ghazi Mukhtar Pasha, have sent a telegraphic appeal to the Great Powers, in the name of humanity, begging them to use their influence with the Balkan States to prevent the killing of Muhammadans without distinction of age or sex, in the occupied provinces, which is still being carried out by the bands, in spite of the armistice.

WE HAD occasion the other day to express our surprise at a goodly crop of wild and, in some cases, mischievous rumours that had sprung up in connection with the outrage at Delhi, and we pointed out one rumour in particular that had emanated from Bengal, which had to be contradicted officially. It would, of course, be idle to take every bazar gossip seriously, and one need hardly concern oneself as to how a certain class of people seek distraction in a peculiarly trying situation. It is a pity that the madness and distemper generated in the hazards some time communicate themselves freely to a section of the Indian Press. The only effective way to deal with irresponsible journalism and the wild inanities of the street is to treat them with the contempt they deserve. Some of the mad rumours, however, that have been hurrying through the air betray a design and a method. It is not wholly without significance that an extremist vernacular paper in Bengal should have "heard" about the arrest of two Aligarh boys in connection with the Delhi outrage. Another rumour reached us of which Aligarh was once more the unassuming victim. It spoke of a meeting held by the students at Aligarh in favour of the release of Mr. Tilak. The story was on the face of it incredible, but the Editor of the Comrade, who is a Trustee of the Aligarh College, thought it advisable to make a formal inquiry on the subject. Accordingly he wrote the following letter to the Hon. Secretary of the Trustees:—"I have heard a rumour to the effect that the students of the Aligarh College held a meeting, sometime ago, in connection with the release of Mr. Tilak. Inasmuch as it is, for several reasons, absolutely necessary that the rumour should be thoroughly inquired into and that it should be emphatically contradicted if no such meeting was held, I, as a Trustee of the M. A. O. College, beg leave to trouble you with the request that you will kindly inform me, after fully ascertaining the real facts from the College authorities, the staff, the students or any other person whom you may choose to consult as to whether a meeting of the kind stated above actually took place. If it did take place, then, who were the persons that took part in it, what were the resolutions adopted and what steps were taken, or are being taken, to carry those resolutions into effect? Or is the rumour entirely baseless, no such meeting having ever taken place within the premises of the College? If you do not consider it inexpedient, then kindly give me the permission to publish the reply that I may receive from you. I shall be obliged if I am favoured with a reply within a week." The following reply has been received from the Hon. Secretary of the Aligarh College:—"I thank you for your letter of the 17th January. The students of the College held no meeting in connection with the release of Mr. Tilak, nor did they take part in any such meeting. I knew this much myself. But, with a view to greater certainty, I have according to your suggestion satisfied myself by inquiring from the members of the staff through the Principal and from other persons as well. I would, therefore, request you to contradict the rumour in your esteemed paper, if you deem it to be necessary." We would very much like to know who is at the bottom of these rumours. They are clearly intended to harm the Muhammadans, but we doubt very much if they are not much more harmful to Government as well as to the whole country.

The Comrade.

The Coming of Mahmoud Shevket.

THE dramatic events in Constantinople, which have hurled Kiamil Pasha from power, have at last put an end to a senile and nerveless policy that had mismanaged war and was now about to sell national honour and interests at the bidding of Europe. The Sultan has summoned Marshal Mahmoud Shevket Pasha to undertake the direction of national affairs, and no better man could have been called to his aid at this crisis in the destiny of the Empire. Mahmoud Shevket is a personality that had risen to fame and power in a great national crisis by dint of capacity and native strength of character and had successfully directed the storm of the revolution. In the ranks of many able and earnest statesmen, administrators and patriots whom the Young Turk movement has produced, he is a figure of enormous stature. His brief but brilliant career as War Minister had revealed his many-sided gifts, his tireless energy, his marvellous resolution and his single-minded devotion to duty. Those in Europe who indulge in prophecy had often felt it safe to stake their reputations as prophets by pointing to Mahmoud Shevket as the future dictator of the Ottoman Empire. Mahmoud Shevket has none of the egotism that aims at dictatorship, but he is endowed in a generous measure with those gifts that mould a leader of men—force of character, strength of conviction and capacity to dare, to strive and to achieve. A crisis had produced him; a still graver crisis has summoned him to power. He enters on his tremendous responsibilities with the full confidence and support of his people. His predecessor had plunged the whole world of Islam in deep anxiety and despair and created widespread distrust about his aims and methods. The name of Mahmoud Shevket has conjured up hope once more; and now one may have the fullest confidence that, whatever destiny may have in store for Turkey, the honour of the Ottoman nation as well as of Islam, at any rate, will be safe in his keeping.

It would be idle to ignore the gigantic nature of the task that lies before Mahmoud Shevket and his colleagues. He succeeds to a perfect heritage of woes—the wreckage of a disastrous war, with the European provinces overrun by the enemy, disorganised administration and depleted treasury. He is face to face with the united will of Europe seeking to impose on Turkey a settlement of the vital issues about the future of the Empire, which is humiliating to her dignity and damaging to her interests. Above all, he will most probably have to meet the menace of hostile aggression from Russia as soon as he brings to the defence of national interests a policy of vigour and determination. To guide safely the ship of State through these perils is a task of colossal magnitude. But, then, it is for such tasks that nature fashions the Titans among men. Creatures of feeble stuff are invariably the sport of circumstance, but the men who are cast in the heroic mould bend circumstances to their wills and use them as material to shape their destiny withal. Hope and courage are known to have often wrested victory out of the jaws of defeat and made desert to blossom like a rose. If Turkey's misfortunes have been heavy and her future seems to be dark and uncertain, she needs the help of her best sons in the hour of her supreme trial. Mahmoud Shevket and those who have manfully toiled with him for a few years past in the service of their fatherland are men who have the inspiration of hope and possess the hearts that are not afraid of wrestling valiantly with fate. If their efforts to retrieve the blunders of their predecessors and defend national interests and honour are destined to fail, let it not be said that they made no efforts while Turkey was bleeding and the whole world of Islam groaning with pain. It is better to have tried and failed than not to have tried at all. As the poet says:—

عَکَّتْ وَفَجَّ عَمِيقُونَ بِدَمِي وَلِي اَسْمِي
مَقَالَهُ تَوْ هَلْ يَأْتُوَانِي خُوبِ كَمَا

But is there any valid ground for despair? Has Turkey lost every chance to rehabilitate her fortunes, every hope for an honourable existence in the future? Is the situation irremediable? It is possible to be unduly optimistic, and it is equally true that nothing is more paralyzing in a crisis than a 'book-gripping' pessimism. What are the facts of the situation? A war was forced on Turkey just when her rulers were least prepared for it. On the strength of assurances which Kiamil Pasha is said to have received from his "friends," the Turkish army was reduced to peace footing only a few weeks before the outbreak of the war. Kiamil's life-long education was rooted in his country. He relied on his diplomacy and the backing of his friends. Circumstances, however, punished him with the logic of the victor's field. He was weighed in the balance and found wanting. When the situation became hopeless and the whole nation was smarting under the shame of defeat, he turned round and began to wreak vengeance on the leaders of the Committee of Union and Progress, the most earnest-minded and high spirited patriots who could not brook any tampering with national honour and dignity. A hasty armistice was concluded in the meantime and negotiations for peace were initiated in London. The Allies had profited with admirable swiftness through the unpreparedness of the Turkish army for war. They were no less successful in exploiting the entire resources of European diplomacy. The Russian, French and British Governments were practically resolved from the outset that the Confederacy shall reap the fullest advantage from her victories and shall suffer no damage from possible defeat. The Triple Alliance was early outmanoeuvred in the diplomatic game which the Triple Entente has been playing with consummate skill. The Peace negotiations in London were thus begun under the most favourable conditions for the fruition of the hopes of the Allies. What they were decidedly unable to achieve through war single-handed, they had every hope to secure with the support of European diplomacy. Kiamil Pasha's "friends" failed him in the hour of his country's need, and it became manifest even to his most enthusiastic admirers in Turkey that he had all his life been relying on broken reeds.

There were proposals and counter-proposals at the Conference; and while the demands of the Allies were silently approved and even encouraged by the Powers, the Turkish standpoint was declared to be uncompromising and impossible. But can this shameful verdict stand a moment's examination? It was not contended that those proposals constituted the last word of Turkey, but just as the Balkan League presented terms which it was known were not intended to be persisted in, so the Turks felt that they were justified in submitting counter-proposals which may have gone beyond the mark. Still the Turks held that they had made an important concession by the granting of autonomy for Macedonia, with Salonica as the capital, thus abandoning that town, whereas before the war the proposal consisted of reforms for those provinces on the lines of the organic law of 1880, drawn up by the International Commission which elaborated the statute for Eastern Roumelia. As regards Adrianople and the territory south of that fortress, in a word, virtually the whole of the vilayet, the opinion in Turkish quarters was most emphatic and categorical as to its future. Adrianople and its vilayet must belong to Turkey. This was a sine qua non if the Conference was to prove a success. No Turkish Government could possibly sign away those territories. A false impression was created by designing Powers abroad that a military party in Constantinople was encouraging the Government to maintain a firm attitude in regard to the question of Adrianople. There was no need for such encouragement for the simple reason that a Turkish Government has yet to be found to agree to the loss of that country, which is absolutely indispensable for the security of Constantinople, and likewise necessary if Turkey is to remain a European State. Europe had repeatedly declared that it had no interest in the complete abandonment by Turkey of her European possessions. On the contrary, the Powers, it was asserted, have every reason to wish to see Turkey firmly established in Thrace, which is essentially a Musliman province. Consequently if the Allies refused to admit this claim the war must be continued, even should Adrianople fall in the interval.

The Turks based themselves upon the solemn declaration made by the Great Powers before the war that they would insist on the maintenance of the territorial status quo in the Balkan peninsula, which, they point out, has never been formally recalled in the same manner as made. It may also be pointed out that in no war has the victor retained all the conquered territory. The Balkan Allies have singularly departed from that principle, a course which indicates a desire to bring about the complete downfall of the Turkish Empire in Europe. As regards the islands of the Aegean, which the League claimed, the Turks declared that those cannot be alienated because they belong to Anatolia (Asia Minor), and have nothing to do with European Turkey. The failure of the Conference was inevitable unless the Allies agreed to waive their pretensions about Adrianople and the Aegean islands.

When the Peace Conference was approaching a deadlock and the European diplomacy was organising itself to impose its mandate on the Turk, it was generally felt by every un-biased observer that the only hope for Turkey to achieve peace with honour lay in the resumption of war. No one who had carefully watched the progress of the negotiations and the peculiar diplomatic atmosphere in which they had been conducted could mistake the risks of such a course. And yet no other alternative seemed possible to those who would rather die a million deaths than agree to live on sufferance. The most momentous question at the time was: what the Turkish Government would do in face of the united pressure of Europe. Opinions were naturally divided on the subject and they were as naturally tempered with advice. Some thought that Kiamil Pasha had already made up his mind to accept the terms of the Allies, but that he was deliberately provoking the intervention of the Powers, with a view to appear as yielding to the force majeure. Others maintained that the resumption of hostilities was inevitable inasmuch as the Committee of Union and Progress had rehabilitated its influence and prestige in the army and amongst the people and its adherents were loudly clamouring for war. Only a few observers in Germany and Austria had the fairness to declare that Turkey was being shamelessly treated by the Powers and that, given a free hand, she was yet strong enough to defend her honour and interests. The joint Note of the Powers came in due course to be delivered at Constantinople. European diplomacy of modern times has not been a peculiarly clean and lovely thing, but its latest Note to Turkey will for ever live as a naked act of shame and scandal in modern history. The resumption of hostilities was clearly distasteful to some of the Powers as well to the Allies. The latter had powerful friends to back their demands in the councils of Europe. Turkey should, therefore, be coerced into submission, decided Diplomacy, for she was the only Power on whom coercion could be exercised without the least fear of consequences.

The question was naturally asked at the time: Was Kiamil Pasha playing a game of bluff and would he eventually throw dust into the eyes of his people as soon as the Powers agreed to take joint action and called upon the Porte to yield? For the European diplomats the question had no great interest, as they were confident that Kiamil Pasha's Government would ultimately give way. Their confidence was in a considerable measure justified. The Triple Entente was solidly ranged on the side of the Allies. Russia had made it plainly manifest that she would invade Armenia if Turkey did not speedily make up her mind to accept the Allies' terms of peace. Above all, they had full reliance on the timid and halting nature of the policy of Kiamil Pasha and his extreme pliability to British advice. In view of the fact that the European diplomacy had thrown its entire weight in the balance against the Turks as well as of the character of the late Turkish Government, the diplomats calculated that the Turkish attitude would be revised after a feeble protest to save appearances. Events have shown that their calculations were not wrongly based.

But the question whether Kiamil Pasha's Government would quietly surrender to the demands of the Powers had a supreme importance to the Ottoman nation as well as to the whole Islamic world. If Adrianople, the key to Constantinople and a city rich with many historical and sacred memories as the first seat of Ottoman power in Europe, was to be surrendered, along with the whole vilayet of Adrianople, if in addition to hundreds of thousands of Moslems in Macedonia, even the province of Thrace, more than 60 per cent of whose population is Moslem, was to be handed over to the tender mercies of the Bulgars; if the fate of the islands close to the coast of Asia Minor was to be submitted to the will of the Powers; if all this could be contemplated by the rulers of Turkey when the Allies' only resource was the benevolence of European diplomacy and when about 800,000 fresh Ottoman soldiers were ready to shed their last drop of blood for the sake of the fatherland, then all one could do was to pray for the speedy deliverance of Turkey from the grip of the evil genius that was leading to her dishonour and her fall.

The deliverance has at last come. The Committee of Union and Progress has risen into power again. It is needless to speak of the ideals that inspire its leaders and the rank and file of its adherents. The best proof of their ability and patriotism lies in the bitter hostility and denunciation that every potential enemy of their country has directed against them in Europe. If Turkey can be saved from humiliation and dismemberment, it would certainly be saved through the courage, resourcefulness and devotion of her best sons who, though not necessarily young in years, are yet young in hope, have faith in their mission and their destiny and prefer death to dishonour. The forces that have produced the Committee of Union and Progress are the forces that have evolved personalities like that of Mahmud Shevket or of Enver Bey. These are the forces that alone can vitalise what is best and noblest in the character and ideals of the race. The proclamation by the Committee says that "the new Cabinet will utilise the whole resources of the nation to protect the fatherland and restore the honour of Turkey." The true note of the spirit in which Mahmud Shevket and his colleagues will address themselves to their great task was struck by Talaat Bey when he said to Reuter's representative that "we shall save national honour or perish. We do not desire a continuation of war, but we are determined to keep Adrianople." True friends of Turkey will rejoice at these words of courage and of hope. They will revive the drooping spirits of Mussalmans throughout the world. Dr. Ansari's cable, announcing the resignation of Kiamil Pasha's Cabinet and the appointment of Mahmud Shevket Pasha as Grand Vizier, reached us just when Reuter's messages regarding the surrender of Kiamil had been published in India. Needless to say that it gave us great relief as it must have done to every Mussalman in this country and we sent the following cablegram to Dr. Ansari:— "Inform Sultan your cable removed tremendous load from Moslem minds. All pray for resumption of fighting. Despair not of God's blessings. Remember Victory of Badr. Canvassing loan here." We have also sent the following message to Marshal Mahmood Sherket Pasha and we are sure it interprets the real feelings of Moslem India:—

"Your brother Moslems in India heartily rejoice at Your Excellency's appointment. Pray assure us Turks will live with honor or die with honor as true Turks and true Moslems. Cabling 5,000 sterling for relief. Striving for loan of one million."

But, though the new Cabinet enters on its task with the fullest sympathy and confidence of the Moslem world, it has to overcome enormous difficulties. One of these difficulties is financial, and we trust the Mussalmans of India will do all what they can to help the new Government by promptly subscribing the loan of one million sterling, the details of which have already been published by us. The greatest difficulty, however, consists in the attitude of the Powers, and especially of those composing the Triple Entente. The policy of vigour and determination, which the new Cabinet is sure to adopt, is bound to give rise to hostility in several quarters. By deciding to put pressure on Turkey, the Powers have already departed from the neutral attitude which they had solemnly agreed to maintain at the outbreak of the war. No one can expect the Muscovite that he would resist the temptation whenever he finds an opportunity to grind his own axe, but it is exceedingly painful to the Mussalman fellow-subjects of the British nation to see that the British Government has become a willing party to the coercion of Turkey. By no sophistry can it be maintained that such a act is not against the declared British neutrality. If Turkey has lost all hope of friendly assistance from Great Britain, she has surely done nothing to deserve an unfair and humiliating treatment. Need we repeat that such treatment is bound to cause intense sorrow and disappointment amongst the Mussalmans of India. We are sure their true feelings on the subject will be expressed in a public manner, and in no uncertain voice, throughout the country. If they have their responsibilities as British subjects, which they have always borne with loyal pride, they have at least the right to expect that the policy of His Majesty's Government will be consistent, just and honourable. It is as much for the sake of the British Empire as in the interests of Turkey that they expect this much—if not more.

Irish Home Rule and its Lessons.

ON JAN 16th January the third reading of the Irish Home Rule Bill was carried in the House of Commons by a majority of 367 votes against 257, the Liberal majority of 110 being the result of the combination of 248 Liberals, 72 Nationalists, 10 O'Rientals and 87 Labour Members. The Bill has been read a first time by the House of Lords, and the second reading will be taken on the 27th instant. Whatever its fate in the House of Peers, it seems that it will be carried at last and will receive Royal assent before the present Parliament is dissolved. It is, as Mr. Redmond said, "a great measure of conciliation and freedom and the final settlement of an ancient international quarrel." If Ulster recognises the inevitable and, wishing to forget the past, joins the Nationalists in working loyally for the good government of their common country, emancipated after more than a century, we have every hope that Mr. Redmond's confidence in the "millions of Irishmen in the Empire and in the United States who were eagerly waiting for the passage of the Bill for a complete reconciliation with England" will be justified by results.

The debate in the Commons has some lessons for us also in this country. In the first place, it is remarkable that particularly every Member of Parliament was present during the final scenes of the discussion. Only one Nationalist was absent because he was ill with paralysis. One of them was brought all the way from Dublin Hospital in charge of a nurse in order to assist his Party, and one octogenarian Radical and an invalid was carried into the House to vote. Thirteen Unionists, including Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, paired, and 9 others were absent owing to illness. No Liberals were absent unpaired, and only two of those who attended the debate voted with the Unionists. We wonder when it would be our turn in India to attain the same sense of discipline and public spirit when personal considerations could not come in the way of the performance of public duty. Tomorrow the Trustees of Aliquah would be called upon to attend their Annual Meeting, which is one of the two meetings that are generally held in the course of twelve months. It is true that the quorum of seven, which was fixed when the Board was composed of seventy members and has not yet been altered despite the lavish extension, is now never wanting when these meetings are held. But, to judge from the number of written votes received for the forthcoming meeting and still more from the reluctance of a number of Trustees to abolish the baneful system of voting by proxy, we doubt whether the attendance tomorrow would even go beyond a dozen. Attendance even at such important meetings has not a tenth of the attraction of ordinary official functions where an invitation is considered to serve much the same purpose of pedigree.

Another point worth nothing is that in the course of the debate Mr. Balfour, who moved the rejection of the Bill, said he was "shocked at the utter and dangerous want of comprehension of the Ulster Problem," but appealed to the Nationalists to try to be fair to Ulster and asked if the fears of Ulster-men were unreasonable "in view of what had happened in Ireland in the past and the anti-English attitude of the Nationalists." He warned the House that "if calamities arose and blood was spilt, which God forbid, then the real assassins would be those who never had the courage to face the situation in Ulster." Mr. F. E. Smith wanted the Liberals to consult Mr. Birrell "who knew the number of arms imported into Ulster." Mr. Bonar Law, who is nothing if not downright said that "Ulster would rebel and Ulster was bound to succeed because people would be ready to give up their lives in the cause." Sir Edward Carson, whose absence owing to illness was mourned by no less a person than the Prime Minister, may perhaps have proclaimed the rebellion of Ulster immediately after the voting in the Commons if he had been present. We wonder if the leaders of the Opposition, when they applaud the work of the Radicals in relation to Turkey, ever give a passing thought to the conditions of the Ottoman Empire and have the courage to face the situation in that still more distressed region. It is only now after a long and sometimes bloody struggle that Protestant England is going to do some justice to Catholic Ireland, and that too at a time when the Irish vote is essential for the success of the Radical programme in the government of England, Scotland and Wales. Ireland is in league with no foreign Power, and yet Protestant England has never scrupled to fling in her face the taunt that Home Rule would be nothing less than Rome Rule. If these Protestant gentlemen, who are even now keeping up the fight on behalf of Ulster, look a little into the history of the Ottoman Empire during the last century they will realise that Macedonia and Albania did not even to-day deserve autonomy, for what has happened in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Eastern Rumelia would happen again in the two European provinces of Turkey if they get autonomy. What is so curious is that a Liberal Government, which wishes to be so just and reasonable as to disendow the Church in Wales and to offer Ulster to the Irish Nationalists, should wholly ignore the claims of the Mussalmans in the Ottoman Empire.

There is, however, one lesson which we trust the co-religionists of the Turks in India would take to heart. When the Partition of Bengal was modified a year ago the Government of India stated in para. 9 of their Despatch that "various circumstances have forced upon us the conviction that the bitterness of feeling, engendered by the Partition of Bengal, is very widespread and unyielding, and that we are by no means at an end of the troubles which have followed upon that measure." The resentment among the Hindus of Bengal was stated to be "as strong as ever, though somewhat less vocal." That was the case when a measure which was not regarded as just to the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal had to be tolerated in order to reconcile the agitators. To-day when justice is being done to Ireland it is on the same ground. Mr. Asquith pointed out that what had to be confessed was "the undiminished vital demand of the vast majority of the Irish for Home Rule." "This demand," he said, "had been maintained for a generation with unvarying strength." Sir John Simon remarked that "the Irish demand for Home Rule had not weakened, but the enthusiasm of the Unionist rank and file had slackened." Does not all this go to show that a Government such as ours judges the expediency of acceding to popular demands from the strength and vitality of the demands themselves? This, indeed, is the basis of democratic rule, and if this is to be the psychology and the ethics of Government, how long are we to be told that agitation is not only needless but harmful? We trust there will never be an occasion before doing justice to Indian claims to refer to the administrators of this country and enquire the number of arms imported, nor would popular leaders try to fasten the guilt on the administrators for blood that has not been spilt and would not be spilt if an honourable understanding existed between them and those in power. Let us leave these tactics to Ulster and to His Majesty's Opposition, and work with the confidence that such "consistency, courage and resourcefulness" will remain the portion of men like Sir Edward Carson whom Mr. Asquith has either learnt or pretends to admire. For our part we are hopeful that there will be no such thing as a "perpetual friction" between India and England, and that "common sense and self-interest" would be "a safeguard besides patriotism and public spirit." We hope our rulers and the leaders of public opinion in this country would be able to "exercise the helpful influence separating the two countries and to unite them in a fruitful and enduring union." But to pass the expediency and wisdom of the grant of Home Rule to Ireland on the vitality of the Irish demand and to offer to Sir Edward Carson and Ulsteria the tribute of praise, and yet to seek to impose "final" decisions on Indian Mussalmans is childish and even worse. Indian Mussalmans may not be Irish Nationalists nor Sir Edward Carson, but they are not all babies and imbeciles.

CORRESPONDENCE

Allahabad High Court and the Govt. Advocate.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Allow me to lay before the public, through the medium of your esteemed journal, that in the Leader of to-day's date I find a leading article suggesting that the place of the Government Advocate in the Allahabad High Court should be conferred upon an Indian. In this connection five names of Hindu gentlemen only have been suggested as if there are no Muhammadans competent for the post or perhaps because they do not come under the category of "Indians." It would have been just and fair and would not have invited any criticism if the names of some Muhammadans had also been mentioned. We have seen for years that whenever any such question crops up Muhammadans are ignored, neglected and forgotten altogether, and when they put forward their legitimate claims they are described by "broad-minded and generous Indians" as selfish men who never fail to place obstacles in the way of Indian aspirations. Are these the ways and means of bringing about the two communities together, which is so much talked about, or of separating them wider apart? Under the circumstances, are the Muhammadans not justified in looking after their interests and demanding complete separation?

A MUSSALMAN.

A Mussalman's Position in a Mixed Electorate.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—The result of to-day's selection of two members for the Imperial Council by the non-official members of the U. P. Legislative Council clearly demonstrates the position of Mussalmans in relation to a mixed electorate. Out of 39 non-official members there are 4 Mussalman members, of whom 1 was absent. The number of non-official members present was therefore 28. Each member has the right of giving two votes. The following were the results:—

- | | | |
|---|-----|----|
| 1. The Hon'ble Rai Sri Ram Bahadur | ... | 22 |
| 2. The Hon'ble Pt. Madan Mohan Malaviya | ... | 19 |
| 3. Nawab Ishaq Khan | ... | 15 |

The Mussalmans had taken care to put forward almost the best candidate amongst them in these Provinces. Nawab Ishaq Khan has been in Government Service as a District Judge for a long time and has just retired. He has unanimously been elected as the Honorary Secretary of the Trustees of the M. A. O. College, Aligarh. It is reasonable to draw the conclusion from the number of votes recorded in his favour that the 7 Mussalmans present all voted for him and it is an open secret that he got one vote from a European non-official member and not a single vote came to him from any Hindu member. Is it open to say, in view of this state of things, that it is unreasonable on the part of Mussalmans to claim separate electorates for the Councils and for the Local Boards? I wonder what the opponents of the Hon. Mr. Burn's Circular have to say! No further comment is necessary from me.

The Coercion of Turkey.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Now that the Peace Conference of the Balkan belligerents seems most likely to break off owing mainly to Turkey's refusal to cede Adrianople, the Powers are putting pressure upon Turkey to yield to the demands of the Allies. This attitude of the Powers towards a friendless nation is bound to be considered as grossly unjust when we remember that before the war broke out they had declared most vehemently that whatever might be the result of the war the status quo in the Balkan Peninsula must remain unchanged. It is obvious now that this declaration was made by them in the supposition that the Turks would be victorious, for, as soon as the Allies scored their first victory over the Turks, the very Powers told the world that the status quo in the Balkans was dead. In fact, what they had supported in one breath they denounced in another. Later development of events, however, proved very soon that the optimism of the Powers was rather premature. The Bulgarians, who had boastfully proclaimed to the world that they would not rest content with anything short of an occupation of Constantinople, soon got a crushing defeat at Tchataldja and forthwith came to their senses, which made a discussion of the question of peace possible. But, unfortunately, the Allies elated with their initial successes and ignoring the potentialities of the vast Ottoman resources, not all of which had been turned into use till the armistice was signed, have put such exorbitant demands to Turkey that the latter has no other alternative left to her than to resume hostilities. No State having the least sense of national honour could do better under similar circumstances. The most amusing side of the affair at this moment, however, is that the Balkan States, who had refused to have anything to do with the Powers since the beginning of the war to the moment of signing the Armistice, now show an amount of deference to their wishes which is both surprising and suspicious. Evidently, the Allies, especially Bulgaria, now clearly see that while they have played their last card in the war for Turkey has just begun. They must, therefore, by hook or by crook, try to prevent the resumption of hostilities which is most likely to shatter their easily-gained prestige, as Turkey's military position has sufficiently improved lately. But should the Powers force Turkey to make an ignoble peace with her enemies, they are sure to bring upon themselves the curse of the entire Moslem world. For, if the few victories gained by the Allies have entitled them to the possession of cities which they have not been able to conquer from their adversary, it may be asked quite relevantly why the Turks were prevented from taking possession of Thessaly which they had conquered in the last Greco-Turkish war? Were not the Turks powerful enough to subjugate Greece at that time? But we forget the lesson impressed upon our minds again and again by the diplomats of Christian Europe that what can not be allowed to the detriment of a petty Christian State must be forced even to the ruin of a Muhammadan Empire. Let not Europe, then, try to assure the Moslem world that the occupation of Morocco by France, of Persia by Russia, of Tripoli by Italy and the combined invasion of Turkey's dominions by her Christian neighbours are but isolated events and not the outcome of a unity of purpose and policy adopted for the last hundred years by the Christian Powers towards the Moslem States. In doing so Europe only deceives herself.

The efforts of the Balkan States to rob Turkey of her European territories have evoked a chorus of praise from the bigots of Europe, who foresee in the lawlessness of these half civilized nations nothing but blessings for a highly patriotic fraternity. But, pray, what have the poor Arabs of Tripoli, who have been fighting for their native hearths against savagery, done to prove themselves unworthy of the same? They protested when Turkey proposed to disarm her refractory Christian subjects of Albania in order to establish security in her dominion; they were indignant and even troublesome when she imposed any new tax, however small, on her Christian subjects, or tried to put down the lawlessness of the Christian brigands in Macedonia; but they have turned a deaf ear to the shrieks and groans of thousands of helpless Muhammadans who have fallen victims to the shocking atrocities and brutalities of the allied armies in the Balkans, to which even the Christians of to-day have borne testimony. Thus, we see that our advocates of civilization and champions of humanity, who shout at the top of their voices over the imaginary grievances of the Christian subjects of a Moslem Empire, assume the rôle of mere passive spectators while the door of blood and lust is opened by the champions of the Cross in Moslem lands.

Whatever be the fate of the Moslem States that exist on the surface of the earth to-day, the Mussalman subjects of Britain earnestly hope that the British nation will at least not be a party, directly or indirectly, to the cruel and sinister plan of Christendom to put an end to the existence of Islam as a political factor in the world. If a strong Power is morally bound to show at least some respect for the sentiments of a people that have always remained its loyal subjects, let Britain show some consideration towards the feelings of her Mussalman subjects. Let her maintain that courage and sense of justice which have alone made her great and can alone keep her so.

HAJI BADRUDDIN AHMAD.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Jan. 17.

THE Right Honourable Syed Ameer Ali, as President of the All-India Moslem League in London, has written to Foreign Office and the India Office calling attention to the indignation aroused in India at the reports of barbarous outrages on Mussalmans in Macedonia by the Balkan invaders. He says there is no room for doubt that these Mussalmans have been subjected to treatment unparalleled in modern history. He points out that Indian Moslems have always entertained the utmost goodwill and sympathy for their Christian fellow-subjects and that their friendship has been unwavering in the storm and stress of Indian administration of recent years, and has been recognised as an invaluable asset of Empire, and the Committee of the Moslem League in London urges the importance to England of not appearing to the Moslem world as a partizan and upholder of injustice by shutting her eyes to these cruel deeds.

A St. Petersburg wire says that M. Theodoroff, Bulgarian Minister of Finance, has been negotiating for the establishment of a Russo-Bulgarian Bank. He goes to Paris to-morrow to negotiate a loan, and then to London in connexion with the finances of railways in the occupied territories.

A Constantinople wire says that the Note of the Powers was presented this afternoon.

London, Jan. 18.

M. Jonesen, Roumanian Minister of the Interior, is returning to Bukharest. The question at issue with Bulgaria is still not settled, but M. Nishu will continue negotiations with Dr. Danoff.

The Powers' Note has been presented at Constantinople. It draws the attention of the Porte to the grave responsibility of preventing the re-establishment of peace by resisting their counsels. The Porte will only have itself to blame if the prolongation of the war jeopardises Constantinople and extends hostilities into its Asiatic provinces. The Powers, therefore, advise Turkey to cede Adrianople and to leave the Powers to decide the fate of the Aegean Islands and to assure report for the Moslem edifices at Adrianople.

A message to the Times from Sofia states that the Bulgarians have lost 264 officers killed and 876 officers wounded and sick and 21,019 men killed and 51,000 men wounded and sick. It is stated that seventy per cent. of the wounded have recovered or are recovering. There were 85,000 cholera patients at Tchataldja, but the deaths numbered only 8,000.

The Note of the Powers has caused a most unfavourable impression among the Turkish delegates in London.

It is believed in Paris that the Turkish reply will be uncompromising on the subject of Adrianople. The Note contains one significant passage, intimating that if Turkey hopes to obtain the moral and material support of Europe to repair the evils of the war and to develop her vast Asiatic territories, the prosperity of which will constitute Turkey's most effective resource, she must defer to the counsels of the Powers.

The Ambassadors have decided that Mount Athos shall be regarded as an independent Ecclesiastical Republic.

Several influential Turkish Senators have appealed to King George, declaring that the massacres of Mussalmans continue in Macedonia in spite of the armistice, and asking the British Government to co-operate with other Cabinets in inviting the Balkan States to observe the principles of universal morality. A similar appeal has been made to other Sovereigns.

A deputation representing the Jewish communities of France, Germany and Great Britain, has arrived in Sofia with large quantities of provisions and clothing for distribution among the Jews of Adrianople after the siege is over.

A Constantinople wire says that Noradunghian, Minister for Foreign Affairs, has submitted to the Council of Ministers the draft of the reply to the Note of the Powers. It is understood that the Note insists on the retention of Adrianople because the Bulgarian inhabitants of the town are in a minority, because of the splendid defence of the garrison and because the loss of Adrianople, containing the mosques of the Caliphs, would rain the prestige of Islam. Moreover, Adrianople is the gate of Constantinople, and its loss would endanger the existence of the Empire. Therefore, the Note prays the Powers to make representations to the Balkan States with a view to peace. With regard to the Archipelago, the Porte refuses to give up the coast islands, although it is ready to negotiate with reference to the others.

London, Jan. 19.

An official despatch from the commander of the Turkish fleet confirms the report that it was the "Hamidiyeh" and not the "Majidiyeh" which attacked Syra. The despatch says that the Turkish vessel destroyed the powder magazine at Syra and also the Greek auxiliary cruiser.

An Athens wire says that after an all night reconnaissance by the "Hamidiyeh" and a destroyer, the whole of the Turkish fleet left Dardanelles yesterday morning and steamed in the direction of Lemnos. The Greek fleet immediately steamed to the attack. After fighting for an hour, the Turks fled. The Greeks pursued them, but after a two hours' running fight the Turks re-entered the Straits. The Greeks lost one man wounded. It is believed that several Turkish ships were damaged.

A Port Said wire says that the Turkish warship "Hamidiyeh" arrived there this morning. While approaching Port Said yesterday morning, she carried on a running fight with two small Greek cruisers. One anchor was lost and the other damaged.

The "Hamidiyeh" is now coaling and provisioning.

London, Jan. 20.

Reuter learns that the Balkan delegates in London have hitherto no official cognisance of the decision of the Powers that Mount Athos shall be regarded as an independent ecclesiastical republic. They express surprise that they have not been consulted in the matter, particularly as Greek troops are at present occupying the Peninsula. It is understood that the Republic will be under the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarch under the protection of the Governments adhering to the orthodox Greek Church. The Peninsula will be occupied by an international troop of Police.

A Constantinople wire says that the Government have decided to convene the National Assembly on Tuesday to consult regarding the situation. It is inferred from this the reply to the Powers will not be delivered for some days.

Reuter learns that it is believed that the Turkish reply to the Powers will not be an absolute non possumus, but will leave a loophole for further negotiations.

The delegates of the Allies in London declare that the next move must lie with the Powers. No action will be taken until after the views of the Powers are known, but if the Powers are unable to proceed to take urgent measures in the event of a Turkish refusal, then the Allies will take matters into their own hands, as they cannot wait indefinitely on the goodwill of Turkey.

The reports of the naval action in the Dardanelles are now conflicting. The Turkish official version says the Greek vessels were damaged, after which the Turks returned victoriously to the Dardanelles. It is reported in Constantinople that there was another fight on Sunday in which both sides lost heavily. There is no confirmation of reports.

It transpires that there was a serious quarrel in the Dardanelles on Monday last between naval officers who were anxious to fight the Greeks and others who considered that the Turkish Navy was no match for the Greek fleet. It is stated that blows were exchanged and that fifteen officers were wounded. The dispute followed upon the discovery of a proclamation, signed "Women of Turkey," suggesting that the Commanders of the forts should sink ships the officers of which were too poor spirited to fight the Greeks.

The Montenegrin Peace Mission on Friday presented to Sir Edward Grey and the Ambassadors of the Powers in London a memorandum explaining why Sentari, Ipak and Prizrend should be annexed to Montenegro, declaring that Montenegro would rather disappear as a political factor in the Balkans than renounce her claims. The memorandum is accompanied by a map showing the extent of the territory claimed by Montenegro. It is understood that the other Balkan missions are preparing similar statements. A Vienna wire says that Count von Berchtold has sent a telegram inviting M. Jonesen, Roumanian Minister of the Interior, to visit him while on his way to Bucharest, but M. Jonesen yesterday evening traversed Vienna without interrupting his journey.

It is officially announced in Athens that the entrance to the harbour at the Piræus is mined and that no ships will be allowed to enter or leave except between seven in the morning and five in the evening, and a pilot must be on board.

WE WROTE very much we were unable to publish the photographs contained in this Supplement shortly after the departure of the All-India Medical Mission to Turkey. The delay has been due to the fact that a friend in Bombay who had been entrusted with the photographs could not send them earlier for publication. But as it is, however, we publish them to-day. There is a special appropriateness in the occasion for as many as we have received this week three letters from Dr. Ansari—the very first sent to us from Constantinople, and all full of news which would be greatly devoured not only by our readers, but by millions of Mussulmans in India. More than this, Dr. Ansari was the first to cable to us the welcome news of what cannot be described except as a revolution and is hardly less remarkable than the two previous revolutions in which that gallant hero, Enver Bey, in whom the world and Turkey may yet find another "Little Corporal" from Corsica, took such a prominent part. We have been amply recompensed for any trouble we may have taken in organising the Mission by the service which Dr. Ansari rendered us in removing within an hour the inexpressible load of depression and gloom which had settled upon us on hearing through Henter of Kemal Pasha's abrupt surrender to the Allies. The second letter of these sentiments of ours for publication in this issue, we received his third letter which rewarded us amply enough for our patience and self-denial. It is too long for publication in this issue which is already delayed by our desire to include in this Supplement a portion of the second letter which we received only an hour ago. But we cannot withhold from our readers some extracts which will, we are sure, increase the desire to receive the next issue when the whole of this letter will be published. Writing on the morning of the 31st December, Dr. Ansari says—

"Orders had been given to our Transport Department to get all the baggage ready by 6 a.m. At 6 a.m. only could clearly discern the shadowy outlines of the minarets and domes, the old fortresses and the new buildings along the shores of the Bosphorus. There lay Stamboul in its proud but sad dignity, and the feelings it aroused in one's mind were difficult to analyse. Those hills and old forts now crumbling down had seen the advent of the might of the Turks, the fall of the Byzantine Empire and the rise and glory of the Ottoman. Now, alas! the time had come when they were watching the gradual dismemberment of their Empire and

Dr. Ansari was scribbled off by the Manager to the Director's dictation as he was very busy in making arrangements for taking the Mission to Sanjak Tzeta near Hademkui, the headquarters of the late Nazim Pasha, some 15 kilometres from Constantinople where they were to work. We are glad that Dr. Ansari is unwilling to sacrifice any time needed for the performance of his duties as the Director of the Mission to correspondence for the Comrade. But just as we were sending note from the British Ambassador. But the Croussant Rouge with the help of Cook's man took charge of our baggage. We formed a line walking in twos, and as we came down with Colonel Mehmet Ali Bey, the Guard of Honour gave us a salute and the band played the Turkish National Anthem. That was the first and would probably be the only place for representatives from India to be honoured with a salute. You could imagine how much we all appreciated this and the reigning monarch. As His Majesty was passing us, at the sound of a drum we shouted in one voice "Padişahem Chooq yasha!", in response to which the Sultan gave a very gracious bow towards us and smiled at us and called the chief A-D C., Saleh Pasha, who came to us with a message from His Majesty welcoming us and expressing His Majesty's gracious appreciation. Nazim Pasha also came to us and spoke to us and, after shaking hands with me, asked me if I was pleased with the way His Majesty had received us. On entering the mosque I found that the place was already too crowded, but I could see the interior from my place. It is built like a London theatre, only the building is square instead of being round. The public prayers where the stalls and pit would be and His Majesty, with his suite and the Cabinet Ministers, occupies the place where the dress circle would be situated. The first half of the Khutba was read by one man and the second half by another man in green cloak and turban. They had beautiful voices and recited with perfect Ko'ah, a chorus of Qaris repeating "Amen" and other suitable responses during the Khutba.

It was really a most artistic and musical Khutba one has ever heard.

We stood there in two rows and awaited His Majesty's arrival and watched all the soldiers standing on both sides of the rows and the corps diplomatique awaiting His Majesty's arrival at the entrance to the grounds of the mosque. London, Jan. 21.

Reuter learns that the Bulgarian Premier has empowered the delegates in London to telegraph to General Savoff direct instructing him to resume hostilities when they think there is no reasonable prospect of conclusion of peace. It is pointed out that the Balkan soldiers must be able to return to their fields at the latest at the beginning of February, otherwise famine will be inevitable.

A Belgrade wire says that all officers and men on leave have been ordered to return immediately.

There is no doubt that the Greeks achieved a considerable naval success. The Allies have warmly congratulated Greece. It is officially stated in Athens that the Turkish squadron consisted of eighteen units with 148 guns and the Greek squadron consisted of twelve units and 106 guns. The fighting started at 7,500 yards. The Greeks eventually increased their speed. Within four thousand yards the "Medjidiyeh" and the "Mesandiyeh" ceased firing and the "Barbarossa" and the "Torgat" slackened fire, enveloped in steam. The Turkish line was in great disorder and steamed at full speed towards the Straits, the funnels emitting flames.

A message from Port Said says that the "Hamidiyeh" has entered the Suez Canal and is proceeding towards the Red Sea.

London, Jan. 22.

A Belgrade message says that all officers and men on leave have been ordered to return immediately.

The Ambassadors in London will to-day take up the question of Albania.

Montenegro and Servia have already submitted a memorandum detailing their claims; the former demanding Scutari, Ipck, and Prizrend and the latter Prizrend and Prilep.

The Greeks have commenced an attack on Bizani which is the key to Janina.

The meeting of the Grand Council at Constantinople has been adjourned to Wednesday. The general impression is that the attitude of the Government towards the demands of the Allies is weakening.

The Turkish warship "Hamidiyeh" after leaving Syra proceeded to Beirut, where sighting a cruiser, probably a German cruiser, the Breslau, which she took for a Greek, she cut her anchor and left at full speed. Sighting on Saturday night two destroyers supposed to be Greek the "Hamidiyeh" fled to Port Said.

Reuter learns that Bulgaria has agreed to cede to Rumania territory on the coast southward of Mangalia which will be made a naval base. This has not been feasible hitherto owing to its proximity to the frontier. This cession removes the chief difficulty.

M. Theodoroff, Bulgarian Minister of Finance, has arrived in London for the purpose of sounding financial circles in view of an impending loan which is intended mainly for enterprises arising out of the new situation.

London, Jan. 23.

A Constantinople telegram states that the Grand Council met at Dolmabahache Palace yesterday. Eighty prominent persons were invited including most of the senators, under-secretaries and ecclesiastical dignitaries of Islam. It is understood that the Council decided in favour of accepting the Note of the Powers for the conclusion of peace.

Later.

The decision was almost unanimous. After only a slight discussion the Government frankly declared in favour of acceptance of the Powers' advice. A Note accordingly will be handed to the ambassadors to-morrow in which the Government will place itself in the hands of the Powers and agree to their proposals regarding Adrianople and the islands.

Severe financial penny prevails in Constantinople. December salaries have not yet been paid.

Montenegro demands Scutari, Ipck, and Djakova, not Prizrend. Servia proposes as the natural frontier between Albania and Servia, the watershed between the Adriatic and Lakes Prescha and Ochrida.

The Balkan delegates in London are satisfied with Turkey's position, though they point out that several important questions must be settled before peace is signed: including the payment of an indemnity, the proportion of Ottoman debt to be assumed by the Allies, and the question of railways.

It is believed in Constantinople that the Note in reply to Powers will be a plain straightforward acceptance of their proposals, but that an attempt will be made to make reservations leading to further discussion. But with the question of Adrianople settled in principle it is unlikely that an early conclusion of peace will be achieved.

The Grand Vizier, Nazim Pasha, the Minister of Finance, and the Foreign Minister spoke at the Grand Council.

Nazim Pasha said that the army was eager to fight though there was a chance of retreating Salongia or Monastir or even of relieving Adrianople; but other questions besides military ones militated against the continuation of hostilities.

The Minister of Finance explained the dependence of the treasury on foreign markets.

The Foreign Minister said that there was little hope of European complications. He emphasised the attitude of Russia, who had twice recently warned the Porte that a continuation of hostilities might compel her to depart from neutrality.

The Berlin Press attacks the German Government for surrendering to the Triple Entente in their extorting the surrender of Turkey, which they attribute to Russian threats to invade the Asiatic vilayets.

The facts of the naval engagement have now become known. Encouraged by the reports of the success of the "Hamidiyeh" the Turkish commander ventured southward as far as Tenedos, where he began to retire slowly.

Immediately the Greeks were sighted the Turks fired over 300 shells. They claim to have inflicted much damage, though they themselves suffered severely. The warships "Assari Tewfik" and "Torgut Reis" were badly hit. A shell exploded in the turret of the latter, everyone being killed and both guns disabled. Altogether four officers and 86 men were killed and 104 wounded.

It is officially reported in Athens that an artillery attack on Bizani began at eight yesterday morning along the entire front and continued till six in the evening. The Turks replied in a feeble manner. A general advance followed, the Greeks dislodging the Turks from the outlying positions, and the enemy fled in disorder towards Bizani.

London, Jan. 24.

Reuter learns that Sir Edward Grey will probably convene the Peace Conference on Monday when it will formally draw up in the form of a protocol Turkey's decisions.

The Balkan delegates in London point out that there are still many serious and complicated questions awaiting settlement.

The signature of the treaty is hardly possible for a month.

It is believed that the Allies may agree to take over thirty-two millions sterling of Turkish debt, accepting half of it as war indemnity. The Montenegrins say that the conference of ambassadors who on Wednesday discussed the question of Albania were much impressed with their view. They declare that they will not accept the Austrian proposal to give Montenegro a portion of the shore of Lake Scutari without the town itself and Montenegro is ready to fight for it.

A Budapest telegram states that the War Minister has ordered a partial demobilisation of the reserve.

The Turkish Cabinet has resigned. General Mahmud Shekhet has been appointed Grand Vizier, Talaat Bey Minister of the Interior, and Izzet Pasha Minister of War.

In an interview with Reuter's representative Talaat Bey said: "This means that we shall save the national honour or perish. We do not desire a continuation of the war, but we are determined to keep Adrianople."

Later.

The crisis was of a dramatically sudden character. The Cabinet met at noon to prepare a Note accepting the proposals of the Powers. The crowd assembled outside the Porte and deputed Enver Bey and Nizari Bey to inform the Cabinet that it must retire.

Enver Bey returned with Kiamil Pasha's resignation. He then went to the palace and brought back an order appointing Mahmud Shekhet Pasha as Grand Vizier with the rank of Marshal. Prior to the demonstration loyal troops were sent to manœuvre outside Constantinople while a battalion which had gone over to the Committee of Union and Progress was sent to the Porte.

The proclamation by the Committee denounces Kiamil Pasha and his colleagues as traitors and says that the new Cabinet will utilise the whole resources of the nation to protect the fatherland and restore the honour of Turkey. The city was perfectly quiet in the evening. It was raining in torrents and disorders are unlikely.

Nazim Pasha was shot by the demonstrators. Prior to the resignation of the Cabinet Enver Bey and Talaat Bey had forbidden bloodshed, but when Nazim Pasha's aide-de-camp fired from the window of the Porte the demonstrators returned fire, killing Nazim Pasha. Nevertheless order in the city was not disturbed.

The official announcement of the Cabinet's resignation says: "The decision of the Cabinet in reply to the Note of Powers to abandon Adrianople and part of the islands was unconstitutional, and submission of the decision to an extraordinary assembly was in violation of the right of the people. This procedure roused the indignation of the country and led people to hold a demonstration before the Sublime Porte and caused the resignation of the Cabinet." At seven o'clock in the evening the crowd had not dispersed.

Great excitement prevails among the public to-day. There has been some fighting in which about a dozen persons were wounded. Many arrests have been made.

On Monday, the Bulgarian Frontier, will have been visited by Sir Edward Grey this afternoon. A great number of the representatives of the Balkan States will be present, and it is expected that the Allies' course of action.

It is understood that the ambassadors in London will urge the Balkan States to hold their hands until the new Turkish Government has replied to the Note of the Powers.

Mahmud Shekfat Pasha has completed his Cabinet. He himself takes over the Portfolio of War in addition to being Grand Vizier. Haji Adil Bey is Minister of the Interior and Mukhtar Bey Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Cabinet met this afternoon to draft a reply to the Powers' Note.

An Athens message says that General Rajundzakia in a despatch says that it has been raining uninterruptedly since Monday. The advance of the Greek right on the evening of the 21st inst. was slow owing to difficult ground.

The Greek occupied a line between Bisani and Catallo. A mixed detachment which pursued the enemy captured four guns and several prisoners. The enemy sustained heavy casualties.

News from Turkish Sources.

(SPECIALLY TRANSLATED FOR THE "COMRADE.")

CONSTANTINOPLE newspapers received by the last mail are full of the tale of atrocities committed by the troops of the Allies in Macedonia. The Jeune Turc devotes almost two columns entitled le Dossier des Allies every day to a full description of these atrocities. The literature on the subject has assumed such proportions that it has been considered advisable to form a committee with the object of publishing the acts of atrocity. Nearly all the important newspapers of Constantinople are represented on this committee whose great object is to draw the attention of the Porte and the Powers to this "vile and ignoble aspect of the war." We are informed in the Jeune Turc of the 2nd January that "the Ottoman Government have decided to protest to the Powers against the massacres committed in Macedonia. According to authentic reports the number of victims is estimated at more than a hundred thousand."

The Jeune Turc publishes several articles written by Senator Batzarla on the subject of the peace negotiations at London. The demands of the Allies at the London Conference are very happily summed up by the eminent Senator in the following sentences (Jeune Turc of the 27th December): "In short what is it that the Allies demand? Three things: the cession of the Ottoman territory which they have effectively occupied, the cession of the territory which they have been unable and will always be unable to occupy, and thirdly the cession of that territory which they have never entered." And it should be borne in mind, he adds, that according to the history of the other wars of the world "the people vanquished and reduced to complete powerlessness have only surrendered a part of the territory effectively occupied by the victors." In the opinion of Senator Batzarla matters seem to be drifting towards war rather than towards peace.

In the Jeune Turc of the 29th December Senator Batzarla discusses the possibility of the Peace Negotiations resulting in a war between two European Powers. "A short while ago," he remarks, "a foreign diplomatist told me that the European Powers will never go to war with each other to serve the interests of the Orientals or any other people that they consider half civilized. As a guarantee of our future existence, therefore, we should not rely upon the disagreements of European Powers with each other, we should find it in ourselves, in our own strength. The Powers may have in our country interests diametrically opposed to each other's, the point of view of one may be different to that of the other, but the recent happenings in Morocco and Persia prove clearly that in the support of their respective interests the Powers will not go to the extent of an open conflict with each other. A modus vivendi will always be found."

The lull in the war is enlivened by reports of stubborn fighting at Soudri and Jautia. Hasan Raza Bey, the Commandant of the Turkish troops at Soudri, is evidently not a believer in the value of armistices and peace negotiations; for when the Montenegrin Government sent an emissary (Jeune Turc of 2nd January) to Hasan Raza to negotiate for the suspension of hostilities, the Ottoman Commandant flatly refused to receive him and promptly followed up his words by leading a sortie against the Montenegrins at a time when it was least expected. He lost three men killed and forty-five wounded, but returned with a booty of two guns and more than two hundred and fifty prisoners.

Things seem to have been going badly with the Greeks near Japina. The Universel received the following telegram on the 30th of December from Athens: "An artillery duel commenced at Bazani and was followed up with a furious onslaught by the Turks. The Turks had concentrated in great strength on the right wing and launched an impetuous attack on the Greeks. A most desperate action has taken place. General Sepoundzakia has arrived with reinforcements. The artillery duel continued throughout the night. The Greek losses are considerable." This telegram, received by the Jeune Turc, has passed the Greek Censor, and we may take it that it does not err on the side of exaggeration so far as the Greek losses are concerned.

Indications of preparation for the resumption of hostilities can be discerned in almost all the Turkish newspapers. Nazim Pasha seems to have been particularly active and is back again in his bureau at the War Office. Councils of Ministers, visits of Foreign Ambassadors and the Sultan's great desire to visit the Tchataldja lines are other items of interest.

A letter of Enver Bey published in the Jeune Turc of 1st January is, however, specially interesting, touching as it does upon the circumstances of his departure from Tripoli. We will quote Jeune Turc's words: "Lt.-Col. Enver Bey whose desire was to continue the resistance against Italy even after the conclusion of peace, has left Tripoli for Europe to fight in the ranks of the Turkish Army. The Frankfurter Zeitung publishes a private letter received at Berlin from Enver Bey. He says: 'In spite of my previous intentions I have been obliged to leave Cyrenaique abruptly to work at a place—it does not matter where—in which I can render myself useful. The latest telegrams from Constantinople suggested the reflection that my fatherland perhaps needed my services and I decided at once to go. But I could not and would not leave to the Italians the Arabs that I have led and defended for more than a year and whom I love from the bottom of my heart. I therefore took measures which will permit of the successful resistance being continued.' Enver Bey goes on to describe what he has done in Africa. By levying duties on merchandise coming from Egypt, by imposing taxes on the exports by camels, and by putting paper money into circulation (a part of which has already been redeemed) he has been able to find the wherewithal for starting elementary schools and an industrial institution for organizing the Administration under the direction of the Sheikh, and for forming two companies of gendarmes and troops comprising infantry, cavalry, artillery and a detachment of mitrailleurs. Enver Bey believes that the task of the Italians in Cyrenaique will always be difficult. His letter ends with the following words:—

"My comrades are there still to continue the work, and by refusing the presents sent by the King of Italy the great Sheikh of the Senonensis, Said Ahmed, has clearly expressed his warlike intentions and has thrown down the gauntlet in the face of the Italians. If I tell you that in spite of all this I rejoice at returning to Turkey it is because I hope again to be useful to my fatherland after the sad events of which I have just been informed."

Interview With Osman Nizami Pasha.

(FROM THE "PIONEER" LATE CORRESPONDENT IN THE NEAR EAST.)

London, Jan. 3.

OSMAN PASHA is a man of middle age, probably not more than five and forty, who, after passing through the Military College at Constantinople, was allowed to enter the Staff College, and so joined the Army with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and the post of A.-D.-C. to the Sultan. He speaks Western as well as Eastern languages with equal fluency, and is as much at home in English as in Turkish. He is the only Turkish Delegate who understands our language. I found him at the Carlton busy over cypher despatches, but on recognising me he at once put aside his work and willingly offered to give me all the information at his disposal.

My first question naturally was as to the reason for the setbacks of the Turkish Army. "Ah!" replied the General, "You may well ask that and I will give you my reasons for what they are worth, for you must remember that I was not present at any of the engagements, that my visit to Tchataldja was only during the armistice; but I have had long conversations with many Generals who were through the campaign, notably with Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha, who speaks of you in the warmest terms and regretted that you were not with him in this war. Well, you must know, that we were not in the least prepared for the war, it was sprung upon us in the most cowardly fashion. For the past year we had been fighting the Italians with our hands behind our backs; owing to the lack of a fleet we were unable to send any reinforcements to Tripoli, but we did send a large number, several thousands of our best young officers, to organise the Arabs in their gallant defence of their country. Then we heard that the Bulgars and Serbs were arming and then commenced the diplomatic war, they accusing our troops of attacking their villages and demanding reparation. This was followed by the Montenegrins doing the same thing. We foresaw difficulties and prepared to mobilise, but representations were made to us by Sir Gerald Lowther and others

Ambassadors begging us not to take any steps that might be considered provocative, that the Great Powers were determined there should be no war, and that we need not fear any overt act of hostilities so long as we did not provoke attack. Well and good, we at once gave orders for the troops to stand fast. However, the attitude of the Balkan States became more and more hostile, and at last the Great Powers addressed to us and at the same time to them a warning that in the event of hostilities neither party would be permitted to obtain any territorial or pecuniary advantages. That surely, argued the wisacres of the Chancellories of Europe, will cure the hot bloods of the Balkan States, they will never embark on a war when they know they can reap no advantage. However, the Great Powers forgot that the smaller Powers had wills of their own and the world was astonished at the delivery of an ultimatum couched in such terms that we were compelled to look upon it as a declaration of war.

"We were in no condition to commence hostilities. As I have just told you many thousands of our best young officers were in Tripoli and, moreover, we had massed two complete Army Corps of Nasim troops and five of Redifs on the coast of Syria in order to repel an Italian landing on the coast. So it happened that many of the battalions of our Army Corps in Europe were terribly short of officers. Some few had seven, some had but two Company Officers. All the Redifs of the European corps were on the coast of Syria as were the Reservists of the Active Army. They had been drafted to the Syrian Corps to bring them up to war strength with trained men. Well the war broke out in Europe, and the battalions of the Rodosto, Monastir and Adrianople Corps which were at peace strength had to be placed on a war footing. Their ranks were hastily filled with men who had never been taught how to load a rifle and the instruction of these raw recruits had to be taken in hand by the two or three company officers with the battalions. Here again our lack of a fleet told heavily against us. We had nearly 150,000 trained men on the coast of Syria, but these were for the moment unavailable, they had to march round to the railway near Konia, a distance of several hundred miles, and it is only since the declaration of the armistice that these regiments have reached Tchataldja.

"Then again our cavalry and artillery were short of horses: We had foolishly adopted the European idea of allowing our gun teams even to be on a peace footing. When war broke out we were 48,000 horses short for the cavalry and artillery of our European Army Corps. Their places were filled by untrained horses and long before these were fit to take their places in the ranks, they were led into action and the consequences were fatal. Untrained men on untrained horses under the fire of quick-firing artillery and modern rifles!

"Another great defect was the want of good roads. Even those in the immediate vicinity of the capital became veritable quagmires after a shower. No attempts had been made by Governors of Provinces to carry out the laws for the construction and maintenance of roads. You know that every Turkish subject has to give so many days' labour for the maintenance of roads and large sums are annually voted for this purpose. These sums have for many years been misapplied. We have an old proverb, 'He who drinks out of the waters of the Government is a swine.' In other words the man who does not rob the Government is a pig. Well there are few pigs in Turkey, for every man has dipped his hands deep into the pockets of the Malieh. Bad roads prevented the rapid concentration of our troops and then Marshal Von der Goltz's boasted mobilisation schemes failed utterly. The corps existed on paper it is true, and when the order to mobilise went forth the men did turn up as Turkish soldiers ever will. But where were the transport trains? Where was the money to purchase the animals? None was forthcoming and regiments were hurried off to Stambul without the equipment, without transport, without officers. In this state they crossed the Bosphorus and were pushed up to the front, arriving there like a pack of sheep, none knowing who was his leader, to what corps, what brigade he belonged. Yet the men fought well. It was not the Bulgarians or the Serbs, or even the Greeks who defeated us. It was want of organisation and hunger. Take the case of the fighting at Kirk Kilisich and thence to Lüle Burgas and the retirement to the Tchataldja lines. No transport existed at all in Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha's army. He was compelled to attack the Bulgarians who were swarming down from Jamboli threatening our communications with Adrianople, but his men had been without food for three days. They were thoroughly exhausted, they had no reserve ammunition, the roads were abominable and the horses sank up to their hocks in mud, stiff clay, the guns up to their axles. It was impossible to move them even with double teams, and the infantry owing to lack of food were too exhausted to lend a hand. The men fell out in numbers to search for bread and then some of the enemy's cavalry appeared and a panic took place. Mahmud Mukhtar endeavoured to restore order and even shot down men with his own hands, but starving men are not alive to reason and it was not until he had rallied the best elements of his army at Lüle Burgas that he was able to reform his corps.

"All these stories of the crossing of bayonets, of the daring charges of the Bulgarians are false: I have been over our hospitals and I have spoken with numbers of officers who have been present in every action of the war. I have seen plenty of men with bullet and some with shrapnel wounds, but a bayonet or a sabre wound I have not heard of. I do not decry the Bulgars. Their Army was excellently organised, they chose a good time for their attack, but they are not the undaunted heroes of Lieutenant Wegener's fables. They are just ordinary mortals and were the war renewed we now would meet them on more equal terms and in a month we should be in Sofia.

"Now let me turn to the Peace Conference and the terms of the Allies. These are preposterous and can never be accepted. Adrianople is the ancient capital of Turkey in Europe and the burial place of our earlier Sultans. We have already lost Prizrend where Murad the First was interred after the Battle of Kosovo in 1389, but we can never cede Adrianople. It is the Key of Constantinople. In Bulgarian hands it will always be a standing menace to Turkey. In ours it reveals been a menace to Bulgaria. It has not fallen. Why then should it be surrendered? We have an old proverb 'What was won by the sword, must be taken by the sword.' If Adrianople had fallen, the case would be different. We then might have reluctantly acquiesced in its transfer. Now we certainly shall not do so. We are prepared to bow to the wishes of the Great Powers and permit Albania to be created an autonomous State under a Prince of our own house and under the suzerainty of the Sultan and we must bow to the inevitable and allow Macedonia to pass from our hands. But Thrace we must and shall retain. And, of course, the Islands we can never cede. It is true that owing to accidents to our fleet some of the islands have been occupied by the Greeks, but you must remember that we have never had any garrisons in those Islands. They are principally inhabited by Greeks and it has been our custom to allow them a perfect freedom. This will be confirmed to them, but from a strategic point of view it will be fatal to the security of our Asiatic Empire to have islands at our very gates in the hands of people who still lay claim to Byzantium. We are determined not to abandon Thrace or Adrianople. If war is to be resumed we are ready for it. All our weak spots have disappeared. We now have 75,000 men, good fighting men, in Gallipoli and 200,000 at Tchataldja with another 80,000 between Konia and Scutari nearing the Bosphorus every day. Every day's delay brings strength to our forces, every day's delay weakens our enemy. If they reject our proposals, we are ready to fight and of the result I have no fear."

Principle and Performance.

THE Vossische Zeitung has a caustic article on the application of the "principle of nationalities" as practised or advocated by the Balkan Allies. The collapse of the principle of the status quo has been followed by the collapse of the principle of nationalities in the name of which the Balkan Allies went to war. The use to which it was put formerly is well known. In its name bands attacked each other and turned entire villages to ashes, and fraudulent statistics were thrown at each other's heads by Greeks, Servians, and Bulgarians. Now the conquered country is being divided in a manner which has nothing to do with the principle of nationalities, and which aims only at one object, the acquisition of new territory by the Balkan States.

To take the vilayet of Adrianople. No one doubts that it is the most Turkish of all the European provinces of Turkey. The best proof of this—whatever "cooked" statistics may say now or hereafter—is the fact that it was the only vilayet which was never affected by bands and bombs. There were Macedonian committees and bands under various names, late in the day even a "revolutionary Macedo-Adrianople committee" was called into life. But the entire activity of this, as of the other committees, was concentrated in Macedonia. Yet Bulgaria is now claiming the vilayet and the city of Adrianople, in the name of what? Surely it cannot be in the name of the oppressed Bulgarian nationality. Or take the coast of the Aegean, to which Bulgaria aspires. Is it in the name of the principle of nationalities? Not in the least, since all that part is inhabited by Greeks. It is equally the case with Salonica, where the Bulgarians form only a small percentage of the population, and where the Greeks are not very numerous, and with Scutari, which even the boldest imagination will not call a Servian or Montenegrin town. The Sandjak of Novi-Bazar, it is true, is preponderantly Serb, but the further south one goes the less Serb is the country. About twenty years ago Uskebi was Serb, but now it is Bulgarian. At best Serbs may be found down to Kóprülü, but no further, yet the Servians claim quite a respectable piece of territory beyond that town. In short, wherever one turns one finds that the principle of nationalities is grossly neglected.

There is, however, this to be said—what does not yet exist may be made to exist, as witness the quick changes from one nationality to another which have constantly gone on in Macedonia. One day a man was Popoff, and was a Bulgarian, the next day he was Popovitch, and was a Servian. Before the Berlin Congress extended the borders of the then Principality of Servia southwards the population between Nish and the present Serbo-Bulgarian frontier spoke Bulgarian. At the present all the Servians there. Similarly some districts which are now Bulgarian were essentially Servian; now there is no trace of Servian there. Should, then, Uskub become Bulgarian, there would soon be no more ardent Bulgarian patriots than the brave Uskubians, but should it be annexed by Servia the patriotism of its inhabitants will all go over to the other side. The Berlin journal concludes:—"Such in reality is the Balkan principle of nationalities. Could it have been really applied in the matter of delimitation the Allies would have had no cause for quarrelling. As it is the negotiations on the subject of delimitation are giving rise to the greatest anxieties. Land, more land!—such is the watchword. The question of nationalities will come later on. It will be solved either because the population will acquiesce, or because it will be driven out, or because a new nationality will be imposed upon it by force."

With reference to Uskub, which presumably has been given away by Bulgaria to Servia, it is interesting to note that according to the best local computation, made before the war, its total population of about 45,000 souls consisted of 25,000 Moslems (almost entirely Albanians), 10-15,000 Bulgars, about 2,000 Serbs, 2,000 Jews, and a sprinkling of Gypsies, Greeks, Italians, and western Europeans. As for the vilayet of Adrianople, official Turkish statistics give the following figures:—Moslems 508,311, Greek Orthodox 316,863, Bulgars 107,843, Armenians 24,060, Jews 15,500, and Greek Uniates 1,096.

Adrianople.

The fate of Adrianople has become the crux of the Peace negotiations—a veritable bone of contention. A triumph of the Bulgarian demand would restore Christian dominion over that city after the lapse of five and-a-half centuries. For nearly a hundred years after its capture by Murad I. in 1361, the city was the capital of the Sultans, until 1453, when, upon the fall of Constantinople, they transferred their residence to the Golden Horn.

At this stage there is no need to insist upon the importance of Adrianople as a military centre—situated as it is at the point where the confluence of the Tundja and the Arva render the Maritza navigable. Its position, at the junction both of trunk roads and of a number of branch roads with the great eastern road to Constantinople, imposed upon the Turks the duty of constructing the elaborate system of fortifications facing the Bulgarian frontier which have offered such a prolonged resistance to its invaders.

Apart from its military importance as a fortress and as the headquarters of the 2nd Army Corps, Adrianople under Turkish rule has had little either to distinguish or commend it. The city has long since fallen from the high estate to which it had seemed destined when, some 1,800 years ago, the heathen Uskudama of the Bessi was rechristened Hadrianopolis by its second founder. Even in those far-off days it enjoyed unenviable favour as the cockpit of the East. It was in the neighbourhood of Adrianople that in 323 Constantine the Great defeated his rival Licinius and that five years later the Visigoths routed the Emperor Valens and destroyed the city. There too, in 1205, Baldwin, the Latin Emperor of Constantinople, was defeated and made prisoner by the Bulgarian Tsar Kaleyán, who afterwards put him to death. In 1361 the city was besieged and taken by Murad I., and from 1365 until the fall of Constantinople in 1453 the city remained the capital of the Sultans.

The ruins of the Eski Sarai, to the north of the city, are one of the few surviving memorials of this era. It was not until the 10th century that the great Mosque of Sultan Selim II., the glory of the city and one of the masterpieces of Turkish architecture, was erected. Legend has it that when the Sultan realized that the mosque was likely to be the finest building of its kind in the Empire he announced his intention of putting the architect to death as soon as he had completed his task, so that he might not be tempted to build a rival to it elsewhere. The architect, a Bulgarian, Sinan by name, who likewise designed the Shahsadeh or Prince's Mosque at Constantinople, heard of the Sultan's resolution and determined to outwit his patron. When the last minaret of the mosque had been completed he fitted to his shoulders a pair of wings which he had made for the purpose, leaped out from the tower, and committed himself to the air, in the hope of escaping from the city. Unfortunately his movements were impeded by a carpenter's tool which he had disposed in the fold of his garment, and he shared the fate of many of his 20th century imitators.

The mosque itself, with its colonnade of marble and granite monoliths, which are believed to be the remains of Roman buildings, is crowned by a cupola in its dimensions almost equal to that of the Santa Sophia at Constantinople, and flanked by four slender, fluted minarets nearly 200ft. high. The cupola is supported by four massive porphyry pillars, but the span of the dome is so vast that its expanse seems to be suspended in midair. Lovers of art will not be alone in hoping that the fire of King Ferdinand's gunners will have spared this jewel of the Orient, which its natural guardians have been none too solicitous to preserve. Even before the siege visitors who ventured to ascend the 300 steps which lead to the topmost gallery of the minarets were warned not to lean against the crazy balustrade! The Uthah Sherifi Ujami, another quadruple-minaretted mosque, is used by the Turks as a depot for military stores. Yet another mosque, the Mosque of Murad IV., likewise with four minarets, the Dayazid Mosque at Yilderim, with a fine cupola, and the Muradiye, built by Murad I., go back to the palmy days of the city. The old palace of the Sultans, also built by Murad I. in the 14th century, in which Charles XII. of Sweden was confined for a time after the battle of Poltava in 1709, was blown up by the Turks themselves in 1878 before the entry of the Russians, who, when Field-Marshal Diebitch-Sabalkansky captured the city in 1829, had done nothing to provoke this breach of trust to posterity. In connexion with the capture of the city by the Russians it may be recalled that the Treaty of Adrianople in 1829 represents an important landmark in the history of the Balkans, and it was there likewise that was signed the armistice which brought to a close the campaign of 1878.

The picturesque dignity which these historic buildings impart to the city when viewed at a distance is belied at close quarters by its mean streets and tumbledown wooden houses. The greater part of the eastern quarter of the town was burned down in 1905 and had not been restored before the war broke out. Viewed from the railway station the city lies to the north-east, with the great mosque rising in the background as its most prominent feature. Grouped about it are the Greek cathedral, the colonnaded bazaar of Ali Pasha, the palace of the local Governor and other administrative buildings, the Imperial Ottoman Bank, various colleges, and a fire-tower. The central city expands into fine suburbs that in turn blend into a series of scattered villages, interspersed with vast and irregular tracts of woodland, in which poplars, cypresses, and plane trees predominate. Indeed, the whole of Adrianople has been likened to an immense overgrown village. The population, which is half Turkish and half Jewish, Greek, Bulgar, and Armenian, numbers some 85,000, but the inhabited area is so expensive that it is at first difficult to credit this estimate. After the insurrection in 1903, moreover, several thousand Bulgars, especially from the rural districts, fled across the frontier. Muhadjirs were settled in the deserted villages. The city nevertheless remained the see of two Bulgarian Bishops, as well as of a Greek Archbishop.

The situation of Adrianople in the most favoured portion of the plain of Thrace made it for many years the natural clearing house for the trade of the region. But the Russo-Turkish war and the disjunction of Eastern Rumelia isolated Adrianople and transferred to Philippopolis at least two-thirds of its foreign trade, which as regards seaborne goods, is carried on through the port of Budgas. Agricultural products, raw silk, opium, stear of Russia and the dye of the madder-root, known as Adrianople or Turkey red, are among its principal exports. Its wines, although they are made by the most primitive methods, are the best in Turkey. The weaving, carpetmaking, and other manufacturing industries are not what they used to be. The rivers, which are spanned by a dozen bridges—one of them the Michael's Bridge, dated back to the days of the Greek Emperors—are no longer uniformly navigable, except for shallow-draught barges. Adrianople, in point of population and mercantile standing, ranks after Salonica. Edirne, as the Turks have called it, was the first capital of the Turkish dominion in the peninsula, and it was from this great camp that sprang and spread the might of the Osmanli. Adrianople has retained the impress of its history and remained the most characteristically Turco-Tatar city in Europe. Its destiny could be better calculated to make it lose this character than the reunion of the upper and lower portions of the Maritza Valley under Bulgarian dominion.—The Times.

Horrors of the War.

Bulgar Outrages.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH'S" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, Jan. 1.

THE horrors of the Balkan War are coming gradually to the knowledge of the European public. The crimes of the Serbs against the Albanians, of Greeks against the Jewish population of Salonica, and of the Bulgarians against the Roumanians and Islamites form one of the most terrible chapters of modern history. An association has been founded in Constantinople with the object of collecting documents and information on the atrocities of Balkan armies and bands, which will be published in a Black and Red Book and circulated throughout the entire world. In this collection of facts the following narratives will be found, which an Austrian lady living in Kavalla sent by letter to her brother, who is living in Vienna. It must be remarked that the original of this letter, which chiefly deals with the cruelties of the Bulgarian komitajis, is in the hands of the Vienna authorities. Thus lady writes from Kavalla on Dec. 9 to the Vienna Montags Zeitung.

"Just a month ago five robbers—no, I mean komitajis, paid by the Bulgarian Government—arrived here suddenly at eight in the morning, took the Governor of the city prisoner, and declared it a Bulgarian town. The Greeks living here raised their voices in protest, joined the robbers, and behaved as if they were possessed. During the afternoon twenty-five or thirty more robbers arrived and announced that the place was under Bulgarian rule. On the following day the whole town went to meet them, with the exception of we foreigners, taking the Greek bishop with them, and the ladies putting flowers in the barrels of the rifles carried by the robbers and bandits, while all the bells were rung, and in the evening the city was illuminated.

"MAN HUNT" BEGINS.

"On the following day a 'man hunt,' or, more properly speaking a 'Turk hunt,' began. People who had committed no other crime than that they were Islamites, and these the best situated in the city, were taken prisoners and executed without even the pretence of a trial in the cruelest manner. For this purpose the Bulgars employed two Armenians. The civilised nations will hear with astonishment what is possible among Christians in the twentieth century. At midnight the prisoners were awakened and bound together, half naked, in twos and threes, and then wounded in the abdomen, between the ribs, and in other parts of the body, with bayonets. The murderers then reversed their rifles and beat them to death with the butt-end of their guns like mad dogs. Age or rank formed no reason for mercy. On the first night thirty-four were tortured to death, on the second fifteen, on the third eight, and on the following night thirty, until 116 were killed in Kavalla alone.

"In Serres, a neighbouring city, the Turks defended themselves, and shot two soldiers. Thereupon their officer took out his watch and said: 'It is four o'clock now. You may do what you like to the Turks until four to-morrow.' That was enough for the soldiers. The brutal wretches murdered 1,200 Turks in twenty-four hours.

END OF THE DRAMA.

"At Xanthi the people took refuge in the mosques, but the bloodhounds followed them there, cutting them down and hacking them to pieces. All this was done in the name of the Cross, and in the honour of God! The drama concluded with the beheading of a rich Turk, whose head was then placed on the top of a box and a pipe placed in his mouth.

"When all the Turks were massacred the soldiers turned their attention to the Jews. But naturally only to the rich Jews. They were carried away to Schenkarba and tortured for six long days, and then liberated on payment of ransoms of £11,000, but the manner of their liberation was almost more horrible than their capture. At midnight the prison gates were suddenly opened and a cry of 'Forward!' was heard. Naturally they believed that their last hour had come, and they were nearly frightened to death. When they learnt that they were free they naturally begged to be allowed to remain there until break of day. This was not permitted. They were forced to travel on foot in the streaming rain for seven hours, and among them there was an old man of eighty.

FURTHER ATROCITIES.

"Here in Kavalla a solemn service was commanded for November 31, because it was believed that Constantinople had surrendered. At nightfall the city was again illuminated, while eighteen Turks were murdered. Thereupon all the mosques were proclaimed Christian churches, and the demolition of the minarets was proceeded with. The Turkish cemeteries, graves, and monuments were devastated in the most dreadful manner, many of the gravestones being broken into pieces. The soldiers broke into the Turkish houses, where the men had been murdered, despoiled them, and maltreated the women. They terribly mutilated one woman, and killed her before the eyes of her children. These murderers are now no longer here, but a military dictator has been put in command, while the leader has threatened the resident Greeks that anyone who resists will be sent to the military court at Drama. The Greeks were not accustomed to such language under the 'oppressive' rule of the Turks, and they say that if the land remains Bulgarian they will emigrate. There are even some who sigh for the hated domination of the Turks, but it is now too late.

"The Khedive has already sent flour on two occasions, first 4,500 sacks and then 1,000, while 8,000 Turks have left the country to go to Egypt. The Khedive has shown more magnanimity than the civilised Christians, for he had these 5,500 sacks of flour distributed among the poorer population of Kavalla without distinction of religion, although he knew what cruelties had been shown towards his co-religionists.

"Everyone has fled, and a terrible time of trouble is approaching. The continual rain has ruined the crops, the labourers are dead or crippled, while others have left the country. I cannot imagine what will happen in the future, for robbers will spring up like mushrooms, and murder and plunder will then begin in earnest."

Atrocities in Albania.

Buda-Pesth, Dec. 31.

King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, in his proclamation of war, spoke of a conflict between the Cross and the Crescent. The Cross was the symbol of humanity and mercy, virtues which the Turks, in their numerous fights against the Christian peoples, frequently neglected to practise. In the last Balkan war, however, this did not hold good. Those fighting under the Cross betrayed the symbol of humanity and mercy in many cases. The atrocities which the Serbian soldiers and officers were responsible for in Albania are established by the reports of Austrian, English, Italian, and Norwegian war correspondents. It appears that the "man hunts" which Serbia perpetrated in Albania have been forgotten during the last few weeks in the more pressing cases caused by the possibility of a general conflagration in Europe. But now they again come to the light of day, for all the reports on the cruelties practised by the Serbian soldiers have been gathered by the Austro-Hungarian authorities.

EXTERMINATION POLICY.

I have had an opportunity of seeing these reports, and I am in a position to say that all the cruel persecutions related in the history of the world have been repeated in the most flagrant manner by the troops of General Jankovitch. On their march through Albania to the sea the Serbians did not only treacherously murder and execute armed Albanians, but their horrible cruelty did not stop at falling upon unarmed, defenceless persons, old men, women, children, and infants at the breast. The Serbian officers, intoxicated by victory, declared that the most effectual pacification of Albania would be the total extermination of the Muhammadan Albanians. This mot d'ordre was quickly adopted by the Serbian army of occupation, and was put into practice. Between Kumanovo and Uskub some 8,000 persons were done to death; near Pristina 5,000, exclusively Arnauts, fell beneath the hands of the Serbs. This was not in honourable fight, but by unjustifiable murder, and to carry out these crimes the maddened soldiers even invented new methods of cruelty to satisfy their lust for blood. In many villages all the houses were set on fire, and as the unfortunate inhabitants fled before the flames they were shot down like rats as they appeared in the open. Men were shot in sight of their wives and children, and afterwards the helpless women were forced to watch their children being literally carved to pieces with bayonets.

Even the papers which appear in Belgrade narrate the atrocities practised by the Serbian soldiers without shame. When the regiment of Colonel Ostitch entered Prizrend the Colonel shouted "Kill." The Belgrade papers say that hardly had this order been given "than the soldiers rushed into the houses and murdered everyone who fell into their hands."

But the tale of the atrocities which were perpetrated in Albania is by no means exhausted. The deeds done in Prilep, Kocanovo, and Werschitzza exceed everything which the Albanian of note who fled from Prizrend to Graz, in Styria, and who had studied in Austria as a youth, relates the following story:

MURDERS IN USKUB.

"Whoever denounced an Albanian to the Serbians was sure that the man would be shot. It happened repeatedly that persons who owed money to Albanian Muhammadans informed, on them, designating them as traitors. They were invariably hanged, and the debtor was enabled to purchase the house and farm of the victim at an absurdly low price. In Uskub unarmed Albanians were simply shot down by Servian officers in the street, and if only a hunting knife was found in a house the owner was shot. No mercy was shown."

The loss the resistance of the Albanians to the invading army the greater were the atrocities.

At Verisovitch the Servian commander invited the fugitives to return and lay down their arms. After they had done this 400 persons were cut down. In the whole of Verisovitch merely half a dozen Muhammadan families were left alive. At Pana the Serbs killed their prisoners, while at Varos and Pristina the population was literally decimated. The Servian officers themselves say that they "hunted out" the Albanians, and an officer boasted that he had shot down nine Albanians in one day.

Constantinople, December 16th, 1912.

(Sd) HENRY P. KERRY,

Hon. Treasurer

(Sd) F. E. WHITALL,

Vice-President.

The above is the first statement published for the operations of Lady Lowther's War Relief Fund up to November 30th, 1912.

The fund as initiated by Lady Lowther with the co-operation of the British community in Constantinople was intended primarily to relieve the destitute families of soldiers at the front without distinction of race or creed and, should funds permit, of helping the refugees.

The first few days were spent in organizing the work. Two Central Committees were formed, one composed of ladies and the other of gentlemen, and a dozen Sub Committees were constituted which divided the town and suburbs into districts and undertook the work of personally investigating, with the local authorities, all the cases brought to their notice and of arranging for the distribution of relief which takes the shape of daily rations of bread, charcoal, quilts and clothing. A Central Executive Committee was also formed to control the weekly credits to be allotted to each Sub-Committee and generally decide questions of policy. It was deemed advisable to proceed at first with caution, but the distribution of relief is growing larger week by week and is now working most automatically. Three new Sub-Committees have already been framed in districts hitherto untouched. Regular relief is given to some 3,000 individuals, at a cost of about £1,350 a week and over 4,000 refugees have been provided with clothing. The number of gentlemen and ladies who are giving their services to ensure the proper working of the scheme is over 150.

In no cases whatsoever has the relief taken the shape of money grants to individuals although a certain sum has been applied for soup kitchens, hospitals, etc.

As the funds at the disposal of the Committee increased, thanks in great part to the efforts made in England by the Committee under the temporary Presidency of the Rt. Hon. Sir Frank Lascelles, G. C. B., and in India and Egypt under the auspices of Lord Hardings and Lord Kitchener, it became possible to undertake the somewhat difficult task of granting systematic and regular relief to the destitute refugees who were flocking in scores of thousands to Constantinople.

A special Refugee Sub-Committee has been formed and a sum of £1,800 has been put at its disposal to support entirely, throughout the winter months, some 5,000 of the most unfortunate of the refugees, chiefly unprotected women and children. A start has already been made with some 1,900 refugees to whom charcoal, clothing and medical attendance is being given. In the course of the next few days it is hoped that some 3,000 more refugees can be taken entirely under the care of the Committee and housed in buildings which the Turkish authorities are very kindly placing at the disposal of the Committee.

The extent of the work which can be done is naturally limited to the amount of funds available, every penny of which is carefully controlled and used to the utmost advantage, and all those who have so generously contributed to the undertaking, either by donations or personal service, may feel assured that they are participating in a work of humanity and charity of the highest order and bringing relief and consolation to thousands of their fellow human beings who, through no fault of their own, are in a state of misery and despair.

According to the latest information from London the fund now exceeds £120,000, which will enable the Committees still further to extend their operations, in the direction of relief for the refugees.

A Genuine Book Bargain.The Mameluke or Slave Dynasty of Egypt from 1260-1517 A.D.

[When the Caliphs of Baghdad were no longer able to retain the territories, conquered by their predecessors, they bought multitudes of Slave from the Tribes of Central Africa and trained them as soldiers to fight their battles. The same policy was pursued in Egypt by the Fatimide Caliphs, and after them by the Eyyubite dynasty. The military slaves thus introduced were called Mamelukes. They soon began to lord it over the native inhabitants, and from them arose the Sultans who governed Egypt for two and a half centuries].

Entally, the 24th October 1912.

DEAR SIR,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

The Delhi Outrage.

The "Pioneer's" Bombay Correspondent telegraphs:—

The Bombay City Police are stated to have obtained a clue to the perpetrators of the Delhi bomb outrage. Suspicion points to a gang of Brahmans, an offshoot of the Nasik conspiracy.

The Sind Gazette writes:—It is reported that materials for manufacturing bombs have been found in or near a Hindu temple on the banks of the Lyari River in Karachi. The possible significance of such a discovery at a time when the Governor of Bombay has just been on a visit to Karachi, and will soon be passing through Karachi again, need not be exaggerated. But it is stated that just before His Excellency's arrival in Karachi, some Mahrattas from the Deccan suddenly discovered that they had business in Karachi.

The Mussalmans of Lahore assembled in a crowded mass meeting on the 26th January under the Presidency of Maulvi Muhammad Abdullah Peshawari. The following resolution was passed:—

The Mussalmans rejoice at the recovery of H. E. the Viceroy from the effects of a detestable and dastardly outrage on Lord and Lady Hardinge and convey their hearty congratulations.

The Viceroy's health.

A Bulletin issued from Viceroyal lodge on the 28 Jan. states:—In consequence of His Excellency the Viceroy's weak state of health and the presence of an unhealed wound, the duty of performing the opening ceremony at the Legislative Council yesterday was only carried out by the exercise of great effort. His Excellency was in consequence much fatigued, but he has passed a good night. The wound is not progressing as rapidly as it should, this being possibly due to the presence of a small portion of dead bone or foreign body. An examination by X-rays will again shortly be necessary. The neuritis previously reported does not at present show signs of abatement. As a complete rest for a further considerable period of time is absolutely essential, the Viceroy, accompanied by Lady Hardinge, is proceeding to Dehra Dun, where it is hoped the change of air will accelerate His Excellency's recovery. Bulletins will be issued from time to time from Dehra Dun.

The Viceregal party left Delhi on Tuesday night by special train for Dehra Dun. Lord and Lady Hardinge were accompanied by the Hon. Diamond Hardinge, Miss Sanford, Colonel Maxwell, Military Secretary, Colonel Roberts and Major Blackham and Major the Hon. H. J. Fraser, Captain Tod and Captain Astor, Aides-de-Camp. The departure was private.

A Message from the Viceroy's Camp, Dehra Dun, dated the 30th January, states:—His Excellency the Viceroy stood the journey to Dehra Dun well and yesterday afternoon was examined by the X-rays, the result of which was the disclosure of some foreign bodies in the wound. This morning the Viceroy was operated on under chloroform when several small fragments of metal, wood etcetera were removed. His Excellency is doing well and it is hoped that the removal of these fragments will accelerate the healing of the wound.

The following news has been received from Dehra Dun:—

Jan. 31.

The Viceroy passed a restless night, the wound which was opened up at yesterday's operation giving His Excellency much pain and discomfort.

Later.

Though yesterday's operation was wholly successful in its result, it has necessarily made a considerable draft on the Viceroy's strength and he has now consented definitely to abandon his intention of attending the University Convocation at Calcutta in March: a function to the carrying out of which His Excellency's medical advisers have been strenuously opposed from the first.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

The Viceroy's Speech.

ALTHOUGH I have not yet recovered from my wounds, and have been compelled under doctor's orders to abstain from all public business of every kind, I have felt not only a desire, but that it is my duty, to come here to-day to open the first session of my Legislative Council in Delhi, and to give a cordial welcome to the newly elected and newly appointed Members of my Council. I am sure that at the same time none of you will begrudge me an expression of regret for those who have not returned: since after two years' loyal and active co-operation with my Government in the legislative work of the Government of India, I regard them not only as former Colleagues in Council but also as friends. I am delighted to see some of the former Members of my Council again in their places, and I am confident that they will again bring to our Council the same spirit of harmony, goodwill and legislative ability as during the past two years that I have had the honour of presiding over their deliberations. As regards the new Members of my Council, I bid them a cordial welcome and I am sure that I can count on them to maintain the same high standard of dignity in debate as has so markedly distinguished our deliberations in the past.

I feel deeply grateful to you all for the warmth of your reception here to-day. I always knew that I could count on your sympathy in the suffering that has been my lot during the past few weeks; and if there has been one thing that has tended to alleviate those sufferings, it has been the knowledge of the sympathy shown towards me by all classes, creeds and communities throughout the length and breadth of India. I should like to take this opportunity when addressing my Council, who represent the whole of British India, to express my profound gratitude for the genuine outburst of sympathy, the devout prayers and good wishes that have been heard on every side; and if I may be allowed to say so, I feel convinced that those prayers have not been unanswered. When five weeks ago I had recovered consciousness and was able to think over what had passed, my feelings were, in the first instance, those of profound gratitude to Almighty God for His merciful protection of Lady Hardinge and myself, of real grief for the poor man who had lost his life in the performance of his duty, of very deep disappointment that it were possible that such misguided men as those who plotted and committed such a senseless crime could now be found in India, and of sorrow at the thought of the injury to the sentiments of the whole of the people of India who would, I knew, regard with horror and detestation the perpetration of a crime which is contrary to their own precepts and instincts of humanity and of loyalty, as well as to their religious principles. The gratitude that I felt at the miraculous preservation by the Almighty of Lady Hardinge and myself from the hand of the assassin was, I know, also deeply felt throughout India, but words fail me when I think of the cruel murder of those humble people who were ruthlessly killed and I deeply deplore the loss which their families have sustained. In my desire for kindly intercourse with the people and accessibility to them, I have always discouraged excessive precautions, and I trusted myself and Lady Hardinge more to the care of the people than to that of the police. If it was an error, it is an error that I am proud of, and I believe it may yet prove not to have been an entirely mistaken confidence, for out of evil good may come. Is it too much to hope that the storm of public indignation evoked at the outrage may give Indian terrorists cause for sensible and humane reflection and repentance? It is difficult to believe that these individuals are a class apart, and that they do not belong to communities and mix with their fellow-beings. Are they really susceptible to no influence and no advice? Have they no contact with moderate and wise men? Still, whatever I may feel on the subject of the crime itself I only wish to assure you and the whole of India that this incident will in no sense influence my attitude. I will pursue without faltering the same policy in the future as during the past two years, and I will not waver a hair's breadth from that course.

What I have said so far has been somewhat of a personal character, but I have one word more to say to the people of India which I say with a profound sense of the gravity of the import of my words. I need hardly recall to the memory of anybody that the recent incident is not an isolated episode in the history of India, but that during the past few years both Indians and Europeans, loyal servants of Government and of India, have been less fortunate than I have been, and undeserving of the cruel fate meted out to them, have been stricken down by the hand of the assassin. These deplorable events cast a stain on the fair name of India and the Indian people, to whom I know they are thoroughly repellent, and I say to the people of India—not merely as a Viceroy intensely jealous of the honour of the country that he has been called upon to govern, but as one of the many millions in India of the fellow subjects of our King-Emperor, and one who loves India and the Indian people amongst whom he is living—I say that this stain must be removed, and the fair fame of India must be restored to a high and unassailable plane. Knowing, by the kindly and genuine manifestations of sympathy received from every side, how profoundly repulsive such crimes are to the people of India, it may be asked what remedy can be applied to prevent their recurrence. To this I would reply that such crimes cannot be dismissed as the isolated acts of irresponsible fanatics, and that they are in most cases the outcome of organised conspiracies in which the actual agent of the crime is not always the most responsible. The atmosphere which breeds the political murderer is more easily created than dispelled. It can only be entirely and for ever dispelled by the display and enforcement of public opinion in a determination not to tolerate the perpetration of such crimes and to treat as enemies of society, not only those who commit crimes, but also those who offer any incentives to crime. Amongst such incentives to crime should be included every intemperance of political language and methods which are likely to influence ill-balanced minds and lead them by insidious stages to heinous crimes. The universal condemnation throughout the whole of India of the crime of the 23rd December, and the anxiety shown for the detection of the criminals have, however, filled me with hope for the future, and have inspired me with confidence in the determination of the people of India to stamp out from their midst the fungus growth of terrorism and to restore to their beautiful motherland an untarnished record of fame. Imbued as I am with this hope and confidence, my faith in India, its future, and its people remains unshaken, and if, as I confidently anticipate, the realisation of my faith is confirmed, then I may add that the two innocent lives so sadly lost on the 23rd December will not have been sacrificed in vain.

After Sir Gangedhar Chitnavis and Sir Charles Armstrong had spoken His Excellency rose again to thank his Council for the sympathetic and friendly sentiments which had been voiced by these two members and added, "I fear I shall not be able at present to preside further over your proceedings. I should have liked to shake you each personally by the hand, but you see my arm is still in a sling. So I am sure you will all take the will for the deed, and will also forgive me for leaving you so soon on this occasion of my first public appearance."

The All-India Medical Mission.

We publish below the letter received from Dr. Ansari from which a few extracts were given in our last —

In my last letter I gave you a resume of my doings in Constantinople, but in this one I am going to give you full details which may prove of some interest.

As our boat approached the Straits of Dardanelles we saw three mou-o'-war going towards the Bgean sea some distance from the Isle of Tenedos. These were probably the units of the Hellenic fleet which had engaged the Turkish fleet the day previous in that vicinity. It was a beautiful clear day and the sea was as calm as a lake, the air was transparent and you could see the coast of Europe and Asia converging towards the Dardanelles with little villages dotted here and there along the coast. The approach to the Straits showed steep hills with hidden fortifications. Here and there the muzzles of big guns were to be seen from behind the earth works pointing towards our boat. In some places long flagstaffs pointed to there being an arsenal and some soldiers on duty could be seen walking along. We were told that there were some seventy thousand soldiers stationed there. There is no doubt that the entrance to the Straits is well fortified and would smash up any fleet which tried to enter into it. Our boat was timed to reach the entrance to the Straits at about 1 p. m., and as we neared the entrance we saw a number of ships all in one line passing through the Straits. We were told that no boats were allowed before 1 p. m. and after sunset. We soon reached the wharf at the entrance of the Sea of Marmara called Dardanelles, and we could hear from a distance a band playing the Turkish National Anthem. We stopped here only for half an hour and as we proceeded on our journey we saw the Turkish fleet which consisted of 4 gunboats, the "Medjidieh," bearing the Standard of the Admiral, and three torpedo boats. We were also shown the Greek boat which was captured in the beginning of the war. We were not much impressed by the strength of the Turkish fleet although taken individually the boats appeared to be in the best working condition. The Turkish fellow-passengers naturally took great pride in their fleet and thought no end of it. The boat "Medjidieh" which was reported to have been struck by a torpedo from a Greek boat and sank was there in a very good condition. Here two Turkish doctors boarded the steamer, one a military doctor and the other Dr. Adani Bey, Member of the Council of the Croissant Rouge. We got a lot of information from Adani Bey about the working of the Red Crescent Society. He informed us that the most likely places where field-hospitals would be needed should war be declared were at the Dardanelles, Gallipoli and another place on the shores of the Marmara. He gave us a great deal of information about things in general. It was most amusing to see our attempts to make him understand our meaning as he knew only French and Turkish. He also informed us that Enver Bey was in Constantinople and Niazzi Bey was at Scutari and Fethi Bey was in charge of a battalion in the Dardanelles. We passed Gallipoli at about 8 p. m. It was all dark and we could see only the lights on the shore.

Dec. 31.

Orders had been given to our Transport Department to get all the baggage ready by 6 A. M. At 6-30 we were all ready after a hurried breakfast, groping in the dull cloudy and misty morning to see any landmarks of the Capital of the Turkish Empire. About 6-45 we could clearly discern the shadowy outlines of the minarets and domes, the old fortresses and the new buildings along the shores of the Bosphorus. There lay Stamboul in its proud but sad dignity, and the feelings it aroused in one's mind were difficult to analyse. Those hills and old forts now crumbling down had seen the advent of the mighty Turks, the fall of the Byzantine Empire and the rise and glory of the Osmanli. Now, alas! the time had come when they were watching the gradual dismemberment of their Empire and the decadence of Moslem rule.

As the boat approached the quay a large crowd of Turkish people could be seen waiting on the shore. We were met by Colonel Mehmet Ali Bey, the Inspector-General of the Croissant Rouge, and two military doctors of the rank of Colonel and many other notabilities. The ubiquitous "Man from Cook's" was there, and we were also met by a man with a note from the British Ambassador. But the Croissant Rouge with the help of Cook's man took charge of our baggage. We formed a line walking in twos, and as we came down with Colonel Mehmet Ali Bey, the Guard of Honour gave us a salute and the band played the Turkish National Anthem. That was the first and would probably be the only place for representatives from India to be honoured with a salute. You could imagine how much we all appreciated this and felt the honour bestowed on us. In one action our eternal brotherhood was sealed.

We were driven in 8 carriages to the Kadergah Hasta Khaneh (قادرگاه حستخانه) (hospital worked under the auspices of the Croissant Rouge). In the course of our breakfast here Basim Omar Pasha—the Vice-President of the Croissant Rouge—arrived with several other notable personages. The Pasha is a very eminent surgeon and Gynecologist of European fame and the real backbone of the Red Crescent movement in Turkey. He made a speech in Turkish, which was translated to us by Saleh Effendi in Urdu, welcoming us in the name of the Croissant Rouge and the Turkish nation and thanking us for the Islamic love and brotherhood which we had shown in coming here for their help and succour. He said that the Croissant Rouge was yet an infant and that its foster-father was India. In reply to his speech I thanked him heartily on behalf of the Mission and pointed to him that this infant which was brought to life by the famous accoucheur (himself) had soon under his skilled care become a vigorous and lusty child proving itself most useful to its mother Turkey in time of her need.

We were taken round the hospital by a Turkish gentleman who is one of the surgeons in the hospital. He showed us some very interesting cases of bullet wounds and gangrene due to cold. Afterwards Baroness Rosen, who is a Belgian lady at present working in this hospital, took us to her wards. It is a hospital with 200 beds comparatively clean and the patients are fairly well looked after. Dr. Solmani Bey, the Director of the Hospital, and the Baroness have shown us every kindness and hospitality and have made us very comfortable. So has Ujevdet Bey, the Manager of the Hospital.

Thomas Cook's man could give me no information about our field-hospital, nor could Mr. Monney, the Second Secretary of the Embassy, who had called to see us at the hospital. I asked Mr. Monney to make inquiries about our field-hospital which was due before our arrival and which would probably be in charge of a store-keeper. I felt very anxious and decided to make inquiries at the British Post Office and Cook's the next day.

Jan 1.

We started after our breakfast with our interpreter for Pera. The streets of Stamboul are made of cobble stones and very badly kept. They are steep and often the gradient is so sharp that one would never imagine that driving in a carriage would be at all possible. But the horses and carriage in Stamboul seem to be made specially for these bad roads and stand the bumps and the sharp turns very well. The houses are built on European models and generally three to four storeys high, with the only difference that all the Mahomedan houses have screens in the front windows. The women are seen going about in the streets freely with a "charouf" which is generally made of silk and covers the entire body and face. But the outline of the face can often be made out even through the thick black veil. On our way we passed the central municipal buildings where we saw a crowd of women, about 1,000 to 1,500 in number, in very ragged and torn clothes, looking the very picture of misery and helplessness awaiting food and clothes. These, we were told, were the refugees from the different Turkish villages now in possession of the Balkan Confederacy. But the Government is very good to them. They are clothed, housed, and fed by the Municipal Funds and are provided with money when they are sent to the provinces in Asia Minor.

However, on making inquiries I felt sure in my mind that an organized relief fund to help these sufferers from the war would greatly mitigate their suffering and materially help them to start in life. I have not yet had sufficient time to make a thorough investigation in the matter, but I have been assured by the Croissant Rouge and several other people connected with the different charities that all is being done for them that is possible. On our way to the Galata or New Bridge as it is now called we passed the Bureau Centrale of the Croissant Rouge, the Persian Embassy, the Bureau of Commerce and Industry, the Finance Office and the General Post Office buildings which would be considered first class in any European capital. There are a number of big shops just before you come to the bridge, kept mostly by Armenians, Greeks and Jews. The bridge itself is made of iron and is of modern construction. It spans over the commencement of the Golden Horn and connects Stamboul with Galata and Pera, the European town. There is a toll to be paid by every man who crosses the bridge excepting the military people and the Croissant Rouge men. Pera is situated on a hill. The streets are narrow and winding although the buildings are mostly made of solid stone and of modern type. Neither Thomas Cook's office nor anyone at the Embassy could be seen, it being the New Year's Day, but we left our cards at the Embassy. We sent the cable to you after considerable discussion with the chief of the staff of the Turkish Telegraph Office, where we had to keep a copy of our unicode to assure them that our cables were not in any way connected with war news. In the afternoon Col. Mehmet Ali Bey went with us to the War Office where on inquiry we found that Nazim Pasha had gone to the Grand Vizirate. However, we paid a visit to Fuad Pasha, his Chief of the Staff, who received us very cordially and gave us coffee and cigarettes after the Turkish fashion. We gave him full details of our Mission and the field-hospital and made urgent request for immediate work. He suggested to us a place near Hademkui, which is about 15 kilometres from Tchataldja, where we could fix our hospital tent and start work as soon as we were ready. We simply jumped at the suggestion and to make the arrangements complete we went to see the Inspector-General of the Sanitary Department of the War Office, Weiner Pasha, who is the person in charge of field hospitals. He confirmed the arrangement and told us to proceed to Sanjaktapah as soon as we were ready. We came away well satisfied with the progress we had made so far as we were informed by Dr. Mohamed Hussein, the Director of the Bombay Mission, that so far they had not been given any work as their things had not arrived.

Our visit to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Nuradaghian Bey, was very short and could not have lasted for more than three minutes. He received us in great hurry, read the letter of the Consul-General and talked to Mehmet Ali Bey and our interpreter and then said goodbye.

On our return home we found a letter from Mr. Monney which he had left in the hospital saying that no trace could be found of our hospital. This news rather upset me and I sent two telegrams at once, one to you and another to Mr. Ameer Ali.

Jan. 2.

As this is the rainy season here I found it necessary to provide all the members of the Mission with water proof over-coats and a pair of boots with gaiters. This item came rather expensive and cost us about £145, but it was necessary as you would see for yourself. The boots were paid for by the members themselves. We went to Cook's where we were given the bill of lading from Mawson & Sons for the goods they had sent by the Messagerie's boat—altogether 301 packages. This relieved me of my great anxiety about the cables on the previous evening. There was also a letter from Mr. Ameer Ali and one from Dr. Snyced.

In the afternoon we went to the War Office again and were presented to General Nazim Pasha, who was very nice to us. I told him every detail about our field-hospital arrangements which seems to have pleased him immensely. He said our hospital would prove very useful should war commence. He is a very broad, tall, military looking man of very few words, but genuine and sincere. He offered us coffee and cigarettes and when we were taking leave of him he promised to speak to His Majesty about us before the Selamluk the next day.

We visited the دارالفنون (the University for Science and Arts) now converted into a hospital under the Croissant Rouge. The Director of this hospital is a Turkish gentleman who was very hospitable and kind to us. He took our party round to all the wards and showed us the food which was given to the patients. There are altogether over 1,000 soldiers and, although they are overcrowded and the wards are not very clean, they are by no means uncomfortable or badly looked after. The Bombay Medical Mission is quartered here. One of the doctors, Dr. Nazar Haq of Bhopal, who was laid up with influenza was about to return to India. We paid him a visit and we met the members of the Bombay Mission.

We had intended to see the Shaikhul Islam this afternoon, but on telephoning we found he was not at home.

A photograph was taken of all the members of our Mission with Dr. Sohami and Madame la Barone Rosen of Belgium.

Jan. 3.

We were all dressed in our uniforms and looked our best in the corded breeches and the new boots with goloshes and left the Kadergah Hospital at 10 A. M. for the Central Office of the Red Crescent, where we were to be joined by Col. Mehmet Ali Bey, who accompanied us to Dolmeh Baghcheh Mosque. We drove in eight carriages and arrived at the mosque by 11 o'clock. Here we were given a place very near where His Majesty the Sultan's carriage stopped. We stood there in two rows and awaited His Majesty's arrival and watched all the soldiers standing on both sides of the rows and the corps diplomatique awaiting His Majesty's arrival at the entrance to the grounds of the mosque. At the sound of music two men proceeded from the mosque bearing silver incense-burners in their hands and met His Majesty's carriage as it entered the archway. The Sultan drove in a pair and carriage with a postillion in front. The horses were wonderful grays such as I had never seen before anywhere in my life. I was told that these horses are of a special breed which has been preserved generation after generation and are used only by the reigning monarch. As His Majesty was passing us, at the sound of a drum we shouted in one voice "Purshaham Chooq yasha!", in response to which the Sultan gave a very gracious bow towards us and smiled at us and called the chief A.-D.-C., Saleh Pasha, who came to us with a message from His Majesty welcoming us and expressing His Majesty's gracious appreciation. Nazim Pasha also came and spoke to us and, after shaking hands with me, asked me if I was pleased with the way His Majesty had received us. On entering the mosque I found that the place was already too crowded, but I could see the interior from my place. It is built like a London theatre, only the building is square instead of being round. The public prayers where the stalls and pit would be and His Majesty, with his suite and the Cabinet Ministers, occupies the place where the dress circle would be situated. The first half of the Khutba was read by one man and the second half by another man in green cloak and turban. They had beautiful voices and recited with perfect Kir'at, a chorus of Qaris repeating "Ameen" and other suitable responses during the Khutba.

It was really a most artistic and musical Khutba one has ever heard.

The Namaz was very short, only انا اعطى الله being read in the two rak'ats. After Namaz His Majesty departed and we drove in our carriages to the tomb of Hazrat Ayyoub Ansari.

A long drive through some of the oldest parts of Stamboul brought us to the shrine of the Saint. Here we read nafl and fatiha and after seeing a copy of Quran written by Sultan Muhammad the Conqueror we started on our way back. We drove through a different route and passed the old Byzantine fort with its moat and drawbridge before we reached the mosque and tomb of Sultan Muhammad Fath. There is also a Madrasa and a library attached to the mosque. The tomb of this great Monarch is comparatively simple, but we noted that the tomb itself is very long, and on inquiry we were told that he was a very tall man. As it was getting very chilly we gave up the idea of visiting Sultan Abdul Aziz, and arrived home frozen to a jelly.

The carriages are very expensive here owing to the horses having been acquired by the War Office. The cost of our drive came to £2.8 and was paid by the Pasha in spite of our repeated protests against it.

Jan. 4.

The Manager and Ghulam Ahmed Khan went with an agent from the Croissant Rouge to the Customs House and took delivery of 252 packages which had arrived from London and stored them in the اتارمهلال This took them all the day and a great deal of very hard work and supervision as the people here are not very prompt in their methods.

In the evening we heard that peace negotiations were broken off and war would be resumed. We were greatly excited at the news as we felt that at last we were going to have some chance of doing good work. Mehmet Ali Bey came and dined with us that evening and appreciated Masoor's singing very much.

Madame la Barone gave the best compliment that could be given to the members of the Mission for their excellent behaviour. She said they were all very cultured young men (beyond slaves). This naturally made me feel very happy and proud of the members of my Mission.

Jan. 5.

We paid a visit to the hospital which His Majesty the Sultan has prepared out of his own private purse for 300 soldiers. Col. Hkiri Bey, the chief physician to His Majesty, received us and showed us every thing in the hospital. He is a very pleasant and courteous gentleman and volunteered to arrange for us a private presentation to His Majesty. Here we met some Armenian ladies who had been nursing in the hospital and now that the work at the hospital was coming to an end they volunteered themselves to go out to Sanjaktapa with our hospital. As they spoke English fluently and Turkish was their mother-tongue they would have proved very helpful to us had we been in a position to utilize their services.

In the evening I prepared a list with the help of Dr. Sohami Bey of all the articles necessary for the kitchen together with provisions and stores. A few other things which had not been included in the list sent out to London were also included such as Radiator for heating the wards lamps, slippers, dressing-gowns, boilers for hot water, etc.

I have kept a copy of this list given to the Croissant Rouge. I took this list to the Central Office and explained every thing in detail to Bassim Omer Pasha. I had a long talk with him about the water supply to the hospital and the arrangements I had made for clarification, by means of Ishigibagi as used by the Japanese or by the Alum process, the boiling and filtration of the water. He went into ecstasies over the perfect arrangement and said how many lives would have been saved had our Mission arrived here at the time of war. He paid great compliment to the organisers of the Mission who must have spent a great deal of time and care in going into every minute detail. He thought ours was the most complete and the best-equipped hospital that has been sent to Turkey.

I also arranged with him to go to Sanjaktapa to inspect the site where our hospital was to be pitched and have every thing ready against any possible delay.

Jan. 6.

I went to Thomas Cook's office and found a draft for 8,000 piastres had been sent to our credit from Bombay. This greatly relieved me as we have been having to pay expenses which we had not calculated.

Jan. 7.

I paid another visit to the Central Office of the Croissant Rouge and discussed a few details of the list with the Pasha.

In the afternoon Dr. Edeni Bey took me to meet a Turkish lady whose name I have forgotten, but will write to you later. She is a very cultured and very well educated lady, has studied French, German and English and can speak English most fluently. She was the first Ottoman subject with whom I had long and most interesting conversation about all the present affairs in Turkey. I shall have to give this interview to you in detail in my next letter as time is pressing and the letters must be posted at once. She promised to become a regular contributor to the Comrade and give weekly report of all the Turkish news. I have promised her a copy of the Comrade and also to put her directly in communication with you which I will do very soon. She belongs to the Young Turk party, is intensely interesting and very earnest.

There is a rumour about the commencement of hostilities at once which I hope would turn out to be true as I am sure the resumption of war would be of advantage to the Turks. I had a long interview with Bassim Omer Pasha in which it was fully discussed and decided that arrangements for the rations of the members of the Mission should be made with the War Office and that a monthly bill for the same would be paid by us. I also made it clear that the Mission would pay for all the expenses incurred for its maintenance in Constantinople and all the articles ordered for use in the hospital.

Invoice was received from Mawson & Sons of London with a covering letter from Mr. Amir Ali. It gave details of all the packages sent in the first batch numbering 252. Another bill of lading was also received for 19 packages.

Dr. Abdul Pahman, M. B., Ch. B. (Edin.), and Mr. Mirza Raza Khan who has passed in all his final subjects for M. B., Ch. B. (Edin.), except Medicines, arrived here yesterday. This makes our number 24. Their uniforms fitted them as if they were made to measure. They were also provided with waterproof coats and boots.

I have decided to employ the services of four interpreters one for each ward as without them it would be impossible to get on with the work.

I have not received any letter from you nor the copy of our beloved Comrade. Please ask the Manager not only to send me my own copy but a few spare ones. Do not forget to send even if it is a line, as a letter from the father of the Mission would be very cheering and reassuring to his children in Turkey.

MURRAY.

TETE À TETE

WHILE the fall of Kiamal Pasha has caused genuine relief to all real friends and well-wishers of Turkey, his exit was attended by a peculiarly tragic episode. The welcome change of Ministry has cost the Ottoman Empire one of its finest soldier-patriots. As the brief drama was proceeding at the Sublime Porte of which the chief actor was that popular and determined hero, Enver Bey, Nazim Pasha was struck down by a stray bullet from the crowd that had gathered outside in a frenzy of passion. It is some consolation to learn that the crime was in no way deliberate and premeditated. The Committee of Union and Progress, while differing in some respects from the political views of Nazim Pasha, entertained sincerest respect and admiration for his great talents, upright character and genial personality. He was a stout liberal of the school of Midhat and had consequently passed several years of his life in exile under the régime of Abdul Hamid. The revolution of 1908 restored him to freedom and he was soon after appointed governor-general of Bagdad. His administration in that Viceroyalty was in the highest degree successful. He enforced respect for the law, pacified the Arab tribes, curbed the lawlessness of the turbulent Kurds on the Turko-Persian frontier, established peace and order throughout the province and initiated useful administrative measures for the happiness and well-being of the people. After a short time he resigned his post and returned to Constantinople. Party differences and tension were at that time very acute in the capital. Nazim Pasha was one of the few men of weight and influence who were opposed to some aspects of the policy of the Committee of Union and Progress, and he soon became the rallying centre of the officers and politicians who were dissatisfied with the Unionist Government and who shortly after organised themselves into the Military League that played a prominent part in the crisis which led to the resignation of Said Pasha's Ministry. Nazim Pasha was entrusted with the Portfolio of War in the cabinet of Ghazi Ahmed Mukhtar Pasha. Before many months were over the events in the Balkans led to the outbreak of the War. Nazim Pasha was appointed to the supreme command of the Turkish Army in this fateful struggle. He was gifted with every quality for generalship, he was popular in the Army, he fought with courage and tenacity, he was moved with noble devotion to his cause. Fate, however, had reserved for him the anguish and bitterness of a luckless and defeated general. The causes of his failure were diverse and as far as he was concerned they were irremediable. It is infinitely to his credit that, immediately after the disasters at Lake Doiras and Tchataldja, when the shattered hosts poured back in utter confusion into the Tchataldja lines with the Bulgarians in pursuit, he stayed the retreat, sorted the confused mass into order, infused new spirit into the men, offered splendid resistance to the Bulgarian onslaught and even inflicted heavy losses on the enemy. After the Armistice he had been striving hard to repair the defects in the military organisation and defence. As the Peace negotiations proceeded in London and the attitude of the Kiamal Government showed signs of irresolution, it was rumoured that Nazim Pasha had openly expressed his alarm and had even consulted several leaders of the Committee with a view to establishing a strong Government fully in accord with the public opinion of the country. His views about the military situation, which were expressed at the meeting of the so-called national assembly, must have surprised many, but so one on that account can have the least doubt about the honesty, courage and patriotism of Nazim Pasha. His end has been tragic and his loss will be deeply mourned by his nation as well as his Moslem brethren and many other admirers throughout the world. It may be recalled here that the late Nazim Pasha had paid a short visit to Bombay en route from Bombay to Constantinople. The news of his death has created a profound sensation amongst the Bombay Moslems who had the honour of forming his acquaintance. In a recent letter from him to Mr. Karimbhoy Adamjee Peerbhoy Nazim Pasha said:—"I am sure that this Medical Mission with a chief having the ability and experience of Dr. Ansari will be of great use to our Red Crescent Society and that our sick and wounded soldiers will bless the name of their Muhammadan brothers of India." A pathetic interest attaches to the account which Dr. Ansari himself gives in his letter of an interview with Nazim Pasha and which is published elsewhere. A coup d'état has given Turkey the best Government she could have under the circumstances; but a coup d'état invariably costs dear. And none can say that the price has been small in this case.

The Hon. Miran Mohamed Shafi has been elected to preside at the forthcoming session of the All-India Moslem League. We have received several communications doubting the wisdom of this election which, however, we refrain from publishing now. The main objection of our correspondents is based on the character of the political views which the Hon. Mr. Shafi has from time to time expressed during his career as a public man. They regard those views to be obsolete and opposed in spirit to the new policy and the creed of the League recently announced at Lucknow. Our correspondents, however, ignore the educative force of circumstances themselves, which have such a decisive influence on the making of ordinary politicians and public men. It is true that the political outlook of the Hon. Mr. Shafi has in some aspects ceased to be relevant, but we trust he is shrewd enough to perceive that he must keep himself abreast of the new political currents in the country if he is to retain the confidence of his community and his people. We do not know if the Hon. Mr. Shafi has signified his acceptance of the League's offer. If he has, we presume he has done so with the full knowledge of the ideals that the League has set itself to achieve, for his acceptance would involve his tacit approval of the goal to which the political activity of the Mussalmans should be directed. It is needless to say that the Moslem public opinion has enormously grown in strength and solidarity on certain questions affecting the political future of India, and the Moslem leaders who formed their political convictions a generation ago will have to revise their catalogue of "opinion" or leave the task of leadership to others who believe the world is moving ahead and India is not stationary. There was a time when political thinking could be done along with the help of a few conventional formulae. India has had enough of that kind of stuff. What is now wanted are men who have the intellectual strength to think hard and the courage to point the way that leads straight to the goal.

We have the pleasure to state that a sum of Rs. 21,842 has been sent to Lady Lowther, at Constantinople, on behalf of Her Excellency Lady Hardinge's Fund for the relief of the women and children of the Turkish killed and wounded. In addition to those already acknowledged, subscriptions have been received as follows:—

Maharaja Sahib of Butwa Rs. 1,000. Bibi Khodjatulkubra of Gaya, Rs. 170. Sir Aunl. Sten, Rs. 60. Mussalman Officers N. C. O. and Sergeants of 109th Infantry, Secunderabad, Rs. 610-7-1. Women of Mussalman community of Palamoor, Rs. 500. H.H. Mahendra Maharajah Shri of Panna, Rs. 500. Khan Bahadur Moulvi Shukh Usam Ali, Rs. 60. Sardar Bahadur Jar Muhammad, Rs. 25. Sardar Muhammad Sawar Khan, Rs. 25. Sheikh Mohammed Ali Rais, Rs. 12. Khan Sahib Saikh Gulam Muhammad, Rs. 10. Collector of Bareilly, on behalf of Nizam Begum Rs. 100. Mrs. Akazak, Rs. 10. Bano Achom Didi, Rs. 2. Amir in Rs. 2.

Any further subscriptions to this Fund should be sent to Capt. Nicolson, A.D.C., Viceroy's Lodge, Delhi.

As we go to press we have received a long and very interesting communication from Dr. Ansari, for which our readers will have to wait till our next. We may, however, state here briefly that Omerali, a place near the line of defence and an important railway station, was selected for the establishment of the field hospital of the Mission. According to Dr. Ansari the hospital was to be in perfect working order on the 25th January. Dr. Ansari gives a detailed and very interesting account of the Turkish Medical organisation and of the splendid work which the Ottoman Red Crescent is doing and requests his fellow Moslems in India to send help to the Society with perfect confidence that every penny will be most economically and usefully spent. He speaks with admiration of the devoted efforts of the Turks to relieve suffering and distress and exposes the baseless calumnies which have been appearing in the European press as to the utter breakdown of the Turkish medical arrangements and the false stories regarding "thousands of Turks left dying on the battlefield." We publish elsewhere an earlier letter from Dr. Ansari from which some extracts were given in our pictorial Supplement last week.

The All-India Medical Mission.

The Comrade.

The Balkan Situation.

Those who had foreseen the fiasco in which the Peace Conference has resulted in London had quite intelligible and solid reasons for their scepticism. The Peace negotiations conducted under a Vigilance Committee imposed by selfish Europe, would have in any case little prospects of arriving at a successful termination. But the imposition of the Powers was not exercised with equal regard or disregard for the feelings of the belligerents. It was from the start a one-sided, overbearing and unjust inquisition. And the Turk, as usual, was its helpless and devoted victim. Had the Turks and the Allies been left to settle their account themselves, peace would have been ere now in sight. But they were never left alone, as the European diplomacy had declared that no settlement of the European heritage of the Turk would be allowed without the consent of Europe. A conference of the Ambassadors was consequently organised in London to keep in touch with the progress of the Peace negotiations. What it actually did was to exert an occult pressure on the Turks to induce them to accept the terms of the Allies. There was no question of justice or fairplay in this novel proceeding. It simply suited the expediency of the moment and the convenience of some of the great Powers that the Balkan crisis should end and that the Turk, —the familiar scapegoat of European diplomacy—should be forced to pay the ransom for the peace of Europe. The Allies could not be coerced as they could confidently count on the powerful diplomatic backing of Russia and her friends. The question was long since reduced to the simple issue, whether the Turks would bow to the mandate of the European diplomacy without a protest. That question was to a large extent solved when Kiamil Pasha resigned at the bidding of an outraged and indignant people.

When the Allies saw that the grandmotherly advice, which the Powers had offered on their behalf to the Porte, had indirectly led to the establishment of a strong determined and patriotic Government in Turkey, they assumed an offended air and began to talk big and menacing words in the hearing of Europe. They decided to make a formal announcement that the negotiations were at an end. They informally gave it out that the Armistice would be ended on the evening of the 3rd instant and the war would be resumed. All this was a piece of clever bluffing and it was intended to frighten Dame Europa into more coercive methods against the Turks. The Allies had not even awaited the reply of the Porte to the joint Note of the Powers before breaking off the negotiations. Since the reply was delivered they have made the whole world ring with their shrill threats of war and vengeance. The present Turkish Government is not afraid of putting its trust once more in the sword. It will not shrink from any sacrifice that it may have to bear in trying to save national honour. As far, however, as can be judged from the existing circumstances, hostilities will not be resumed till European diplomacy declares itself bankrupt. The Allies are simply playing on the nervousness of Europe, and if the war breaks out again some of the great Powers will be morally responsible.

The Turkish reply to the Note must have come as a great revelation to those who had received the return of the Young Turks to power as little short of a catastrophe. A set of firebrands, we were told, had purposely come to ride the whirlwind in a spirit of sheer bravado to defy Europe. One might well wish they had defied Europe as every unrighteous and organised tyranny should be defied. Europe has no conscience to appeal to. The extreme moderation of the reply would have justly caused grave alarm to all friends of Turkey had they not known that it was not the hand of a Kiamil Pasha that drafted it. The chief bone of contention has been Adrianople. The Turks have agreed to cede a part of the city and no compromise can go further. As regards the Aegean islands, the Turkish Note urges that any diminution of Ottoman authority would transform them into fresh foci of agitation which might spread to the neighbouring coasts and result in a situation similar to that in Macedonia constantly endangering peace. The Porte, however, expresses confidence that the Powers in determining the status of the islands will have regard to the above-mentioned consideration. The Note concludes with the hope that the Powers will recognise the extent of the sacrifices proposed and will agree that Turkey would be right in rejecting further demands.

While presenting their joint advice to the Porte the Powers had promised to lend powerful aid in the development of Turkey if the advice was accepted. Now that Turkey has made every possible concession consistent with her honour and interests, one may hope that the promises of Europe will materialise. The most pressing need of Turkey is that the irksome restrictions on her fiscal freedom should be removed. She must, as an independent Sovereign State, have the right to establish autonomous customs tariff, to conclude treaties of commerce on modern principles, to suppress foreign post-offices and to abolish capitulations. Will Europe agree to forego these privileges, which were wrung from Turkey in her weak moments, and have ever since proved so many sources of danger to her internal peace, of enormous material loss and of intolerable humiliation? It is difficult to imagine that Europe would be capable of this degree of self-abnegation, and we doubt a weakened Turkey can lead Europe into the paths of righteousness.

But the most pressing question at this juncture is whether the conciliatory tone of the Turkish Note will induce the Powers to exercise the necessary pressure on the Allies. It is well understood in diplomatic quarters that the latter, in spite of their bellicose attitude, have no desire and little resources to renew the fight. Their demands have been so uncompromising and extravagant because they have all along been sure of the diplomatic support of Europe. This support has been freely lent on the pretence that Turkey had nothing to gain by a renewal of the fighting and that any such eventuality would greatly endanger the European peace. Every device known to diplomacy has been shamelessly applied to undermine the resolution of the Turk. He has been threatened with invasion by Russia. Schemes of partition about his Asiatic possessions have been loudly discussed to overawe him. All financial assistance has been refused him. And now that he has been forced, by these tactics, to make the heaviest sacrifices, and part with almost every thing he possessed in Europe, the Powers decide to stand aloof and do nothing if the Allies choose to resume the war! If European peace was the fetish so devoutly worshipped by diplomacy, is it not just, right and reasonable that the Allies should be restrained from further aggression and forced, like Turkey, to abate their exorbitant demands? Does not Europe feel its moral responsibility in the matter? Was Turkey's just claim to safeguard her vital interests a danger to the peace of Europe, and does not a similar danger exist in the aggressive and boastful attitude of the Allies? It is not out of consideration for Turkey's plight, supposed to be miserable, or in sheer terror of the threats of the Allies that we put these questions. Even to a casual observer of the situation and of the diplomatic currents and cross-currents that pay upon it, the striking disparity in the treatment of the two cases would be apparent. The Balkan war has been full of important lessons for the world. The most important lesson has been that the modern diplomacy can resort to practices which every child in the schools and every baby in the nurseries of the world are taught to shun and despise. When an angry protest went up from the Mussalmans of India against the coercion of Turkey by the great Powers including England, some of our contemporaries were led to indulge in amusing sophistries. The Mussalmans were told that no coercion was being exercised, that the Powers had simply addressed "friendly advice" to the Porte which was meant exclusively for its benefit, and that they should not detract from the weight and value of their pronouncements by passing "hysterical resolutions." We would like to know what our contemporaries have got to say just now. Will they recommend the presentation of a similar "friendly advice" to the Allies? Or will they suddenly discover the formal obligations of the Powers and begin to discourse on the virtues of neutrality?

It is extremely difficult to say what the course of events may be within the next few days, as the situation is both complex and critical. The war may appear to be imminent, but it is not inevitable and we will not be surprised if it is entirely averted. In any case Turkey should be prepared for eventualities and should stand firm and resolute. She has already made concessions that come perilously near a complete surrender. She can not submit to further demands without stultifying herself and incurring "the reprobation of Moslem opinion throughout the world." The dangers that threaten her are great. But no danger can be greater than the terrible shock that is bound to result to her national self-respect if the Allies' demands are granted in full. Thrace is virtually a Moslem province, and the fate of the hapless Macedonian Moslems should be a clear warning to the Turkish Government as to what would happen if the Moslems of Thrace, too, fall into the hands of the "Liberators" of the Christian races in European Turkey. If the Turks can not keep this Moslem province with the sword, let them, at any rate, redeem their great obligation with the blood of martyrdom.

Lord Hardinge's Message.

This first meeting of the new Imperial Legislative Council in Delhi will remain a notable event in recent Indian history. The occasion would have been significant enough in itself as it marked the inauguration of the legislative work of the Government of India in the new capital of the Empire. The first public appearance of Lord

Hardinge after the outrage that had so nearly cost him his life, invested it with special import and a peculiarly solemn character. The representatives of the people as well as of the Government had gathered in the Council Chamber under the shadow of an atrocious crime, consoled and relieved, however, by the thought that they would have the privilege of welcoming back in their midst the man whom a merciful Providence had preserved from the hand of the assassin to guide the destinies of India. The feeling was equally shared by the people at large in a spirit of thankful expectancy. The applause that greeted the Viceroy from the crowded galleries of the Council Hall as well as from his colleagues, as he walked slowly in bearing the marks of his bodily sufferings, was as much an expression of genuine admiration for the courage and fortitude with which he had gone through the terrible ordeal as that of gratitude and joy at his miraculous escape from death. The whole atmosphere of the place was for the while tense with emotion. And in those short, electric moments one felt as if many a moral wound had been healed.

The opening speech of Lord Hardinge was worthy alike of the man and the occasion. The strain of the effort was only too visible, but it was courageously borne and every word of the remarkable utterance fell clear and distinct on the hushed and crowded house. The Viceroy cordially welcomed the newly-elected and newly-appointed members of his Council and expressed regret for those who had not returned. Referring to the outrage he said:—

I feel deeply grateful to you all for the warmth of your reception here to-day. I always knew that I could count on your sympathy in the suffering that has been my lot during the past few weeks, and if there has been one thing that had tended to alleviate those sufferings it has been the knowledge of the sympathy shown towards me by all classes, creeds, and communities throughout the length and breadth of India.

The whole speech was instinct with sorrow at what had happened and with abiding sympathy for the people of India. There were some very important passages in the speech embodying the genuine reflections of the Viceroy about the character of anarchical crimes in this country and their possible remedy, which we are sure will be carefully studied, marked and inwardly digested by the Indian people. Speaking of the Indian terrorists, Lord Hardinge truly remarked that it is difficult to believe that they as individuals are a class apart and that they do not belong to communities and mix with their fellow-beings. "Are they really susceptible to no influence and no advice?" he asked, "have they no contact with moderate and wiser men?" These are questions that must have occurred to all who have pondered over the growth of terrorism in this country. And yet they do not admit of an easy answer. Anarchism, paradoxical though it may seem, is not an individual freak, but an organised revolt against society or a State with a definite purpose and a method. It takes its birth in a peculiar set of political and social forces. Anarchical ideas may germinate in individual minds without any mutual relation, but they can not find practical expression unless the minds draw together to think, to plan, to organise and to act in concert. Lord Hardinge was, therefore, quite right in holding that anarchical crimes "can not be dismissed as the isolated acts of irresponsible fanatics and that they are in most cases the outcome of organised conspiracies in which the actual agent of the crime is not always the most responsible." The anarchist no doubt belongs to communities and mixes with his fellow-beings. It is, however, difficult to estimate the degree to which he is susceptible to influence and advice without knowing the class of persons from which he springs and the political and social conditions that give him birth.

We know the soil where anarchism has mostly flourished in India and we may to a large extent gauge the character of the forces that have favoured and helped its growth. It is needless for us to set about to study in detail the conditions as well as the type. The supreme question is how best they can be eradicated. As the Viceroy remarked, the atmosphere that breeds the political murderer is more easily created than dispelled. According to him, "it can only be entirely and for ever dispelled by the display and enforcement of public opinion in a determination not to tolerate the perpetration of such crimes and to treat as enemies of society not only those who commit crimes, but also those who offer any incentives to crime. Amongst such incentives to crime should be included every intemperance of political language and methods likely to influence ill-balanced minds and lead them by insidious stages to hideous crimes." This is an eminently wise counsel and we are sure it will be taken to heart by those who are jealous of the honour of India and deplore the slur of anarchism that rests on her fair fame. But will it not, at the same time, be a wise course and a much more effective method to search for the real causes that produce the political murderer and try to tear them up by the roots. Healthy, temperate and strong public opinion is a good deterrent to political and social crimes, and it is one of the admitted needs of the Indian situation to create and foster such opinion. What is, however, more needed is to adopt preventive measures that would cleanse the atmosphere of evil and render the existence of the political desperado impossible. This might well appear to be a counsel of perfection, especially in view of the peculiar political conditions that obtain in this country. The existence of anarchism even in homogeneous and organically developed States is not a rare phenomenon. The only thing that might make its appearance strange and surprising in India would be the hoary political instincts and traditions of the East. Tradition and instinct alike have, however, been losing their force ever since the modern political influences and ideas began to flood the land. The governance of India by England has been, on the whole, a mission of beneficence. It would be an unutterable calamity if it were to end abruptly before its great task is finished. But it has been the inevitable result of the peculiar bond that unites India with England and of the welter of new ideas that the great process of intellectual and moral revolution has created social and political distemper and a certain amount of violence in thought and feeling. The responsibility of the Indian people is great, and no Indian patriot can feel confident of the future if the enormous task of political reconstruction is constantly imperilled by a set of destructive and desperate revolutionaries. The body-politics, it must be readily admitted, has been infected with a malignant and dangerous malady, though its vital organs are yet sound. Has anarchism come to stay in this country? Is it possible to stamp it wholly out of existence? We wish it were easy to find a definite and satisfactory answer to this question.

The only things about which one can be certain are that terroristic developments are an undoubted evil, that they are the extreme outward expressions of impatient idealism working on weak and ill-balanced minds, that they strangely persist when once they appear in a social organism, and that they as often as not elude the influence of healthy public opinion. The Viceroy's exhortation to the people of India to try to make the existence of the terrorists impossible will evoke a ready and whole-hearted response. But the people's efforts will not be as effective as they should be when "public opinion" is as yet a mere journalistic expression in this country. The universal outburst of indignation and sympathy after the outrage could not be more genuine, whole-hearted and sincere. It was the public opinion of a people who had been united on the moral plane, through the great shock of a horrible crime, by the elemental instincts of humanity, creed and race. But the sort of public opinion that expresses common aims and purpose and is sure of ways and means is scarcely articulate in India. The people are face to face with shifting horizons in politics, arts, science and religion, neither sure of the goal, nor of the path, still busy revising their catalogue of first principles. The terrorist lives, moves and has his being in society and he must needs come into contact with men who abhor his doctrines and his methods. But it is manifest that he does not feel the silent moral rebuke and censure in the presence of these men, who, though they feel a mortal horror of anarchism, lack the self-assurance that comes from a strength of conviction and only imperfectly realise that they are individually responsible for the safety of society and the State. It is not their fault that they are State-blind. The fault lies partly with their history and partly with the conditions that govern the period of their transition from a nebulous stage of political existence to what, for want of a better name, may be called democracy.

Under the circumstances we can only fall back on certain admissions. The people of India detest anarchical tendencies of every kind and yet their efforts to stamp them out might not be as successful as could be wished. Terrorism in India, in view of the peculiar social, political and intellectual conditions will die hard. The British government of India has got to be carried on in spite of the existence of terrorism. It has a twofold task before it. It should suppress all anarchical manifestations as well as patiently strive to remove the causes that feed the ghastly underworld of political crime. For the latter consummation it is absolutely essential that the ideals of the State and the people should, as far as possible, be identical. Every patriotic Indian will recognise with gratitude that considerable efforts have been made in the direction of broad-based Indian Government on the will and affections of the people. Political crime should be repressed with unsparing thoroughness. It is, however, much more important that the rulers of India should steadfastly hold to their course and look straight on. In Lord Hardinge we have the best guarantee that our rulers have the fullest sense of the magnitude of their task and of the demands that it will increasingly make on their wisdom, courage and generosity. No one can clearly read the future and all that it has in store for India. One can only hope for the best. This hope is strengthened into confidence when one sees India's best sons moved to great devotion and sacrifice for her sake and her rulers keeping a cool, collected mind, unworped by bitterness, amidst violent political shocks. Terrorism can have no terrors for the well-wishers of this country when they remember these noble words of Lord Hardinge:—

Still, whatever I may feel on the subject of the crime itself, I only wish to assure you and the whole of India that this incident will in no sense influence my attitude. I will pursue without faltering the same policy in the future as during the past two years, and I will not waver a hair's breadth from that course.

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUP.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It.

"Jhujoo-Jhoo! Jhujoo-Jhoo!" The Rajah's new palace is growing up and the old palace is tumbling down. Old woman, take off all your pots and pans, Ara-ra-ra-dhoo!" This the time-honoured formula of Indian nurseries when chubby babies creeping into mammy's bed were lifted up tenderly on maternal legs and equally tenderly brought down to the soft bed with just a tiny shock to create baby's little sensation and make life eventful in Babyland. Those were ancient days of despotism; but things have changed now, and King Demos rules in our political nurseries. There are no Rajahs now whose palaces may be destroyed and rebuilt in the dreadful fashion of despotism. It is now democracy that brings down one house of cards and rears up another in the shape of its Council Chambers. So a grandmotherly Government after a period of three years when things begin to grow slow and stale creates a little sensation in democratic India's Babyland, and while preserving the ancient spirit changes the letter of the old formula and proclaims "Jhujoo-Jhoo! Jhujoo-Jhoo!" Democracy's old Council is tumbling down and its new Council is growing up. Old woman—Collector or Deputy Commissioner (as the case may be)—take off your pots and pans, Ara-ra-ra-dhoo!" After three years of playing at legislation with just sufficient seriousness to prevent satiety, the first reformed Council disappears from the scene and the second one comes into being.

To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow
Comes at a devilish pace from day to day
To the last syllable of the Council's time,
And all our yesterday's light Honours
The way to dust-bins and munio'pal carts,
Dim reeky lamps and roads Sahara-like
Of India's Local Swaraj—(tasteless food
For those who feasted on the kingly viands
Of Sandow's Press-Dag and Seditious laws,
Mild Hindu's soldiers three and million schools,
And Bhupen's luckless matrimonial venture
Out, out brief candles! Moths of politics
Don't gather round the lights of other days.
Even the substance of a burly Rajah
To-day is but a shadow, vain and empty.
He who till yesterday so loftily
Upheld an unborn Nation's dignity,
To-day lies levelled with kutuberry dust.
Last night of light a pillar, in the morn
A pillar still he is, but now, alas!
Of smoke and cloud The Orient's second tower,
That in his lavish stress and emphasis
Made up for Babel's great variety,
Is now his unborn Nation's Tower of Silence.

Disdaining competition with the Kutub,
Longfellow keeps Cross-Bencher company.
Ungrateful land of Magadh! was it meet
To push Cross-Bencher also off his stool
In this the first flush of thy victory?
Compelled by thee, ungrateful Motherland!
He sought a kingdom in the Pandits' realm,
And sitting two Provincial stools between Cross-Bencher found at last on mother earth
The safest seat. Let none dispute his claim.
Council succeedeth Council. Each poor player
Thus struts his hour upon the stage, and then
Is heard no more. But still the play goes on.
Succeeding players will soon repeat the tale
Told by their predecessors, full of sound
And patriot fury, signifying nothing.

With the new Council also comes a new Council Chamber. Of course, this is only a make-shift, for the new capital of India has yet to be built, and with the guttapurcha qualities of Indian Finance four million sterling will stretch as usual into fourteen in order to provide India its St. Stephen's and India's Governor-General just a little house attached thereto. This is only the kuchcha Capital, and a paltry 49½ lakhs could do no more than rear up Aladin's new magic palace, where Government will work for half a year and Councils would meet on a dozen occasions. The temporary St. Stephen's of India is shaped like a horse-shoe, that is to say, if the horse has a somewhat unique foot. The dull, unvarnished teak panelling and furniture are artistically relieved by the olive green of the carpets and the hangings. On one side is the Presidential Throne with its high back and canopy overhead, surmounted by a crown, all of unvarnished teak. On both sides of this Throne are three rows of seats meeting at the other end of the hall in a semi-circle, and in the arrangement of this Government, imitating the Creator, says to the Hon. Members, "we have created you in pairs." For each seat accommodates two members who are provided with a small desk that also serves the purpose of a little shelf for keeping papers and office boxes. It provides for the Railway Sleeper sufficient accommodation as accommodation on sleeping berths goes in railway carriages under his management, even if it fails to provide the Advocate-General sufficient room for stretching his go-ahead legs. H. E. has a door at the back of the Throne all to himself, and Hon. Members come in from side doors opening into the back verandah of the building. The prophecy of the Calcutta journals is, however, fulfilled in one particular. In one thing at least the Press will be a stranger in Delhi, for the same two back doors admit the Press and the Strangers to the Gallery above. But if the Cassandra of Calcutta are justified in one respect the optimists of the 12th December can still snap their fingers at the prophets of evil. Autonomy is clearly in sight, and even if it be not so, Government have seen to it that a colorable imitation of autonomy should be provided for the Councils. The benches of the Indian St. Stephens are green!

Up among the gods and goddesses the Hon. Mr. Gup, who alone never loses his seat, scanning with eagerness new faces and figures in the new Council, while recognising some of the old familiar Bombay's Mild Hindu is cross-questioning the Bureaucracy in Bengal and making them very cross, and has reserved his allegiance for the next confession day. But there were three new faces from India's Sunset Land, Fazoolbhai, amiable and generous as ever in the place of Bombay Duck, cool and plausible and modish, Wa-Rahmatullah, keen in counsel and temperate in debate, in the place of that massive champion of Bombay's Commerce and Industries, Vital Thackeray. The "Reign of Law" has come to India in a form that Dicey did not contemplate, for Vakil Raj has been making encroachment even among the Sardars of Gujarat and a Vakil has succeeded in being returned to the Council even if only in name.

Madras Landowners had sent to the last Council the Rajah of vairi-vairi difficult name. But even he did not run like the present representative of Madras into two volumes. The representative of the Madras Council who supplants Pantalloon has not like his confrere half a dozen names, and is satisfied with only a couple, one of which is the familiar Chakravarti. But the other makes up for the simplicity of the first and its want of variety, the nearest intelligible approach to it being Madras-Chutney-pickle-achai. The Dapper Nawab once more comes back, but the Mussalman Member from little Banganapalle has followed in the footsteps of his predecessor of Aroot who never turned them towards the Council.

From the Punjab Council a new representative comes once more, for the meteoric course of the Khan Bahadur is over. In his place comes a true Singh of the Punjab like Kuar Sahib, who comes back once more, and is one of the two stoniest pillars of Punjab loyalty. The fertile land of Five Rivers is represented no more by the Free Lance of the Tiwanas, but has a Rajah to take his place. But what could any Council be without its Free Lance? Had Government excluded him from among the legislators of India hundreds of nations and millions of people would have had to mourn the loss of that mountain-head of the gaiety of the nations. These no longer the days of the despotic Deputy Commissioner, who, like Parliament, could make everything except making a woman a man, although, unlike the British Parliament, they made many an honest and bold man a hesitating and irresolute woman. These are the days of the Supreme Government, and its supreme resourcefulness is marvellous. When inelastic Regulations forced upon Government the necessity of nominating a Hindu to represent the landlords of the Punjab, alternating with a Mussalman in the last Council, was the Supreme Government dismayed? Not a bit! It promptly became a Missionary and as the political evangelist of India converted the landlord of yesterday into the True Believer of to-day! So the Council once more had its Tiwana Free Lance, dispossessed no doubt of his laud but saddled by the Supreme Government with the faith of Islam.

Process of swearing is generally tedious and dull, but nothing like an oath to judge the temper and character of a man. Bob Acres was a man of many moods and his oaths accorded with his moods, so that as a "Fighting Bob" he swore by nothing else but hilts and triggers. The Council composed of men of different tempers, and the best temperaments is the manner of a man's swearing in. When it came to the turn of Free Lance, the Council and the gods and goddesses above were dazzled by the glare of the Field of Cloth of Gold in which the hero of the Tiwans had decked himself. As he dashing marched to the table of St. Vincent in the centre, the medals of war and peace and such like charms, jingling like merry silver bells, announced his martial approach. The ordinary humdrum formula became in the mouth of the Moslem Herald a living thing, lyric in the expression of inmost feeling, dramatic and even melo-dramatic in the manner in which he thundered it out, and truly epic in the grandeur which he imported into it. All was accent, stress and emphasis, but, in spite of the high key in which the whole oath of allegiance was pitched, the Moslem Herald could yet play on the whole gamut of emphatic expression. While others prided themselves on having been elected by the suffrage of their peers, Free Lance laid stress in the very first instance on the word "nominated." His "faithful" was italicized; his "true allegiance" was underlined, and his "Fakhtfully" was in bold type and marked with a thousand N. B.'s, and a million marking flats so beloved of the advertiser. Having delivered himself of this tremendous oath, the Free Lance was dashing back to his seat, when St. Vincent held up his hand and barred the way. His further progress thus arrested, the Free Lance turned back and found he had still to undergo an ordeal far more exacting than the ordeal by fire which could win him the Victoria Cross. His colour changed to the Khaki of his regimental kit on field days. All the five rivers of the Punjab rolled down his cheeks in streams of perspiration, and with a heart beating like a kettle-drum the gallant Tiwana bowed low before the blast of fate which was bent on humbling him. The hand that was used to the firm grasp of the sword hilt and the lance, and the fingers that cunningly used to touch the trigger of the rifle or the revolver, as a lady's run over the keys of the piano, clumsily and tremblingly, took up the grey goose quill and dipped it in the ink-well with the same circumspection which a less gallant man than the Free Lance would have shown in descending into the lion's den. But with heroic endeavour he rallied to his side the courage that had deserted him, and with one supreme effort he dashed the pen across the red Morocco bound register of Council Members as if 'twere a horse galloping under the grip of the wiry limbs of a Tiwana in a glorious charge hurled at the enemy. Thus was it that the Free Lance succeeded in the great ordeal of the pen and proved himself not wholly unworthy even of the Beneit of the Clergy. What matters it that St. Vincent's eyes have grown dim and he is unable to decipher the name inscribed in the register even with the help of Egyptologist versed in hieroglyphics. When Alexander the Great set out for the conquest of the world, he drew his great sword and conquered the lands he coveted and left the lazy sons of peace to settle the justice of it. Free Lance, who has now made his mark on the chronicles of the Council, leaves it to the lazy sons of learning to dispute its legitimacy.

Sir ROSE KIPPEL, much annoyed at discovery that the same world which was adorned by him gave asylum to lesser beings like Notsi-Mardan, newspaper editors, Members of Council and M. P.'s. As a concession from the ideal to the stern and unpleasant realities of life, commanded Government of India to include among nominated officials his representative, and sent to Delhi Force-Majeure Don't-Brook-Blaze-away, C I E., who took the oath of allegiance in a very superior and nonchalant manner.

In England Field Marshall Sylvia Pankhurst has ordered the resumption of hostilities after the Franchise Bill fiasco, and Cabinet Members who live in glass houses will now have a rare time of it. But we in India are far ahead. If the people of Ajodhya returned Sri Rampi, our Government, with an unflinching affection not so much for the world as for his wife, promptly nominated Sri Sitaji. Dressed in drab from top to toe Sitaji also took the oath of allegiance and that too before Sri Rampi, and so superior and ungentle is the sex to-day that all such extras as bows to the Chair were dispensed with. As if this e-man-cipation was not enough, Government greatly concerned at the desertion of dear Madge, who, failing to get a regiment for the Domiciled Community, at last secured a Commission for himself. But so used had Government become to the company of Madge and so disconsolate was it without his sex's soft ways and gentle seductive manner, that it looked about for the other consolation and procured through Sir Charles Bayley the nearest approach to dear Madge in darling Maud.

But thus not the only link between the old Council and the new. Some in this world are wise, some otherwise. The last Council had a Hooda and this has an other Hooda. The sun and the moon never shine together, so when Shams-ul-Hooda set in a Council seat in the East, Qamr-ul-Hooda rose in the West. So Hooda succeeds Hooda. The second one walked slowly and deliberately to the table of St. Vincent and whispered his oath of allegiance into the privacy of his waist-coat. After him came one whose name and titles were familiar to St. Vincent and came trippingly on the tongue. Only one mistake. The Hon Member now spells his name as Shikari, though intimate friends not unoften still use the Ticegarri

Then followed Mand, Mir Jafar, the Raja and Khushhal who, although only the shadow of a Rajput to look at, showed even in his name that the landlord of Kotla was a man of substance. Sri Ramji who had had a walk in into the Council, thanks to his popularity not only with his own community but also with Europeans and officers of Government, felt a little doubtful whether he was a nominated or an elected Member and while, being sworn in corrected himself just in time as he was betraying that he was a nominated Member. He was followed by the white-robed angel of Prag who took the oath of allegiance and rushed on, but remembering somewhat late that he had left one of his bows behind him, stopped half way, returned to the place where he had forgotten it, picked it up and sent it per Special Messenger to Sir Guy in the Chair. After him sauntered in Saunders, rubicund and self-satisfied like a thirty-five hundred rupee Commissioner, and then Slippery Eel from Burmah where they have evidently an unco guid conceit of themselves. As if Never-Shut-up-Gates had not made this clear enough, they have sent us Eel who thinks he is "lovely," and has not a bit of scruple in calling himself so. Assam is not so particular about an elegant nomenclature and is quite happy with her Barua to push forward her superior claims.

Chetry Chitnis, clayen of non-official members, returned once more from the Orange Free State, otherwise known as Little-Maryland or the Central Provinces. But Mud Holkar has been made to abdicate and his only consolation in his enforced retirement must be that if he is no longer there to speak for his Province, Dashing Boy is there no more to speak against it. Well may the latter say to-day, "Had I served my constituents half so well" etc. etc. In his place comes the Second Pandit, and speculation is busy discussing if his name would belie him.

At this stage St. Vincent sought the ear of Sir Guy, and the Vice-President announcing that H. E. was about to arrive, thoughtfully smoothed the seat and the cushion for one whom the Council had hitherto sorely missed. After a few minutes' interregnum, borne with feelings just the reverse of those which prevailed during the interval of H. E.'s leaving the Elephant of State and Sir Guy's riding on at the head of the procession, St. Vincent walked in from behind the throne and then the A. D. C. announced H. E. Pulled down a great deal, but, the House noticed with thankfulness, not pale or otherwise altered,—except for the right arm still carried in a sling—H. E. stood in front of the Throne and received the well-merited applause of that assembly. At first the cheers came with conventional propriety; then some one less used to curb human emotions than others cheered a little more lustily and was followed by some one with a faint and hesitating "hurrah," and then a good ringing cheer that defied convention, reverberated in the Council Hall and was echoed back from the Gallery where, bound by rules and regulations, Strangers and Press representatives had hitherto been in the habit of sitting mutely.

A few more officials to take their oath, and then in a speech delivered in a voice ideal for the President of such an assembly, clear and well modulated at all times, but now deeply touched by irrepressible emotion, H. E. surpassed himself to-day in saying the right thing at the right moment and in the right manner. Another of the historic change which brought back to historic Delhi her ancient heritage, H. E. naturally felt a keen desire to open the first session of his Council in Delhi in his own person. But more than personal desire was the sense of duty which even in the hour of his sore trial had prompted him to proclaim that the King's Government must go on. Both personal desire and public duty had combined to make the Durbar possible, and once more both combined to bring H. E. to the Council Chamber to open the first session of the Council in Delhi. Regret at the disappearance of some of the old familiar faces from his Council, delight at the sight of yet a few left, and cordial welcome of the newcomers were all expressed, in H. E.'s best manner. But it was something more than the manner of one trained in a school of life where manner maketh man, when H. E. referred to his feelings at and after the inexpressibly sad occasion when the vile assassin all but put an end to a career of no less benevolence than brilliance. Profound gratitude to Almighty God for His merciful protection, and real grief for the humble victim of the conspirators' plot were feelings that would naturally arise at such a time. But H. E. had also felt sorrow at the thought of the injury to the sentiments of the whole people of India who would, he knew, regard with horror and detestation the perpetration of a crime contrary to their own precepts and instincts of humanity and of loyalty as well as to their religious principles. Against the vile conspirators themselves he bore no feelings other than a disappointment that it was possible such misguided men as those who had committed such a useless crime could now be found in India. In his desire for kindly intercourse with the people and ready accessibility he had discouraged excessive precautions. He had trusted himself and Lady Hardinge more to the care of the people than to that of the police and if it was an error, it was an error that he was proud of and long may he live to be proud of such generous "errors."

With these kindly sentiments H. E. gave expression to some sage advice appealing in an irrefragable manner to the moderate and wise men to use their influence and advice; for it was difficult to believe that these conspirators were a class apart and belonged to no communities nor mixed with their fellow-beings. The fame of India could only be restored to a high and accessible plane not by disavowing such crimes as the isolated acts of irresponsible fanatics, but by regarding them as the outcome of organized conspiracies, and by the display and enforcement of public opinion in a determination not to tolerate the perpetration of such crimes and to treat as enemies of society not only those who commit crimes but also those who offer any incentives to crime. But whatever he may feel on the subject of the crime itself, H. E. assured the Council and the whole of India that that incident would in no sense influence his attitude. He would pursue without faltering the same policy in the future as during the past two years and would not waver a hair's breadth from that course. Well may H. E.'s coat of arms bear the motto: Mens aequa in arduis. Well may the terrorist be terrorised in his turn by the inevitableness of a rule which would continue, despite such crimes, as if nothing had happened, and by the serenity and unwavering kindness of a nature which even well concerted plots of evil-doers would no more embitter against innocent millions than the isolated acts of fanatics living in an underworld of warped sensibilities and abnormally criminal minds.

Chitnis then rose to express the feelings of the Non-Official Members and Headstrong the separation of the Europeans and their belief in the virtues of firm government. After them H. E. rose again and pointing to the arm in the sling regretted he could not shake them by the hand but wished them to take the will for the deed. As he was leaving, he received applause from the assembly even louder than that which had greeted his entry.

The occasion was unique in its seriousness and the hearts of all were full. But life loves not uniformity, and is intolerant of a monotony of colour. Even the feeling of the audience at the moment was the mixed one of sweet sadness; but little could anyone suspect that the gay would soon be jostling the grave on that occasion. Yet while H. E. was in the Council Chamber and all the avenues to it were carefully guarded by police of all sorts and conditions and of every province, demanding from the most distinguished Strangers of both sexes the production of Admission Tickets,—not to mention the yellow ticket-of-leave which the Press of a wholly different hue had to carry aloft like a torch in outer darkness—there walked in from one of the side entrances reserved for Honourable Members a dignified and sedate individual who calmly took a seat in the Council. Lynx-eyed Sir Charles in the Strangers' Gallery, sitting behind the Under-Secretary of State to see that he did no mischief, failed to recognise in the newcomer the features and figure of any Honourable Member snapshotted for eventualities by the Dark Room Branch of a still darker department. Out of sheer curiosity he went down the steps and across the Members' Lobby into the Council Chamber, not a little fearful of being himself challenged, as a Stranger on the floor of the House by some Member standing up for the sacredness of the legislative penitential. Soon after reaching the newcomer, Sir Charles discovered him a veteran of the Police itself whose rebellious originality had earned him a pension and a doctor's certificate that he belonged to a species of thinkers near allied to men of genius, for whom the Police Commission had not discovered a requisite rank or adequate salary. Although Sir Charles's persuasiveness drew him away from the Council, he was more than a match for the best in his Service in the matter of logical argument. He now rests in a lunatic asylum as the result of distinguished and long-continued service in the Police. But although he is shut out from the world and incarcerated in that abode of Supermen, as one irrationally judged to be devoid of reason, Sir Charles cannot shut out from his own mind the poor ex-policeman's reasoning. "Why object to one when so many others are in that Chamber?"

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Jan. 26.

THE Balkan delegates in London sent lengthy telegrams to their Government last night asking for further instructions in view of the possibility of a long delay in receiving the reply of the Porte and the Powers. The Balkan delegates declare that they would have broken off the negotiations, but they desired to consider the feelings of the Powers.

The Turkish peace mission is still without instructions.

A Constantinople message states that when the demonstrators, headed by Enver Bey, forced their way into the Grand Vizierate they sought to enter the council chamber, but Nazif Bey, aide-de-camp to Kiamil Pasha, fired his revolver at the demonstrators who replied, killing him. Nazim Pasha's aide-de-camp also shot a demonstrator and was himself immediately shot dead. Nazim Pasha, hearing the disturbance, rushed out and called the demonstrators "ill-mannered curs." Almost immediately he was struck by a bullet and killed. An agent of the secret police, an attendant of Sheikh-ul-Islam, was also killed in the mêlée. Leading members of the Committee of the Union and Progress declare that the shooting of Nazim Pasha was unpremeditated, and they regret the death of a man whom they respected. All the ex-Ministers were liberated yesterday, and they returned to their homes.

A Malta telegram states that the cruiser "Yarmouth" has been suddenly ordered to proceed to Suda Bay forthwith.

Two Italian battleships have been ordered to Turkish waters.

The Vienna Fremdenblatt says that without doubt Enver Bey was inspired by lofty patriotism in his recent action with regard to the Cabinet, but that the coup d'état amidst a serious crisis must be reprehended throughout Europe. The paper says that he has exposed his country and people to incalculable dangers as Europe intended to smoothe the path of the sorely tried Turkish Empire. The new turn of affairs is merely a passing episode and an ephemeral success. Europe is unanimously in favour of peace.

London, Jan. 27

Reuter as a result of enquiries in diplomatic quarters learns that the aim of the Powers is to maintain close touch and unity.

It is authoritatively stated that the reports of proposed French activity in Syria are unfounded. France does not in any way intend to intervene in the Asiatic provinces. This is also the case with Russia, which while working to protect its own interests and subjects does not contemplate any separate policy. A meeting of the Balkan States representatives in London on Thursday decided to add to the war indemnity the charges involved by the loss of time since the suspension of hostilities.

A Cettinje message states that two million kilogrammes of corn, the gift of the Tsar of Russia to relieve distress among the Montenegrins, have arrived at Antivari.

A Bukharest telegram says that a Cabinet Council at which the King presided has decided on the course to be pursued in order to bring the negotiations with Bulgaria to an immediate issue and has decided not to mobilise troops.

The semi-official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung discussing Balkan question says that the most important consideration for the further treatment of the Eastern trouble is the maintenance of unity among the Powers and the continuation of their common work for the restoration of peace. It says that there is no ground for the presumption that individual Powers intend to leave the concert with the object of intervening in their own interests; nor is there any question of coercive measures with regard to joint European action. Such measures, it says, would not be in accordance with neutrality and might have serious result.

The semi-official Rossiya (St. Petersburg) says that Russia is ever more conscious of the necessity of ending the war and will direct all her efforts to that end. Europe whose attitude is unchanged in the result of the events in Constantinople expects that the new Cabinet will display that same spirit of reasonable conciliation as its predecessor.

The Balkan delegates have decided to break off the negotiations. They have appointed a committee to draft a letter to the Turkish Government announcing their decision. The letter will probably be presented to-morrow.

The battleship King Edward and the Zealandia have been ordered to proceed to the east from Malta.

The French Minister of Marine has ordered the despatch of two more warships to the east in case of necessity.

The British cruiser "Dartmouth" arrived at Salonica on Saturday night.

According to an uncensored account of Thursday's happenings which has been received from Constantinople, Enver Bey was accompanied into the Grand Vizierate by Kadji Bey and Talaat Bey and a party of officers. After the revolver firing was over Enver Bey told Kiamil Pasha that he must either swear to continue war or resign. Kiamil was perfectly cool and chose to resign. The ministers remained prisoners till two in the morning when they were released. The crowd outside increased to hundreds, and patriotic and warlike speeches, prayers and chants could be heard. Two British Indians harangued a Moslem gathering. They said that India was with Turkey heart and soul.

Opponents of the Committee of Union and Progress were hunted but took refuge in the different Embassies.

The letter from the Balkan delegates to the Turkish delegates will declare that the Conference has been broken off owing to Turkey's refusal of their proposals. A draft of the letter was to be submitted to another meeting of the Balkan delegates on Sunday who were then to decide the time of presentation and also whether the negotiations should end with the presentation of the letter or whether some brief period should be allowed to intervene before the rupture was made effective. In the Allies' view Turkey alone is responsible for the rupture of the negotiations, the change of Cabinet and the new Government's manifesto clearly indicating that her reply to the Powers will be of a negative character.

The opinion is held in some quarters, especially in view of a certain indefiniteness with reference to the immediate effects of the decision of the Balkan delegates, which their statements do not seem to remove, that their action is a piece of bluff intended to induce the Powers to exercise stronger pressure on Turkey.

The King Edward and Zealandia have gone to the Aegean.

The Duke of Edinburgh arrived at Port Said yesterday and left almost immediately for Beirut.

The British Indians who harangued the gathering at the Porte on Thursday, apparently belonging to the Red Crescent Mission, said that India wanted to see the Turks conduct the war to a victorious finish.

An autopsy shows that Nazim Pasha was stabbed besides being shot.

A Constantinople wire says that Prince Said Halim has been appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs.

London, Jan. 28.

Though the Note of the Balkan delegates has been drafted, the meeting of delegates to approve it has been deferred as the Servians lack instructions. It is understood that it will be considered at a "farewell luncheon" which the Servians are giving to-day, but its presentation will probably be further delayed, to give Turkey an opportunity of replying to the Powers.

A Constantinople wire says that the acting Foreign Minister states that the Turkish reply to the Powers will probably be sent on Friday.

Mr. Asquith, replying to Sir J. D. Rees in the House of Commons to-day, said: "I am aware that reports of the treatment of Moslems in territory occupied by Bulgaria and Servia have attracted widespread notice, and attention of Bulgaria and Servia has been drawn to the matter."

It is announced in Constantinople that the Porte has signed an agreement with a syndicate, headed by the Deutsche Bank, conveying a concession for the Metropolitan Railway to the latter which will immediately advance a considerable sum to the Porte.

A Gibraltar wire says that H. M. Cruiser "Argyll" has been ordered to the East.

The Balkan delegates in London after a prolonged conference approved and signed the note regarding breaking off negotiations, but the date of presentation was not fixed. The time of presentation of the note has been left to the discretion of the senior delegate. It will probably be presented to-morrow. The delegates consider that presentation will end their mission in London. M. Venizelos, Greek delegates, and most of the others will leave London this week. The note makes no mention of termination of the Armistice.

Replying to Colonel Yates in the House of Commons, with reference to the letter from the All-India Moslem League calling attention to the reports of outrages on Mussulmans in Macedonia, Sir Edward Grey said he was informing the League of the steps which were being taken by Government.

Replying to Mr. Walter Guinness and Mr. Johan Dillon with reference to the representations addressed to Bulgaria and Serbia respecting the treatment of Moslems, Sir Edward Grey said the Bulgarian Premier had stated that no pitresges had been committed by Bulgarian Regulars, any such actions by Bulgarian bands were directly opposed to orders issued at headquarters. Sir Edward Grey proceeded: "It is extremely difficult to judge of the degree of authenticity attaching to the allegations made. In the only case in which information that reached me was sufficiently detailed, a further communication is being addressed to the Government concerned, and His Majesty's Minister has been instructed to express the hopes that those proved guilty of excess will be dealt with as justice demands. I am unable to say whether any other Great Powers have taken similar action."

London, Jan. 29.

In an interview Mahmud Shefket Pasha, Grand Vizier, said: "Foreign collaboration is indispensable for the reform of the administration: so we shall appoint foreign advisers to all ministries. We shall also divide the Empire into great administrative zones and engage a foreign inspector for each zone. Without waiting for the summoning of Parliament we shall exact by trade laws permitting the working of land banks and instituting freedom of contract with liberty to establish joint stock companies and conclude agreements for the construction of railways and the carrying out of public works."

Although the presentation of the Allies' Note to-day will mark a definite rupture of the conference the diplomats in London still hope that a renewal of war may be avoided owing to Turkey's grave position. Information from Constantinople indicates that the Ottoman troops are not fit to take offensive and that the new Cabinet will probably be compelled to make peace terms not dissimilar from those proposed by Kiamil Pasha.

In an interview at Constantinople Mahmud Shefket Pasha said that peace was certain if Europe made it possible for Turkey. He added: "We have not come into power to defy Europe, but to appeal to her conscience. We shall only draw sword if compelled to choose between war and the repudiation of Muhammadan opinion throughout the world."

It is rumoured in Vienna that Ahmad Abuk Pasha with the Fourth Army Corps is marching on Constantinople to revenge the death of Nazim Pasha.

A message from Toulon says that a squadron of four battleships and cruisers which has just returned has been ordered to hold itself in readiness to leave for the Near East at a moment's notice.

The attitude of Rumania is again disquieting. It is announced at Bukharest that the claim to the possession of Silistria has not been abandoned and that if Bulgaria does not reply definitely by Thursday the Government will decide on its course of action.

Rumania has contracted a loan for six million sterling with a German Syndicate.

Telegrams from Bukharest indicate that public opinion is forcing Government to make larger demands from Bulgaria. Numerous meetings have been held at which resolutions have been passed fervidly in favour of insistence on a large cession of territory.

In Vienna the official Kronenblatt says that the Triple Entente are completely agreed that in the event of Turkey's non-compliance with the Powers' Note Turkey can in no way reckon on the support of the Powers. The Powers are also fully agreed that no isolated action shall be taken if the Turkish reply is unfavourable.

London, Jan. 30.

The Serbian Chargé d'Affaires yesterday afternoon handed Rechid Pasha the Note of the Allies declaring that the negotiations are broken off.

The Allies have written a letter to Sir Edward Grey asking him to convey to the King their respectful gratitude and expressing to Sir E. Grey and Government their high esteem and sincere thanks for their cordial hospitality.

The German ambassador at a banquet in honour of the Kaiser's birthday affirmed that the future of Turkey lay in Asia Minor. German interests there were very great and were tied up with those of Turkey. The recent Note of the Powers had promised that after the conclusion of peace they would assist Turkey in her future development, and Germany would lend powerful aid in the same cause. But in any case Germany would apply the powerful injunction not to tamper in regard to Turkish possessions in Asia Minor.

Dr. Danoff, President of the Bulgarian Chamber, M. Mishe, representing Rumanians, and the Rumanian Minister in London yesterday signed a protocol which will serve as a basis for further negotiations in Sofia and Bukharest. The protocol records the new demands of Rumania, namely, that the Rumanian frontier shall extend from Turtukai upon the Danube westward of Silistria to Balchik, twenty miles northward of Varna.

The Bulgarians are indignant at the fresh demands while the Rumanians believe that all will ultimately be settled amicably.

The diplomatists are favourably impressed by the indications of the nature of the Porte's reply to the Powers and believe that it will serve as a basis for settlement or at least for a resumption of negotiations.

It is stated in Vienna that the Bulgarian headquarters have been ordered to denounce the armistice to-day.

A Sofia message states that General Savoff in an order to the army says: "The enemy are anxious by a stroke of the pen to destroy all that you have won. Will the heroes of Kirk Kiliseh, Bunarlissar, Lule Burgas, and Tchataldja allow this affront to go unanswered?" He urges the troops to prepare for fresh victories.

Later.

Turkey has presented her reply to the Powers' Note. The reply is moderate in tone and stipulates for the retention of the quarters in Adrianople where the holy shrines are situated.

Turkey agrees to the dismantling of the fortifications and proposes to leave to the Powers the disposal of the land on the right bank of the Maritza. She requires the maintenance of Turkish sovereignty in the Aegean Island, which she maintains are strategically important owing to their proximity to the coast; but she agrees that the Powers shall settle the form of administration in the island.

Said Pasha, an ex-Grand Vizier, has been appointed president of the Council of State.

It is reported from Suez that the Turkish warship Hamidiyah is anchored twenty miles to the south of Suez and is receiving coals and stores despatched by train by a Turkish agent in Port Said.

The chief of the Balkan delegates are leaving, but the secondary delegates will remain in London to keep in touch with the Foreign Office and the conference of ambassadors.

Moslem Feeling.

Barisally.

A MEETING of the District Moslem League of Barisally was held on 23rd January, 1913, and the following resolutions were passed unanimously:—

(1) That this meeting feels it deeply that Britain, instead of using its influence to put a stop to the atrocities of the Balkan States, has, in spite of the declaration of neutrality, joined the European Powers in pressing the Note, and protests against all the attempts made to force Turkey to accept a dishonourable peace.

(2) That in view of the undue pressure brought by the Powers upon Turkey, this meeting deems it necessary that all Moslems declare a general boycott of the goods of their respective countries and buy articles manufactured (purely) in India or Japan, America, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, or Switzerland, etc.

Lahore.

The Mussalmans of Lahore assembled in a crowded mass meeting on the 28th January under the Presidency of Maulvi Muhammad Abdullah Peshawari. The following resolutions were passed:—

(1) The Mussalmans pray that His Excellency would impress on His Majesty the King-Emperor's Government in the name and on behalf of His Majesty's seventy million loyal Moslem subjects in India that believing in the Government's desire to shape the policy of the Empire according to the wishes of all His Majesty's subjects and trusting in its consistency and justice, they pray His Majesty's Government to remain absolutely neutral and take no part in coercing Turkey in the peace negotiations, if the Government cannot take up arms on behalf of Turkey.

(2) This meeting also trusts that His Imperial Majesty the Sultan's Government will do its utmost to uphold the honor and prestige of Islam and that every Turk would either maintain the glory of Islam or perish in the attempt.

(iv) This meeting offers to their Turkish brethren the hearty sympathy of the Indian Mussalmans.

Madras.

At a largely attended open-air meeting of the Muhammadans of Madras in the South Indian Athletic Association grounds, under the presidency of Hon. Hajee Ismail Sait, the following resolutions were passed:—

(1) Madras Muslims deeply sympathise with the Turkish people in the present crisis, and deplore the unjust attitude of the Powers at this juncture. They have full confidence in the wisdom of the present Government in safeguarding the national interest and honour of Islam.

(2) Indian Muslims view with consternation the unwarranted European concert in coercing Turkey to accept an ignominious peace. They specially feel deeply concerned at Great Britain being a party to this unjust policy, regardless of the feelings of millions of its Muslim subjects.

(3) This meeting in common with the whole civilised world condemns the atrocities perpetrated on unarmed men, helpless Muslim women, and innocent children in Albania, Macedonia, and Thrace, which is a distinct disgrace to civilisation and humanity. The meeting also feels intensely surprised at the atrocious silence of civilised Europe at such barbarities and strongly protests against British inactivity in this connection.

One noteworthy feature of the meeting was that a Hindu also took part in the proceedings. Mr A. C. Parthasarathy Naidu, a well-known citizen of Madras, in supporting the third resolution, said that he was sure that the Hindu community had whole-hearted sympathy with Turkey.

Lucknow.

At a meeting of the Majlis Moayad-ul-Islam in Lucknow on the 24th January it was resolved that the following cablegram be despatched to the Sultan:—"Change of Cabinet highly gratifying. Pray resume fighting. Trust God for victory."

It was also resolved that the resolution be forwarded to the Viceroy, appealing to the Government to inform the British Government of anger and disgust created among Moslems, and praying the British Cabinet to refrain from joining the Powers against Turkey.

Karachi.

A largely attended meeting of the local members of the Red Crescent Society, Sind, was held in the Islam Club, Karachi. Mir Ayub Khan, Bar-at-Law, President of the Society, occupying the chair. The subject for the day was introduced by the Chairman in a short speech. The following resolution was passed and conveyed by cablegram to Sir Edward Grey, Foreign Minister:—

"Sind Red Crescent Society strongly protests atrocities of Balkan Allies in occupied territory in name of humanity and civilization and prays Great Powers maintain declared neutrality and fairplay in peace negotiations, thereby win gratitude of millions Mussalmans on earth."

The meeting concluded with solemn prayers for the honourable extrication of the Caliphate from the present troubles.

Text of the Turkish Note.

REUTERS' Agency gives the following as the text of the written Note submitted to the Conference on the 8th January by Reshid Pasha:—

"In this Note they handed us at the previous sitting the delegates of the Allied States expressed the opinion that we had not taken the results of the war into account. We will point out that we have consented to important territorial cessions. With the exception of two points, we have complied with all the desiderata of the Allied States.

"By demanding to replace the term 'occupied' by that of 'situated' in the Turkish proposal for the cession of the occupied territories to the west of the vilayet of Adrianople, the Allies recognised that some of the territories they claim have not been occupied by them. We nevertheless acceded to their demand. The Allies, however, have made no concession whatever in exchange for all these we have made.

"If we refuse the cession of Adrianople, it is, amongst other reasons, because the cession of that town is impossible from the point of view of the security of Constantinople and the Dardanelles.

"Further, we must add that we have come here with the firm intention of establishing a durable peace on conditions which will ensure friendly and commercial relations, profitable to both parties.

"To-day we have come to discuss the question of the Turkish-Bulgarian frontier. But Adrianople must remain on Ottoman territory.

"In order to further mark the conciliating character of our attitude we consent to give up all our rights on Crete on condition, it should be well understood, that the Allied States will not demand the cession of any of the other islands in the Aegean.

"If, notwithstanding all these sacrifices on our part, the Allies refuse to make any concessions and wish to break off negotiations, all the responsibility of the consequences will fall on their shoulders."

"In such case we withdraw all the concessions we have hitherto made."

Interview with Osman Nizami Pasha.

(SPECIAL TO THE "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE")

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Westminster Gazette was received yesterday by Osman Nizami Pasha, Turkish Ambassador at Berlin, one of the Ottoman peace delegates.

His Excellency who speaks English with ease and idiomatic accuracy, expressed his opinions with great freedom.

"There is, I find," said his Excellency, "a mistaken view in this country, as well as abroad, on the real situation and on the points at issue. Upon the outbreak of war the Powers solemnly declared that the status quo would be maintained whatever the results of the conflict. The Allies themselves announced that their sole aim was to better the condition of their brethren in Macedonia. Thus being the case, all that they can fairly claim to-day is a form of government which would ensure to those populations a reformed administration, and it is all the more true as it does not follow that because a country has been invaded by the enemy it must remain in the possession of that enemy. The results of territorial adjustment which followed the Franco-German war and, later, the Russo-Japanese war bear out this statement. Indeed, it is well-known. Therefore the demands of the Allies at the Conference are totally inconsistent with their own professions. They are, moreover, contrary to international usage. What has been applied to other countries in the interests of permanent peace should, I submit, be applied to Turkey. Be this as it may, out of deference to the manifest wish of Europe, to avoid a general conflagration, or a renewal of local hostilities, the Ottoman Government, in a genuine spirit of conciliation and with the earnest desire to stop further bloodshed and suffering to non-combatants, has practically granted all the reasonable demands of the Allies, consistent with the dignity of the Ottoman Empire and the safety of the dominions of the Sultan."

And is Adrianople and the islands the stumbling block? inquired our representative. "Precisely not," replied his Excellency. "We have naturally refused to grant Adrianople and the Aegean Islands because the city has a population almost exclusively Moslem, and is the key by land to the Capital; and the islands, by their close proximity to the Asiatic mainland and to the Dardanelles, would in the occupation of a foreign State be a constant menace by sea and entail heavy expenditure to the Turkish Exchequer in fortifying the adjacent coasts. Having in view what has been stated both as to Europe and the professions of the Allies, we may fairly claim to have approached the consideration of their latest demands in a spirit of equity—asking for justice and conceding justice to others. Let it be remembered that we have conceded a territory as large if not larger than that owned by the four allied kingdoms. Can we, I ask, be expected to do more?"

Then, Excellency, you do not anticipate the intervention of the Powers?

"If any pressure is to be brought by the Powers, who have declared their neutrality, surely it should be directed to the Balkan States, for it must be clear that to coerce Turkey would be a one-sided operation. We are of opinion that the Allies should of their own accord give way upon points which it is impossible for us to yield. Perhaps the Allies in their hearts already realise that, else it would be difficult to explain their conduct at the last meeting of the Conference. To our explicit note stating the maximum of Turkey's concessions—which was a reply to their ultimatum—they did not break off negotiations—they merely declared the work of the Conference suspended in a form contrary to all procedure. Perhaps, also, they hope that some occult power may yet intervene to help them to re-open discussions at St. James's Palace under more favourable auspices.

"It is, indeed, the only explanation one can give of the expedient they have resorted to, for I should be doing them an injustice to think that they were reckoning on the surrender of Adrianople. They surely must be aware that if Adrianople falls during the armistice it cannot be regarded as the result of an 'act of war' from which they could profit. All international conventions would negative such a view. Nor need I remind you that the cruelty of not re-occupying Adrianople is the cause of the civilian residents in Adrianople, women and children mostly, being condemned to the pangs of starvation and lingering death from hunger and disease. I thank you most heartily for visiting us. I feel sure that British sympathy will not be withheld from our cause. We have met in your capital with pleasure, hoping for a sure and lasting peace. We have to remember the obligations of duty to our own Sovereign and to our own people. It must be remembered that in the belt of territory between Adrianople and Constantinople the population is mainly Moslem, and if the British nation—in whose justice and impartiality we have complete confidence—have the facts fully exposed they will, we do not doubt, agree that we are at the end of concessions which can legitimately be demanded."

Then, Pasha, you decline all responsibility for the suspension of the work of the Conference?

"Most certainly we do. It was in no sense our seeking, and we deplore the procedure adopted. It is now for the Allies to yield, or to assume full responsibility for the acts of their representatives before the tribunal of public opinion."

War and After.

(By DR. E. J. DILLON.)

In a day or two, able correspondents assure us, the Delegates may be expected to come together again, with a view to taking up the threads of the negotiations where they so abruptly dropped them last Monday night. Instructions from Stamboul, it appears, have been received by Reshid Pasha exjoining him to arrange to meet his colleagues in St. James's Palace anew, and unfold the modified frontier line to which he made allusion in the last version of his counter-proposals. It will not include Adrianople, but at least it will mark a noteworthy advance on the concessions made heretofore. And once the business of bargaining has been resumed, it may be persisted in until a workable settlement of all outstanding differences is reached. As the Turks put it, "It is by stepping from rung to rung that you climb to the top of the ladder."

I confess I cannot discern the intrinsic probability of that story. The grounds brought forward in support of it lack force. Why should the delegates foregather again in the Palace Picture Room? To hear each other's arguments for and against the cession of Adrianople and the Ægean Islands? For that is what the issue has been narrowed down to.

Surely the pros and cons can be found in the newspapers and appreciated serenely in the tranquillity of the study. Hearing them at the council board will not invest them with additional persuasive force. No. There is nothing to be gained at the present moment by resuming the discussions—for it was only a discussion, a pouring from an empty vessel into void space.

The written proposals and counter-proposals and the speeches by which they were enlarged upon failed to satisfy those for whose behoof they were written and delivered.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

The real work of treaty-making will be achieved not on the stage, but behind the scenes. As it is, Greek and Bulgar and Turk see each other from time to time, and talk things over with winning frankness, in their private capacity. As soon as the Ottoman delegates have received powers to improve on their last counter-proposals and to satisfy the Allies, they can apprise the latter of the fact, and they will all meet again. Before that a sitting would be fruitless, it might even be dangerous. Meanwhile, the Powers are having their tonings. And they do not let the grass grow under their feet. Representations, promises, covert threats, have been lavished on the statesmen at Stamboul, with no visible effect as yet. The Porte has been ever ready with an unanswerable response: "Nothing would be easier than for us to agree to your proposals and draft the Peace Treaty on that base; but by doing so we should forfeit our official capacity and become mere private individuals. For the country would repudiate us. Our signature would bind no one. The document thus indited and signed would not be worth the paper on which it was written. And you yourselves do not want that." None the less, there are some symptoms of a change in the situation.

"From the meeting at Tchataldja of the two commanding Generals—Nasim and Savoff—and the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, Gabriel Effendi Noradunghian, much is expected. It is surmised that they have hit upon a way out of the difficulty which, while dissatisfying both sides a little, will dispose of the matter definitively. The Bulgarians, it is explained, do not lay stress on the possession of the town of Adrianople, what they care about is possession of the railway connecting the Bulgarian system with Southern Macedonia and the Ægean ports. The railway, it is added, is situated a couple of miles away from the city on the farther side of the River Maritza." All this is, indeed, welcome intelligence, and one hails it with pleasure. If it be true, a compromise is easy enough; but then it can be arranged like everything else that matters, behind the scenes. Hence the resumption of the sittings at the present moment is unnecessary and, unless the Tchataldja interview has brought an accord, unlikely. Much more probable is the supposition that the Governments of the Great Powers will proceed with their action in Stamboul, make energetic representations there, and then, if absolutely necessary, follow them up, with a naval demonstration, announcing their plan of campaign to the Porte in advance, and thus disarming resistance. This method will require some time, and if it succeeds will settle the difficulty of the frontiers. But a hundred and one other contentious matters will still remain to be settled, which also need patience and time.

Of these issues the possession of the Ægean Islands the most momentous, the final decision really depending upon the Great Powers. Greece, of course, will also be heard, but at the bar of the Ambassadors her voice will carry only the weight inherent in the arguments it articulates, and perhaps not even that. What has been actually done in the matter down to the present moment is extremely little, and may be set forth as follows.

ISLAND QUESTION.

When the Great Powers, as represented by the Ambassadors, first broached the subject, the form in which the question was propounded was this: "Shall the claims of Greece, founded on the right of conquest, of ethnology, of race, religion, be allowed or challenged?" Italy's Ambassador was ominously silent. Russia's spokesman classified the islands into those which could be ceded to Greece and those which ought to be left in Turkey's possession. That was the first phase of the deliberation. Later on the subject was mooted behind the scenes, where men are less theatrically attuned, more frank, direct, and business-like. There the nature of Russia's objections was inquired into, and it appeared that they were but a paraphrase of those of the Porte. Four islands Tenedos, Lemnos, Samothrace, and Imbros are absolutely indispensable to the defence of the Dardanelles, while two are required for the strategical protection of the coast of Asia Minor—Chios and Mitylene. It was argued that however much territory one may take away from Turkey in Europe, her possessions in Asia must remain inviolate, otherwise they would merely excite longings and tempt aggression, and it would be infinitely better to carve them up at once and parcel them out among the Powers. And as the islands mentioned cannot be given up without endangering the existence of Turkey they cannot, of course, be ceded to Greece. This line of reasoning, say the Greeks, is plausible enough until it is analysed. Then it passes away like mountain mists in the summer sun.

ITALY'S OMINOUS SILENCE.

There must be something in this contention, if we may judge by the fact that this first objection to the cession of the reserved islands to Greece has been dropped. Russia is converted. A certain other Government perceived its fallacy, and made no secret of the discovery. The British Press also advocated the Greek cause wholeheartedly. Soon the belief became general that the question was settled by the Ambassadors' meeting, at least in principle. All the islands, without exception, we were told, will be ceded to Greece. But that was never my belief. Mindful of Italy's ominous silence, I felt instinctively and said in plain words that something was brewing in Rome which was intended to be employed as sauce for some of the Ægean islands later on.

Ever since the Italo-Turkish campaign, during which I visited several of the islands, but was refused admittance to Rhodes, my political intuition told me that Italy coveted two of them—Rhodes and Astypalaia (also known as Stampaglia). It was objected to me by the Greeks, to whom I communicated my conviction, that the supposition was not merely groundless, Italy having allowed Greece's demands to pass unchallenged, but was unjust over and above. "Italy is the embodiment of the principle of nationalism," they argued, "she owes her very existence to that, she has never repudiated it; indeed, her statesmen have recently reaffirmed it, and they would cover themselves with odium, were they now to thrust it aside in favour of a policy of grab. Besides, they have had their little war with Turkey, and have carried off what they deemed adequate spoil. The island, although occupied by their troops, they did not annex. On what principle could they now utilise Greek victories over Turkey, for the purpose of robbing Greece of what belongs to her by right of conquest? No, Italy is incapable of such baseness."

"TIME IS AN HONEST MAN."

Silence was the only fit answer to this line of reasoning. Accordingly I fell silent. "Time is an honest man," says the proverb, and the time, short though it was, which elapsed since then has revealed a little more of the hands of the players. Greece notified the Powers through the Press and otherwise, that all she wanted was merely reunion with her own sons, not naval or military bases, and that she is ready to push this declaration to the furthest self-denying consequences if the interested States desire it. But Italy has come forward and lodged objections to the cession of certain of the islands, amid the ominous silence of her neighbours. And now the whole question which was so felicitously settled in principle, according to the Press, a few weeks ago, has waxed acute once more.

That King Victor Emmanuel's Government intends to claim any of the islands during the liquidation of the Balkan War is, I feel certain, out of the question. The incongruity of the things would be too glaring, and the precedent too dangerous. It would raise the question of compensation all round. But, so long as certain of them remain under Turkey's sceptre, the chances of expropriating one or two as soon as the opportune moment arrives are considerable. Any how, the goal would be attainable and worth striving after. But if they are once grafted on Greece they will grow together organically, become one with her, and all hope of amputating them later on will have vanished. The islands now in dispute are not merely the two groups enumerated above—those which are needed for the defence of the Straits, and the two claimed by the Porte as indispensable to the efficacious protection of the coast of Asia Minor. Rhodes and Kos are also, it is anticipated, to be left with Turkey—as long as is expedient.

GREEK'S STANDPOINT.

The Hellenic Government, demurring energetically to this way of solving the matter, has delivered messages of anxious warning to the interested Governments, and called upon them to look at the issues fairly and squarely, and adjudge them in consonance with equity, international law, the interests of Greece, of Turkey, of the Islanders, of the Turks themselves, of South Eastern Europe, and of peace. For from each and every one of these points of view it will be seen that the Archipelago should be handed over to Greece and people who set a high value on the desirability of peace in the South-East should not grudge a close and careful regard to the pro and con of the vexed problem. For, although to Europe generally, preoccupied by immense interests the matter may appear at first blush of secondary importance, it is really formidable in the political and moral issues which it raises.

What has taken place in Rome shows a curious inversion of the parts generally ascribed to the Powers. Austria-Hungary has often been taxed with a lack of respect for the principle of nationality, whereas Italy never tires of preaching it. Yet the only proposal which heretofore emanated from Vienna embodied this principle and compelled its recognition by the disgusted Allies, the inviolability and autonomy of Albania. Italy, on the contrary, by demanding the severance of Greek islands from Greece, scorns the principle of nationality. And that is a false position.

The procedure of the Roman Consulta lays on the great Powers of Europe the onus of descending into the arena, aiding directly in the partition of Turkey, and taking sides against one of the Allies. Why thus interfere with Greece? Intervention is about to take place in favour of Bulgaria. That is comprehensible, Turkey is disappearing from Europe, Slav and Hellenic States are taking her place, and the Powers are impressed by the necessity of leaving nothing behind to rankle and fester in the body of the growing Bulgarian nation. But why reverse this wise policy in the case of Greece? No justification of this course can be offered.—The Daily Telegraph

Horrors of the War.

Murder and Pillage.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, Jan. 9.

ENTITLED "Liberation of the Christians," the greatest Hungarian journal, the Budapesti Hirlap, to-day publishes a long article of several columns, with new details of atrocities. The journal says it is remarkable that during the Peace Conference everything has been discussed except the thousands of persons who were annually slaughtered, while no one in Europe thought of the villages which had been burned down and the cities which had been destroyed.

The writer then proceeds to give the following details from an official source, arranging them in four groups:

(1) Slaughter of Albanians by Serbs: What the Serbs have done to the Albanians is putting all international law to ridicule. Albanian prisoners were fearfully tortured, then buried alive. Our Vice-Consul in Mitrovitz, Ludwig von Taly, relates that the Serbian troops slew the Albanians in masses. He himself saw them kicking rows of Albanian corpses with their feet. During the massacres of Albanians in Prizrend he himself saw Serbian soldiers dragging small children into the streets, perpetrating atrocities upon them openly. Young girls and women were fearfully maltreated in the courtyard of the Consulate in Prizrend. At Urosh, Kumanova, and Velles Turkish soldiers who had been captured by the Serbs were cut down, while innocent women and children were killed before the very eyes of our Consul at Urosh. Hundreds of corpses were seen floating in the Vardar river, while Turkish prisoners on their way to Belgrade and Nish were also killed.

FIVE THOUSAND WOMEN BURNED.

(2) Atrocities of Bulgarians and Bulgarian bands: The Bulgars murdered more than half of the Mussulman population of the vilayet of Salonica—55,000 men. Only those were saved who embraced the Catholic religion. The same thing happened in the vilayets of Petrici, Monlie Demirhisar, Strumitza, Osmanje and Serres. The Turks were forced to accept Bulgarian nationality and adopt the schism. Not a single Mussulman was left alive at Radovista and Avrathissar. Nearly 5,000 women who took refuge in the mosques in the neighbourhood of Serres were burned alive at the order of the band leader, Sandansky. Hundreds of these corpses can still be seen under the ruins of the mosques of Tetova and Viterne, which were destroyed by fire. At Standsha the slaughter of human beings lasted twenty days. Some 960 Mussulmans were murdered, while the Bulgars slew 200 Mussulmans at Toiran. In the small village of Bungeo ninety men were killed. The Turkish inhabitants of Kirbasabala, Vesir, Vessitaidi, and Bultas were also forced to accept the Christian religion, while many robberies were perpetrated. Chatnojeff, the leader of a robber band, for example, managed to steal over 2,000,000 kronen in a few days. These bandits will be the richest persons in the Balkans. The Bulgarian komsitchez perpetrated fearful atrocities in the neighbourhood of Kavalla. In the city itself forty-six respected Turkish citizens were taken prisoners, among them Eldib Bey, then robbed and shot. Many members of the Jewish population were robbed and murdered.

OUTRAGES ON JEWS.

(3) Atrocities of Greeks and Bulgars in Salonika: Greek soldiers attacked the defenders' Channing's quarters, penetrated to the houses and threatened to murder the inhabitants if they did not give up their money. Fourteen persons were bound, gagged, and carried away to places unknown to their friends. Greek soldiers entered the Jewish synagogue and demolished it, destroying all the sacred objects. A dead Jewish man was being carried to burial, when suddenly Greek soldiers attacked the mourners and insulted them. A fierce combat followed, during which many Jews were badly injured. In the Aktimesjid quarter the synagogue was also broken into, and valuables were stolen. The houses of eight Jewish families who lived near the synagogue were set on fire. Greek soldiers even attacked the hospitals of Red Cross, in which wounded Turks were lying. At Salonica, also, 250 Turkish soldiers were slaughtered, while the band leaders, Sandansky and Hantschhoff, blew up the powder tower, thus causing the death of 310 Turkish soldiers.

(4) Greek Atrocities. Travellers from Salonica to Florina see hundreds of corpses alongside the railway line—old men, with noses and ears cut off, corpses of women whose eyelids had been slit, and bodies of women who were hanged by their hair, can all be seen. Further, corpses of young men, with the heads served from the bodies, and of infants murdered in their mothers' arms, are visible. At Metelin the Greeks tore off the beard of Sheikh Sar-lischo, and beat him to death with the butt-ends of their rifles. The Turkish houses at Metelin were fired, and the population of Polionit and Kolonia taken prisoners and conveyed to Metelin, the old people were thrown into prison, while the women were forced to walk the streets without clothing. A Greek priest at Jere killed Hassan Bey and his three friends with his own hands, and similar inhuman atrocities occurred on the island of Chios.

Protest by the London Moslem League.

At a special meeting of the Committee of the London All-India Moslem League held on the 2nd instant, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted—

1. That the Committee of the London All-India Moslem League place on record their horror and indignation at the terrible barbarities perpetrated on the Mussulman population of Albania and Macedonia by the Balkan invaders, which will always remain a blot on the vaunted civilisation and humanity of Europe; and their sorrow at the general indifference with which the news of the atrocities, coming from unbiassed sources with every guarantee of the truth, have been received by the British public.

2. That the Committee of the London All-India Moslem League desire to give expression to their deep regret that whilst the Peace Negotiations have been in progress in London, the British Press generally, instead of maintaining absolute impartiality and advocating a spirit of compromise on both sides, should have indulged in minatory and almost abusive language towards one party whilst inciting the other belligerents to assume a totally uncompromising and unyielding attitude.

3. That the Committee of the London All-India Muslim League desire to record their full concurrence in the programme of work to be undertaken by the Central League under its new constitution; and, in view of the support that has been accorded by British public opinion to the movement for autonomy among nationalities not nearly so advanced as the great communities of India, with their historic civilisation and culture and their great traditions, the Committee endorse the policy of the Council of the Central League in regard to self-government for India under the aegis of the British Crown, so as to secure proper consideration to Indian public opinion in the administration of the Empire and equality of treatment and status for His Majesty's subjects in the British Colonies.

4. That copies of the above resolutions be submitted to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India and the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and be also forwarded to the Press.

The Relief Work in Turkey.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SYED AMER ALI,

President, British Red Crescent Society

Constantinople, 23rd December, 1912.

SIR,—On behalf of the Central local Committee formed to co-operate with you in giving temporary aid to refugees and, especially, in constructing for them permanent residences in Asia Minor, on land presented for this purpose by the Imperial Ottoman Government, we are directed by an unanimous vote of this Committee, to express their sincere thanks for the interest you have taken in the matter and the confidence you have placed in its members.

After a discussion it was considered that it would be more respectful to His Highness the Khedive of Egypt that you, as Honorary President of the Committee, should express to His Highness the high appreciation which is entertained by the Committee, of his generous and magnificent contribution to the needs of the enormous number of refugees from Salonica and other places.

This Committee especially requests that, in tendering the thanks of the Committee of which you are the President, you will kindly associate us in the fullest manner in such appreciation.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servants,

(Sd.) DAMAD FERID,

President.

(Sd.) C. J. HOLMES,

Secretary.

Scheme of His Highness Damad Ferid Pasha's Committee.

PROPRIETOR.

Introductory

Thousands of refugees with their families remain between the Tchataldja lines and the walls of Constantinople. Others in larger numbers have crossed the Bosphorus and have dispersed themselves in Asia Minor, as far as Konia. They are without shelter, exposed to the inclemency of the weather and in urgent need of food and clothing.

Their numbers exceed 100,000, the greater portion being old men, women and children, who, if not relieved, will most certainly perish through the severity of the winter, which is now making itself felt throughout the country.

To preserve the lives of these unfortunate creatures during the cold season, shelter and food must be supplied until they can provide for themselves. They should also, as far as possible, be given land in proximity to the cottages which will be built for them, and provided with agricultural implements and seed for the first year.

To facilitate the execution of this scheme the most practical course would probably be to settle the refugees in groups in suitable localities.

With the object of co-operating with the Committee of which the Right Honourable Amier Ali is President, a Central local Committee has been formed in Constantinople.

FIRST PART

Central local Committee.

This Central local Committee will be composed of six persons of whom 3 will be British and 3 Ottoman, under the Presidency of His Highness Damad Ferid Pasha.

In each of the localities where refugees are assembled in considerable numbers, a Sub-Committee will be named whose members shall be British and Ottoman.

The Central local Committee will take decisions in accordance with the programme adopted and these will be carried out by the Sub-Committees in the provinces.

The expenses to be incurred and the finances of the Central local Committee will be supervised by two Englishmen named by this Committee. They will be chosen exclusively amongst the British members.

The first care of the Central local Committee will be to meet the urgent and immediate wants of the refugees, but it is also intended to build villages on plans drawn up by the Central Committee and on a scale commensurate with the financial means at its disposal.

The Central local Committee has reason to believe that the Imperial Ottoman Government will grant the Committee suitable lands for refugees in the localities settled or to be settled by such refugees.

SECOND PART

Each village will consist of one hundred dwellings of different sizes, some composed of 3 rooms, a kitchen and a stable at the side of the house and others with more rooms, a kitchen and stable likewise.

There will be a school in each village. The education to be provided is to be free.

Each family, according to the number of its members, will receive 10 or 20 donums of land, the cultivation of which will provide them with the means of livelihood.

Further each family will receive—

1. a pair of oxen,
2. the necessary agricultural implements, and
3. seed in sufficient quantity for one year only.

Moreover 30 donums of land will be assigned to the community to be cultivated by its members for the good of the whole, or also to be used as pasture land for their cattle.

The lands given by the Ottoman Government must be inscribed in the name of the head of each family. The property of each family will then be indivisible and will be inherited always by the eldest member of the family; it cannot be sold nor transferred; it will form a sort of majorat.

In the event of the extinction of the direct line the land can pass to the younger branch and failing this to the collateral branch.

In case of total extinction of the family, the property will revert to the community who will devote the revenues of the land and the house to the up-keep of the school. It is only when the property has become communal that it can be sold, with the consent of the Council of Elders, to any person intending to live in the village or to one of the villagers.

In every village there will be a Council of Elders chosen from the oldest and most respectable inhabitants and to be composed of 12 persons.

The duties of this Council will be—

1. to manage the finances of the community,
2. to maintain and keep the school in repair,
3. to attend to the water supply,
4. to attend and keep the village streets and Parish roads in order, and
5. to organise the police of the village and to watch over the morality of the inhabitants.

Children who have lost their parents will be lodged with the most respectable families at the expense of the community at large, until they reach an age at which they can earn their own living, the boys by work and the girls by marriage.

To ensure the economic development of the community a Savings Bank will be established in each village, with the money thus saved and accumulated, these small capitalists will be enabled to purchase land in the neighbourhood, and the members of the community will further increase their wealth.

The family possessing a large property of 20 donums will be required to pay 20 piastres a month and the owner of a smaller property of 10 donums will pay 10 piastres a month. The money thus collected, together with other revenues, will form the budget of the community.

A Genuine Book Bargain.The Mameluke or Slave Dynasty of Egypt from 1260-1517 A. D.

[When the Caliphs of Baghdad were no longer able to retain the territories, conquered by their predecessors, they bought multitudes of Slave from the Tribes of Central Africa and trained them as soldiers to fight their battles. The same policy was pursued in Egypt by the Fatimide Caliph, and after them by the Eyyubite dynasty. The military slaves thus introduced were called Mamelukes. They soon began to lord it over the native inhabitants, and from them arose the Sultans who governed Egypt for two and a half centuries].

DEAR SIRS,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

The Week.

Home Rule Bill.

THE House of Lords has rejected the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill by 326 votes to 69. The closing scene in the House of Lords was brilliant. Peers with their jewels thronged the galleries, and there was the largest muster of Peers since the passing of the Parliament Act. Lord Curzon and Lord Lansdowne were the chief Opposition speakers. Lord Morley, winding up the debate, declared that the Government believed that the Ulster difficulty would pass, and the Bill be worked in a good spirit. There was no excitement when the division was taken, as the result was a foregone conclusion.

The German Navy.

The Budget Committee of the Reichstag has announced that the Naval Estimates amounted to £18,370,000 sterling.

The Committee is reported to have described as incorrect Mr. Churchill's comparison of the strength of the fleets last June because he stated the German ships just laid down to the ships already completed.

In the course of the discussion the Secretary for the Navy announced that no grants would be asked for beyond those provided by the Navy law. He further dwelt on the defensive principle of the Navy law.

China.

A letter from the Chinese Finance Minister to representatives of the Six-Power group expresses regret at learning of the further difficulties preventing the immediate execution of the promise of the Six-Powers to sign the loan agreement.

The Minister points out the urgent need of money and intimates therefore that the salt revenue may now be hypothecated as a security for a loan with another party. This will necessitate a proportionate reduction of the ultimate Six-Power loan, which will be secured by any unhypothecated salt revenue remaining.

Sir Edward Grey in reply to Mr. Ginnell in the Commons said: "It is understood that various appointments under the Chinese reorganisation gold loan will be made in consultation with the representatives of the Powers interested. So far as I am aware none has yet been made."

Mr. Ginnell asked that in the expenditure of loan all contracts and orders for materials which China was unable to obtain from native sources should be put up for public tender for the respective nationalities in proportion to the amount of loan subscribed by their respective sections of the group.

Sir Edward Grey: "Provision has been made for such arrangement."

Router learns that the Chinese Minister has received a telegram announcing a hitch in the loan negotiations. He awaits the arrival in few days of Chang-Toung-Yuan, Vice-President of the Finance Board, who was appointed Chinese financial representative in England and who will at least remain here until a settlement of the difficulties has been reached owing to the urgent necessity of settling outstanding obligations before the Chinese new year.

China has received an advance of £750,000 sterling, being the final instalment of the Crip Loan.

Morocco.

The French in Mogador are resuming operations against tribesmen who are in revolt with a strong force, composed of six battalions of infantry and two squadrons of cavalry with artillery and numerous machine-guns.

Mongolia.

Yuan-shi-kai has written to the Kutukhta declining to negotiate for the separation of Urga from the Republic, and reminding him that persons endangering the Republic have been punished according to law.

The letter adds that he and his troops have committed shocking barbarities and the Republic cannot allow its citizens to be thus treated without taking action. All members of bands in inner and outer Mongolia except those in the immediate vicinity of Urga, who have been overawed, are anxious to join the Republic and oppose him. Many have implored permission, to march against him, but in order to avert bloodshed, Yuan-shi-kai has persuaded the Chinese people to wait and see whether a peaceful settlement is to be obtained, in which case the Republic offers kind treatment of Buddhism.

A telegram to the Daily Telegraph from St. Petersburg says that the Mongolian Ambassador visited General Jilinsky, Chief of the General Staff, and begged for further military assistance in organising the Mongolian forces against possible Chinese attack in the spring. At present there are two Russian officers in Urga, and the Ambassador asks for at least ten more, with a corresponding number of subalterns and instructors.

TÊTE À TÊTE

WE HAD written and telegraphed to the Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay several times in connection with the Ottoman Treasury Bonds, and failing to get an answer Mr. Mohamed Ali went to Bombay to settle matters finally with the Turkish authorities. It appeared that the Consul-General had forwarded all our communications to Turkey, but had not himself been favoured with a reply to his letters and telegrams. In the meantime, Dr. Ansari sent us a cable which was only so far intelligible that Turkey urgently needed money. We, therefore, cabled to him at some length, intimating that the success of the Bonds would largely depend on the resumption of hostilities and the constant supply of war news to India. We requested the Turkish authorities through him to have the lowest Bond of the value of Rs. 5 each, and inquired what final decision had been arrived at as to the total amount of the issue of Bonds, the rate of interest for such as took it, the period and instalments fixed for redemption, the source and amount of the revenue to be earmarked for the payment of interest and the repayment of the principal, and the agency in India selected for this purpose. We requested the Turkish authorities to send immediately some Bonds to the Consulate for sale to Banks which had received deposits from intending purchasers. The Consul-General also sent a cable recommending our suggestions and requesting for a detailed and immediate reply. We have not yet heard from Dr. Ansari, but we presume that the cable which the Consul General at Bombay has received is an answer to our requests and enquiries. It is intended to issue Bonds for five millions, bearing interest at 5 per cent. to be redeemed in five years, by annual instalments of a million each. The Turkish Government is shortly sending out a number of these Bonds to the Consul-General at Bombay, who would deliver them to the Banks against payment, and we are glad that the Ottoman Government has accepted our request that the value of some of these Bonds should be low enough for millions of poor Mussalmans to be able to take a share in the good loan. The lowest Bond will, therefore, be issued for half a sovereign which is equal to Rs. 7-8-0. One or two small matters have yet to be settled, but the Ottoman Government wishes the Banks to receive deposits in the meantime and issue provisional receipts. We trust many purchasers will come forward and remit deposits to the Alliance Bank of India at Delhi, which is prepared to effect purchases of these Bonds for an inclusive charge of two annas per cent., but with a minimum of two annas for each transaction. The Bank of Bengal has also agreed to undertake this at the same rate of commission, but with a minimum charge of one rupee for each transaction. We hope other banks will also take up this work, so that every purchaser may be free to purchase the Bonds through any bank he may like. We may, however, state that these Bonds have nothing whatever to do with those of the Orient Bank of Lahore which desires to obtain presumably a very large sum, without interest, and on the security of its own credit, repayable in ten years, with the promise that after a time it would negotiate with Turkey for lending her the money thus borrowed without interest, and with the option to the purchasers of its Bonds to recall their money if repaid earlier than after 10 years by the Turkish Government. It must be remembered that in this case it is the Bank's credit that will be a security and not the credit of Turkey, and in such cases naturally every purchaser would have to judge of the security from the paid-up capital of the Bank and the amount of money it wishes to borrow. Some time is also likely to elapse between the receipt of deposits by the Bank and its lending the same to Turkey, and, similarly, unless the money is recalled by the Bond-holder immediately when Turkey repays the money to the Bank, the Bank would receive the full benefit of the loan for five or more years without any profit to its Bond-holders in return. We wish to cast no reflections on the Orient Bank, but it is our plain duty to make things quite clear so that the people may choose the alternative which may appear to them safer and better in the light of the facts. We trust whatever the Mussalmans would do in the matter they would do it without delay. Indian Mussalmans showed no little anxiety when it was believed that Turkey was concluding peace on humiliating terms, and they showed their relief when Mahmoud Shevket Pasha came into power. The war has now been resumed, and it is no use crying over Bulgarian massacres and Servian atrocities, or condemning the Powers for thinking of coercion and ignoring the cruelty of the Allies. There is a time for everything, and the time has now come to prove the true inwardness and intensity of Moslem feeling in India by lending at least a crore and a half of rupees to Turkey. Are there not in the whole of India two million Mussalmans who will lend the small sum of Rs. 7-8-0 for the ransom of Islam, or a smaller number of people willing to lend more? As we go to press we have received a cable from the Committee of the Ottoman National Defence thanking us for what we have done for Turkey and appealing to us to "work with them still further for the defence of the prestige, honour and glory of Islam and the Ottoman Nation at this critical juncture." We know what we are, and we are sure that in appealing to us the Committee appeal to the millions of Mussalmans in this country in whose name we have often spoken. It is not we who can render any assistance to Turkey, but the many millions whom we represent.

THE annual meeting of the Aligarh College Trustees came off on the 26th January, and we regret that we were unable to note on the proceedings of the meeting in the last issue. The most gratifying feature of the meeting was that no less than 22 Trustees attended the meeting, and, although we must add that this is but a fifth of the total number of the Trustees, it is distinctly better than the absence of a quorum of seven which the late Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk had to deplore probably more than once during his régime. Nine of the 22 were non-resident Trustees, and five of these were Old Boys, some of whom had travelled long distances to attend the meeting. We must not, however, omit to mention that Khan Bahadur Khwaja Yusuf Shah had travelled from Amritsar in spite of increasing infirmity, and we only trust that after this no Trustee would put forward the excuse of indisposition when his absence from such meetings is in reality due to a disposition to avoid all trouble while securing all the honour accruing from a Trusteeship. Mr. Mohamed Ali proposed and Mr. Misbah-ul-Osman seconded a vote of thanks and congratulation to Nawab Ishaq Khan for his acceptance of the Secretaryship of the College to which he had been unanimously elected. The new Secretary read a speech of great force and ability, with which we shall deal later. He was thanked by Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami who was in the chair, and Mr. Haji Swalih Khan Sherwani presented Rs. 100 to the College in honour of the occasion. It was decided to perpetuate the memory of the late Moulvi Nazir Ahmed of Delhi, who was a Trustee of the College, by raising a fund and offering from its income a gold medal for an Urdu essay for which Aligarh undergraduates and post-graduate students could compete. This was the form suggested by Mr. Mohamed Ali who offered Rs. 100 for the purpose. Apparently the item round which most of the interest centred was the election of no less than nine Trustees. For these vacancies 18 names had been proposed, and Trustees had been flooded during the preceding five weeks with letters sent by and for the candidates, the least worthy of whom had perhaps tried the utmost to show the voters the number of "wounds" that they received in defence of the community and to recount their "services." The successful candidates were Mr. Ross Masood who secured 79 votes. Mr. Ibrani-Ahmed came next with 64; and Mr. Ibrahim followed him closely with 63, in his turn being hotly pursued by Mr. Seraj Ahmed with 62. Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim (60) was bracketed with Mr. Syed Wasir Hasan; and then came Mr. Shaikat Ali with 56, and at his heels Mr. Yakub with 55. Mr. Ahsan-ul-Haq brought up the rear with 48 votes. Of those who failed to get elected the most prominent were Mr. Masbar-ul-Haque who secured 44 votes, Mr. Zahur Ahmed of Allahabad (37) and the Editor of the Faiz Akbar (29). We are, indeed, extremely gratified that Mr. Ross Masood is not only elected a Trustee, but also heads the poll. We are sure that these votes reflect not only the goodwill but also the great talents and the benevolence which Mr. Masood has inherited, and we trust that before long his work as a Trustee of the College would be such that his own acquisitions would challenge comparison with his great heritage. It was his great ancestor to whom has been attributed the couplet:—

بَهِتَ الْقِيَمَتِ مَنْ قَوْلَ مَا آتَا
لَيْسَ الْقِيَمَتِ مَنْ قَوْلَ مَا كَانَتْ أَيْ

(Verily he is the hero who says: "Behold! I am such a one"; he is not the hero who says: "My father was one.") We are confident that the career of Mr. Ross Masood would fulfil the condition of greatness laid down by that hero of heroes, and his community and his College would acclaim him as worthy successor of his father and grandfather. Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim is one of those distinguished men who confer an honour upon any assembly that elects them as a member, and his election is an appreciation not merely of his great talents, but also of the quiet but sustained and fruitful work which he has been doing in the cause of Moslem education in Southern India. Mr. Wazir Hasan is a man of great ability who has already been honoured by the community in being selected to officiate as the Honorary Secretary of the All-India Moslem League, and we trust that his exacting profession will permit him to devote to his duties as a Trustee as much time and attention as he desires to do. Mr. Shankat Ali comes back into the fold after an interval of many years spent in the service of his Alma Mater in a manner which should be an example to many who never left the fold as well as to those who aspire to enter it. But his success is chiefly useful in illustrating the value of discontent which never degenerates into disgust, but spurs one on to action and is satisfied with nothing short of the attainment of the ideal. We hope his optimism would be infectious to such of the Old Boys as ignore the fact, that one can combine work for the good with railing at the evil. We should, however, like to know who Mr. Ibrahim is, and what he has done to make the Trustees so desirous of including him among those who must be consulted in the settlement of the educational policy of one of the greatest colleges in India. If we are not mistaken he is the Wazir of Khairpur, and one of the first acts of his régime is the stoppage of the annual grant to the College. If this deserves an election as a Trustee of that institution, let us hope His Excellency Salar Jung III will never deserve to be a Trustee of the College. What would happen if the poet's prophecy was fulfilled?

صبر تو جب می کہ جنت میں نہ جانی پائی

(The recluse has been worshipping for the sake of the houri. What a fun if he is not allowed to enter heaven!!) We much regret that Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque should have just missed an election this year; but we are confident that his love for his community and his devotion to the cause of education will suffer no diminution, and that he will prove to the Trustees of the College that one can work outside the house as well as in it. Before the meeting was adjourned Mr. Mohamed Ali drew the attention of the Trustees to the alarm evidently felt by some officials, including the Patron of the College, as regards the excitement which was said to prevail among students of the College, and requested the Honorary Secretary to inquire into its extent and character, unless the Trustees were assured on the subject by the Joint Honorary Secretary who had been officiating recently as Secretary of the Trustees. On this Nawab Musawwir-ullah Khan Bahadur gave the clearest possible assurance that the feeling among the students was both healthy and natural, and that this opinion was shared by the Principal of the College. After the appointment of a small sub-committee for the purpose of expressing its opinion on the subject of the Public Services, which the Local Government desire to communicate to the Royal Commission, but which it was not possible to refer to the general body of Trustees within the time allowed by the Local Government, the meeting was adjourned.

ALTHOUGH it is gratifying to see that the number of new subscribers to the Comrade has steadily increased since its transfer to Delhi, the net growth in its circulation has been comparatively small, inasmuch as 682 names have had to be removed since October last as defaulters. The amount of the arrears thus accumulated is Rs 3,734-4-0, which represents a dead loss to the proprietor. Even if he possessed the wealth of Croesus the proprietor could not view this loss with equanimity. But in this enterprise his sole asset has been his trust in the support and goodwill of those for whose service the Comrade was launched into existence. A loss such as this is manifestly beyond his utmost resources to bear; and, if he is to be perpetually harassed with the problem of realising his dues, we are afraid he may some day find his self-imposed task a little too heavy even for his capacious shoulders and may have to give up the struggle in despair. It would be ungrateful not to recognise the spontaneous services of many of our readers but for whose sympathy and ready help the Comrade could not have risen to the position it holds to-day. And we are confident we can count on that sympathy and help as much now as at any time in the past. Our only complaint is that we should have to be put to great financial embarrassments through the indifference of some of our readers whom we have been serving at so much expense and who never refused to support the Comrade until it reached them in the shape of a V.P. All we need say is that it is hardly fair. It would be a long and wearisome story to detail the heavy expenses we have lately had to incur. The setting up of a new press of our own in Delhi has been an extraordinarily costly affair; and though money has been ungrudgingly spent we have hardly yet reached the end of our troubles, chiefly because Delhi can not adequately supply our needs. Then, again, the anxious times through which the Moslem world has been passing, have enormously increased our labours and added to our expenses a good deal. The collection of the Turkish Relief Fund alone has been a great task in itself, requiring the services of a large clerical staff. Indeed, the state of things in Turkey has claimed much of our time and efforts and we readily confess we have, in consequence, been obliged to neglect the Comrade editorially for some time past. Several complaints have reached us on this account and we plead guilty to the charge. Our only excuse has been that we found ourself face to face with a more imperious call and we consider our duty in this respect has been much more important and urgent than journalism. However, we hope we will soon be able to make ample amends for our recent shortcomings and try to remove the just complaints of our readers. We also expect that the subscribers of the Comrade will do their duty. We trust those whose names have been struck off the list will pay up their arrears and will not leave the Comrade under a heavy financial burden. It is difficult to imagine that they will refuse to discharge their obligations, even if they do not continue to subscribe for the paper which was never started with any idea of commercial gain.

WE HAVE noticed with great anxiety and regret that the enthusiasm of the Indian Moslems to send help to Turkey has waned since the Peace negotiations were begun in London. As would appear from the weekly announcements in the Comrade, contributions to the Turkish Relief Fund have been steadily diminishing every week, and we confess we could not regard this as creditable either to the sense of duty of the Mussalmans or their appreciation of the immense need for relief to their suffering brethren in Turkey. Now, however, that the war has been resumed, we trust Moslem enthusiasm in India will revive in full vigour. It is needless to detail the amount of suffering already existing in Turkey—with thousands of families left desolate and thousands of refugees, mostly women and children, who have been driven from their homes and have lost their all, wandering helplessly about without food, without clothes, without shelter. The resumption of hostilities will enormously add to the appalling mass of existing misery, suffering and destitution, and the need for immediate and extensive help has increased tenfold. There was a general feeling amongst the Indian Moslems that the Turks should not submit to a humiliating peace. Well, they have not submitted, and consequently the war has broken out afresh. We trust the Indian Mussalmans realise fully what this war has hitherto meant and would mean again and the enormous difficulties under which Turkey has to carry on the struggle. If they are precluded from actively sharing in the stress and burden of the struggle, they would not surely be indifferent to the sufferings of its victims. It has been possible through the help of the Indian Moslems to send a well-equipped Medical Mission to Turkey. Dr. Ansari has informed us by a cable that the field-hospital of the Mission has been attached to the 2nd Division of the army at Tchataldja. The Mission has a heavy task before it. We trust enough funds will be forthcoming to enable it to do its work effectively and thoroughly. We hope the Indian Moslems will rise equal to the needs of the occasion and prove that their sense of duty to Islam is not dead and that they possess the capacity for a sustained effort in a noble cause.

When the Balkan States declared war on Turkey, they professed to have been moved by the sufferings of their oppressed Christian brethren under the Turkish yoke. The course of events since the beginning of the war has demonstrated only too clearly how far those professions were genuine and true. Territorial aggrandisement was the real motive of the Balkan aggression, and it was admirably hid under the facile and catching cries of freedom and justice. All the vital prejudices of Christian Europe against the Turk were thus astutely exploited to the full. "Freedom" and "Justice" have been achieved through rapine and slaughter. Thousands of innocent Moslems and Jews have been massacred. Neither age nor sex has been spared. Entire villages have been burnt and the era of "Liberty" has been ushered by forcibly converting Moslems to Christianity. These horrors have been wrought with a set purpose and a method and in the full glare of publicity, and civilised Europe has not moved a muscle. Every interested schemer, faddist, liberty-monger and sentimental quack in Europe had long ago prepared the theatre for these shambles. Every rebellion that Turkey had to put down before the war had been due to foreign incitements. Europe had been responsible for the chronic state of ferment and agitation in her European provinces.

Incitements.

The Christian races knew they had loud and gushing friends abroad. They were consequently encouraged to revolt and render peaceful government impossible, for they were confident of European sympathy in their unruly behaviour and systematic defiance of the law. Acts of lawlessness, pillage and murderous outrages committed by these savages were freely baptised as valiant efforts for freedom. Whenever Turkish Government tried to deal with them as they deserved a storm of indignation would burst forth in Europe and the Turk would be denounced as "unspeakable." The methods of the Balkan Allies have at last exposed the heart of the Balkan problem in its true nakedness. But we doubt if Europe would still be willing to talk less morality at the expense of the Turk. All we know is that the old prejudices are still as vigorous as ever, and canting busybodies are stirring up fresh agitations amongst the Christians of Turkey in Asia. The Syrian Christians have been suddenly discovered to be groaning under heavy wrongs. The woes of Armenia are being loudly echoed throughout Europe. The Muscovite, whose administration of Poland and Finland is the scandal of modern times and from whose iron heels thousands of Armenian refugees have been seeking deliverance by migration into Turkey, is ready to stand forth as the champion of Armenia. An 'organised agitation for Armenian autonomy is being carried on in the European press, and the Powers are being exhorted to settle the Armenian question once and for all. Only a short time ago there was no such thing as an Armenian Question. With the inauguration of the new constitutional régime in Turkey the Armenian grievances were declared to have, if not wholly, at least enormously, disappeared. The Armenians were supposed to be living quite happy and contented without any fear of oppression and abuse. The Balkan crisis has offered rare opportunities to the enemies of Turkey to incite her Christian subjects in Asia to revolt. The methods are plain enough. The ends are unmistakable. If the Powers would refrain from profiting by the existing situation, it would not surely be on account of their excessive love of altruism or any chivalric regard for Turkey.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian recently remarked that amazement was expressed by those most closely in touch with Persian affairs about a leading article in the Times where the idea of an expedition to occupy

South Persia, and bring the British frontiers up to the Russian limits, was gravely put forward as an issue of the immediate future. After all that has happened, it is difficult to imagine that there should have been any room for amazement. The British Foreign policy in Persia has all along been one of subservience and drift. Each successive surrender to the Muscovite will was inevitably leading up to "the issue of the immediate future," put forward by the Times. Now that Russia is firmly established in Northern Persia, the successor of Mr. Sluister is the Muscovite tool, the Majlis is dead and the ex-Shah and his brother are being supported in their intrigues over the border, the time is an ideal one to declare that the Persians are unfit to govern their own country. To divide it up at last would seem to be the simplest solution. All this had been clearly foreseen. The Times leader is merely an indication of the final step that the British Foreign Office may have decided to take in regard to the situation. The ostensible ground for such a radical and grave departure would, of course, be the unsatisfactory condition of things in Southern Persia. Those having trade dealings with Persia report that the disorder is much exaggerated; and as to Russia's restorative work in the North, a recent visitor there reports that the taxes, which are largely paid in kind, are not collected, but the crops are allowed to rot or be used by the landowners, and that nothing is coming in to the Central Government to allow it to pay for military assistances to keep order. The necessary loan for which the Persian Government has been appealing for the whole year past has not been advanced, nor is it allowed to raise money in foreign markets. According to a Reuter's message from Teheran, the Foreign Minister called on Sir W. Townley, the British Minister, and discussed with him the situation in Southern Persia. He said that the Government was sincerely anxious to improve the conditions on the trade routes, but its efforts were paralysed by the state of Persian finances. But the question is: Will the Persian Government be allowed the loan it sorely needs for urgent administrative reforms? Or will the country be practically split up into "Protectorates" on the familiar pretence that it has become a prey to chronic disorder? We yet hope the Government of India will be strong enough to dissuade the Imperial Government from a false step, so alluring at sight, but fraught with untold consequences. In this melancholy muddle about Persia, all that Sir Edward Grey has been able to do has been to sit still and think nervously while the Muscovite has been boldly carrying out his designs. Is the issue still within the grasp of Sir Edward Grey?

The Comrade.

Turkey and the "Times."

We waited for a letter from Dr Ansari with the hope that it might give a detailed and reliable account of the coup d'état, but the letter received from him with the English Mail was posted on the 20th January and naturally it contains no account of the events that took place three days later. Nor do the Turkish papers received to-day contain any such account as evidently the mail left Constantinople on the 23rd January. But the English mail has brought the morning papers of the 24th January which contain the earliest news of these events published in England. It is curious, however, that while Reuter's Constantinople correspondent wires on the 23rd that "a crowd drawn from all classes of the proletariat has declared for war" and mentions "a tremendous ovation which was renewed with even greater frenzy" which was accorded to Enver Bey, and states that the crowd's "enthusiasm was kept at fever pitch by fervent addresses," the Times correspondent gives one the impression that everything was carried out in the quietest possible manner. We give below the account supplied to the Times by its Constantinople correspondent, and if it is the correct version of what took place, then, indeed, the coup d'état of Enver Bey was an even more remarkable event than we have been led to believe. It is curious that the papers of the 24th January do not mention anything about the sad death of Nazim Pasha, although some of Reuter's telegrams were despatched after 11 p.m., while practically everything was over by 8 p.m. The Times correspondent wrote as follows.—

"The Government has been overthrown by a cleverly organized coup d'état. This morning at 11 o'clock Talaat Bey called on the Grand Vizier and urged him to resign. Kiazim Pasha refused to answer him. The Cabinet Council continued to occupy itself with the draft reply to the Collective Note till about 2, when Ministers took lunch.

"Shortly before 3 Djemal Bey, ex-Vali of Adana and Baghdad, appeared before the Porte accompanied by five officers on horseback. A dozen persons suddenly issued from a café in a side street and unfurled a flag. More individuals appeared round every corner and in a few minutes some 200 people had collected. Next appeared Enver Bey, mounted on a white horse and accompanied by Kiazim Bey, Halil Bey, his uncle, both of the General Staff, and four or five other officers. The crowd cheered him, and he rode into the Porte, dismounted at the steps, and entered the hall accompanied by his suite. There he asked to see the Grand Vizier. The doors were immediately shut. Memdukin Pasha, Commandant of Constantinople, stood at the door, and would let no man enter.

"Enver, followed by Talaat, entered the Council room. He informed the Cabinet that the nation would not endure the loss of Adrianople and the Ministry must resign. Kiazim Pasha wrote out his resignation and handed it to Enver, who left the Porte, entered a motor-car, and drove to the Palace.

"The Sultan was at first incredulous and sent his First Chamberlain and First Secretary back to the Porte to see whether Enver's news was true. At the Porte the Grand Vizier again wrote out his resignation, which he handed to Ali Fuad Bey, First Secretary, who returned to the Sultan and immediately sent for Mahmud Shevket Pasha. A crowd of several hundred persons, including a number of officers, watched them impassively.

"At 8 o'clock in the evening Mahmud Shevket Pasha, accompanied by the First Secretary, Ali Fuad Bey, and Enver Bey, arrived at the Porte. Ali Fuad read the Imperial iradeh from the steps. Its terms were as follows:—

"My Vizier Mahmud Shevket Pasha.—In consequence of the resignation of Kiazim Pasha and the situation of the country it is necessary to hand over the government of the country to experienced hands. I perceive that you possess experienced hands, I perceive that you possess the necessary qualities, and, naming you Marshal and Vizier, I appoint you Grand Vizier. To-morrow we shall choose a person fit for the office of Sheikh-ul-Islam. You will strive to present a list of colleagues for my approbation to-morrow. God grant success to your efforts!"

"Mahir Effendi, ex-Deputy for Kastamuni, uttered a prayer. Mahmud Shevket Pasha made a brief speech, saying he would do his utmost to save the Fatherland, but would need the entire support of the nation to this end. He then ordered "all and sundry to disperse, which they did.

"The Minister for Foreign Affairs had two hours' conversation with Talaat Bey, after which he despatched a telegram to the Ottoman Ambassadors announcing the change of Cabinet and stating that all was quiet in the capital. After this he was allowed to return home, as was Damad Sherif, Minister of Education.

"Enver Bey is made Commandant of the Palace, and Talaat Bey is acting Minister of the Interior, while Izzet Pasha is provisionally Generalissimo."

It is difficult to reconcile a crowd of some 200 people collected before the Porte and watching the proceedings impassively with the account supplied by Reuter's correspondent, and still more difficult to reconcile the impassive appearance of a small crowd with the tame acquiescence of Kiamil Pasha when Enver Bey and Talaat Bey entered the Council room and demanded his resignation. But the most difficult thing to reconcile with the whole coup d'état is the incoherent letter of the Times correspondent wired from Constantinople only a day before, in which he seems to gloat over the submission of Kiamil's Cabinet to the Powers and which he ends with the remark that "the town is quiet to-night, and it is believed that the public has resigned itself to the inevitable and will accept peace without demur." Times change, but we suppose the Constantinople correspondent of the Times found it difficult to change with them, and, therefore, made a vain effort in his letter of the 28th January to justify his belief of the 22nd in the resignation of the public to the inevitable. However, he was not so very wrong in his predictions. There was certainly a resignation on the 23rd, but it happened to be not the public but Kiamil who resigned himself to the inevitable—and to Enver Bey. We have every reason to rejoice at the coup d'état, but even if we had no other reason to do so, it would have been sufficient for us to rejoice that a Times correspondent had sent a despatch only a few hours before the coup d'état, proving himself unmistakably to be a person whose reading of the popular mind on the 22nd January was palpably and grossly defective, even if his description of popular feeling on the 28th was not equally palpably and grossly false.

The Times in a leading article writes a doleful obituary of the Kiamil Cabinet, and we may be sure that this political Hic jacet is one of those posthumous praises which could be freely rendered into English as "here are lies." What is, however, most deplorable is that the Times too has failed to grasp the true inwardness of its Constantinople correspondent's account of the demonstration of a small and impassive crowd. It writes:—

In a European State the return of the war party to power with a policy such as Talaat Bey has proclaimed could have but one meaning and but one result. It would involve the speedy rupture of the negotiations and the resumption of the war. It would signify that the country had resolved in desperation to stake her existence upon the issue and that the Powers must contemplate the eventuality with which her dissolution would confront them. But, happily for Turkey and for mankind, these consequences do not follow from the change of Ministry in Constantinople with the necessity with which they follow a like event in one of the great capitals of Europe. The sudden substitution of Mahmoud Shevket and his associates for the Kiamil Administration merely means that one more intrigue has been for the moment successful. It need not imply that any great wave of opinion or of passion has swept over the nation. The strong probabilities are, indeed, that neither opinion nor feeling has undergone any change. Very likely it represents nothing more than a mere shifting of the pieces, which may be reversed as unexpectedly as it was effected.

To see the words of the Times, happily for Turkey and for mankind, the Times is once more wrong in its prophesies as in its chronicle of events, and the sudden substitution of Mahmoud Shevket and his associates for the Kiamil Administration has involved the speedy rupture of the negotiations and the resumption of the war. It also means that, despite the Times correspondent who had done everything to throw dust in the eyes of the world about the feelings of the Turks towards Kiamil's Cabinet, a great wave of opinion and of a righteous passion worthy of a nation of fighters has swept over the nation, which has put an end to a great political intrigue which had brought Kiamil once more into power. If any doubt existed about the prejudiced view of the Times, it is entirely removed by the opinion expressed by the Times about the Committee of Union and Progress in this article. Are we to believe that it was not this party, but Kiamil or his "friends," who had given to Turkey a Constitution and removed from the throne a despot for whom the Times had never a good word to say as long as he was the master of the Ottoman nation's destinies? Were these not the "first achievements" of this organisation, and are they to count as nothing against the "first achievement of the organization which had now driven Kiamil Pasha from office without any semblance of constitutional procedure," viz., "to cause the first Chamber to overthrow him unheard, just a month after they have given him an overwhelming vote of confidence"? Was it not this very "secret and irresponsible organisation which is answerable for the ruin" of Turkey, according to the Times, which ended a degrading despotism and for the first time set itself to apply the resources of the country to its proper defence, husbanding them so carefully as to double the revenue of the State in three years? Is it a fact that "the present state of the army is the monument of the new Grand Vizier's efficiency in his own profession, as the plight of Macedonia is the proof of Talaat's statesmanship and of the respect which he himself paid in office to the 'sacred rights of the people'"? Was it Shevket Pasha who supplied to the army, fighting for the honour and the very existence of its Fatherland, cannon balls made of wood which were to be used only in harmless manoeuvres? Again was it Mahmoud Shevket who hurried the nation into a declaration of war before the army had been properly mobilised, and was it he who sent soldiers to fight the foe after a fatiguing march in drenching rain on a stomach that had fasted for four days? As for Talaat Bey, it is enough to say that even if he had been an archangel come from heaven to pacify Macedonia, he would have failed, because the enemies of Turkey, including the Press of England and the London Times, were ever ready to stir up Christian subjects of the Sultan against a Muhammadan ruler. For the maintenance of the "sacred rights of the people in Turkey" it was essential that the Turks should ever keep that key bright and shining which had unlocked the gate of Christianity in Eastern Europe for the entry of Islam. That was the sword of the Osmanli, and in order to appreciate the work of Mahmoud Shevket in this connection it cannot be the Times which is to be our guide, but a writer like M. Chateaubriand, who contributed to the Edinburgh Review, more than a year ago, a very informing article on the army that Mahmoud Shevket was forging for the defence of his country.

Whatever be the final result of the war for the nation, which has already been weakened by a senseless and cruel armistice no less than by the war which was mismanaged by the Kiamil clique, to-day Enver Bey's coup d'état is like the intervention of Cromwell and his Ironsides in the politics of England, and we trust that the Ironsides of Turkey will yet receive the indications of many a crowning mercy from heaven. But such a comparison should not impress the Times at all, for had the Thunderer been in existence at the time of Charles the Martyr and the Roundhead Regicides, it would have said of the Great Rebellion that it "merely means that one more intrigue has been for the moment successful," and that "very likely it represents nothing more than a mere shifting of the pieces which may be reversed as unexpectedly as it was effected." But we wonder whether even the Times could have referred to the Stuart monarch as it does to Kiamil as a "politician of very exceptional experience," who thought that "the best way of permanently silencing the clamour" of his enemies was "to bring them into immediate contact with the facts, in the conviction that they would be obliged presently to retire," and that "it is just conceivable that he may have made way for them without excessive regret." In one respect, indeed, the parallel is complete. Nothing in office became Kiamil so well as the leaving of it, and the regret of every friend of Turkey must be that so brave and good a man as Nazim Pasha should have met with the fate which Kiamil had eminently deserved. It would, however, be a sacrilege if he should share with Nazim Pasha such a fate when he alone deserved it, and in our estimation it is better that he should live to suffer the pangs of conscience, if he has one, in witnessing the evil consequences of his action and policy, or, if his nation succeeds in extricating itself from the meshes of his network, live to repent the sins, not of rash and headless youth and manhood, but of calculating old age and servile senility.

The Times does not openly suggest to the Powers to coerce Turkey, but it encourages the Balkan States in their unwillingness to accept the very moderate terms of the Turkey remarks such as the one where it says "we cannot expect the Allies to exhibit unlimited patience," and suggests clearly enough that so long as the Powers are united they would back the Allies. But other papers clearly indicate that the Powers may coerce Turkey and desire them to do so. The Nation says that "this sudden change means, presumably, the defeat of peace at the last moment, and a choice before the Powers of a resumption of the war or international coercion. If Russia has threatened, she will now presumably act, and it seems highly inexpedient to allow her to act alone." The Manchester Guardian says: "The project of a naval demonstration by the Powers, such as the Allies desired from the first, will, no doubt, again be revived, and this time may be accepted..... On the union of the Powers, on the patience of the Allies, and on the fall of Adrianople our hopes of peace will hang, and, as we still think, hang fairly securely." We should like to know if the Times of India still considers itself to have been just to the Moslem League Council—and to Reuter—in rebuking Moslem politicians for losing their balance merely on account of "a bazar gup." For our part we hang our faith on the sense of justice and fairplay, and at least on the consistency of the British Government, and, failing even that, on the union of the Mussalmans and the Turks, and on their patience, and, in the last resort, on the God of battles who wrought the miracle of Badr, and we still think our hopes hang even more securely than those of our contemporary. The end is neither in our hands nor in those of the Turks. It rests with God.

The End of the Armistice.

AFTER the extremely moderate and conciliatory reply of Turkey to the Powers' Note, it was generally felt that the war would not be so precipitately resumed. Opinion was expressed in responsible diplomatic quarters that the reply furnished adequate basis for the resumption of the Peace negotiations. It was even reported that Germany and some of the other Great Powers had advised Bulgaria to give up her uncompromising attitude and proceed to seek an enduring basis of settlement in a more conciliatory spirit. Yet Bulgaria has chosen otherwise; and after two months of truce, the war between Turkey and the Allies has broken out again. Apart from the dispute about the future of the Aegean islands whose fate cannot be settled without the consent of the Powers, the Peace Conference has split solely on the question of Adrianople. The Turks were even willing to cede a part of the city to Bulgaria, themselves retaining the other part in which their historical monuments and holy places are situated. The Allies have, however, decided to go to war again rather than agree to the Turkish offer for compromise. No one can say that the decision is a light one, and it is difficult to imagine that it could have been lightly arrived at. The Allies may be confident of victory, but they cannot have been insensible of the appalling cost at which alone it can be purchased. They are almost at the end of their resources in men and money, even though their past successes may have kept the enthusiasm of their armies at fever-heat. They have little hope of being able to force the Tchataldja position and march on Constantinople. The utmost that they can achieve is to reduce Janina, Scutari and Adrianople to surrender by siege or assault. Would this achievement be worth the heavy price they would have to pay in blood and treasure? And then, the possibility of the Turkish Army making a heroic effort to assume the offensive and retrieving its earlier disasters in Thrace cannot be lightly set aside. In view of these considerations the decision of the Allies may justly appear a little puzzling, and one may well question if there is not more in it than meets the eye. Bulgaria may be coveting Adrianople because she professes to have been deeply impressed with its supreme strategic importance to her future frontiers. But this could have hardly been her sole driving motive to resume the hostilities. It was early suggested that the place could be made innocuous by dismantling the forts, and the Turks were reported to have acquiesced in the suggestion. The future possession of Scutari and Janina has long since become a question for the Powers to decide. So is the question about the future of the islands. Is it, then, possible that the Allies are playing for some bigger stakes? If the Muscovite is not pulling the strings once more, it is difficult to clearly see the objectives on which the Allies have set their hearts. Perhaps Bulgaria dreams of a much bigger territory including the whole of Thrace. Montenegro and Greece may have deemed it necessary to strengthen their respective pretensions by acquiring the actual possession of the places they covet.

Whatever may be the motives of the Allies, they and their active patrons among the Powers are responsible for the blood that will be spilled afresh, and the havoc and appalling misery that will be wrought again. The war enters on its second and last phase and no one can foresee the consequences to which it may lead. It may prove to be a sharp, swift struggle ending with the fall of Adrianople. It may, on the other hand, give the one chance to the Turkish army to vindicate its prowess and, by victoriously sweeping the Bulgarians out of Thrace, to recover some parts of Turkey's lost European possessions. Possibly it may lead to a general European war and cause new shocks to the Ottoman Empire in Asia. On it may eventually cost Turkey her capital. The possibilities of this fateful and unique struggle are varied and unlimited, and it would be futile to speculate about them. The vital fact with which we are most immediately concerned is that Turkey has been spared an abject surrender and a humiliating peace. She has got her last chance to retrieve her fortune by a brilliant victory or to die a glorious death.

The military situation is for the time being plain enough and requires no detailed analysis. The Bulgarians have concentrated their efforts on Adrianople and will try to secure its surrender as soon as possible. They are reported to have withdrawn their forces from Tchataldja to Tchorlu, not only because they have little hope of carrying the position by assault, but perhaps because they apprehend an attack on their flank from the rear by a Turkish force that may be landed on the coast of the Black Sea from Asia Minor. It is possible that the retreat may be a mere feint intended to draw the Turks out of the Tchataldja lines. Obviously enough, the Bulgarians would try to contain the Turkish forces at Tchataldja and prevent them from assuming a vigorous offensive. The Allies' forces operating in the small, narrow peninsula of Gallipoli, which commands the entrance to the Dardanelles, are not known to be in large strength. The Turks have strongly fortified all the strategic positions in the peninsula and massed considerable troops there for the defence of the Straits, and any attempt to force the Dardanelles by attacking it from the land side with the object of clearing the way for a final attack on Constantinople will have to overcome formidable obstacles before it can be successful. The centre of interest is for the present the defence of Adrianople. The Ottoman garrison has so far stood its ground with glorious courage and may be trusted to hold out to the last. The only question that will probably decide its fate is that of food. If the garrison is adequately supplied with rations for some weeks, the Bulgarian assault has little chance of speedy success. But the defence of Adrianople, however prolonged and heroic it may be, will be ultimately useless and ineffectual unless the main Turkish army at Tchataldja beats back the Bulgarians in front and marches quickly up to the relief of the citadel. Adrianople can not hold out indefinitely, for the simple reason that its food supply must some day be entirely exhausted. The obvious duty of the Turkish Commander-in-Chief is, therefore, to assume the offensive and give battle to the Bulgarians in the open field. His only chance lies in an offensive strategy. The Allies have, of course, the clearest grasp of the situation and we may naturally expect them to try to create a serious diversion by an attack on the Turkish positions in Gallipoli and on the Dardanelles with a view to tie up the main Turkish Army at Tchataldja. The rival strategies of the belligerents will take a few days more to develop in outline, and till then it would obviously be a futile undertaking to calculate their respective chances. The strength of the rival forces in different parts of the theatre of war, their composition, equipment and efficiency should also be definitely known for all calculations of this kind. But though it is difficult at present to calculate the chances of this struggle, we may be sure that the Turkish Army will give a good account of itself and will try to wipe off the stain of its early disasters. Its leaders are full of patriotic ardour and will recoil from no sacrifice to save the honour of their country. There is every hope that they will successfully defend the great and righteous cause which they are privileged to defend in this supreme crisis in the history of their nation and their faith. If they fail, we are sure it will be only after they have spent the last drop of their blood on the field of battle.

When the war began in September last we had hoped that the Great Powers would remain neutral and would keep the ring fairly. That hope was not wholly realised. The need for absolute neutrality on the part of the Powers is even greater to-day, and we trust they will refrain from any threats of intervention and aggression to paralyse the efforts of the Turks. They equally share with the Allies the responsibility involved in the resumption of the war. Common fairness demands that the Turks should be left free from all diplomatic embarrassments in their endeavours to defend their interests. They have been carrying on a life and death struggle against heavy odds, and they now demand nothing but absolute freedom to finish it one way or the other. If they have not deserved a single friend in Europe in their hour of need, surely they have done nothing to deserve gratuitous enemies. The Vossische Zeitung, commenting on the diplomatic situation, draws attention to the shameful treatment accorded to Turkey by Europe in her recent troubles and makes some very pertinent and candid observations. "What do the poor Moslems think of Europe?" it asks. It is known to everybody that before the war the Powers warned the Balkan States that they would not permit any change of frontiers. This was the famous status quo, which it was forbidden to touch. Nevertheless, the status quo was killed by the accomplished fact. The Powers bowed before the accomplished fact, and invented a new formula in the shape of the principle that the fruits of victory must not be taken away from the victors. But the Powers have proceeded beyond even this principle, inasmuch as they made representations at the Porte in order to induce it to abandon Adrianople. It means that the fruits which have not fallen to the victors should also be yielded to them at the will of the Powers. We do not know what the future has in store. But we hope Turkey will not bow to the will of Europe.

The All-India Medical Mission.

We publish below another of the series of letters that we have been receiving from Dr. Ansari:—

Kadirgah Hospital, Stamboul, 14th Jan 1918.

I mentioned in my last letter to you an interview with Khalida Khanem (Madame Saleh). She belongs to the Party of Union and Progress and is a very active worker, not only politically, but in almost every sphere of activity, for the benefit of Turkey. She used to write almost daily in the Tanin when the paper was being published, and has written to many of the leading French and German papers as well as in the Manchester Guardian and for the Jeune Turc. She is considered one of the leading lights of the Party of Union and Progress, a silent, though very effective, power working behind the scenes. I considered myself very fortunate in having met her as she will be very useful. I have persuaded her to become a contributor to the Comrade as soon as she returns from the German Hospital where she has been advised to go for a rest cure, having worked very hard during the war in helping the organisations for the sick and wounded and the widows and orphans. She hoped one day very soon, after this crisis was over, to visit India and deliver a series of lectures in different Muhammadan centres to give correct ideas about Turkey and her people to the Muhammadan public in India. Unfortunately I have not been able to see her again, but I hope to do so before our hospital is established in Omarli. I think Madame Saleh will be an additional attraction as a contributor for the Comrade, if any attraction is necessary at all.

I have received by this mail copies of letters addressed to you by Mr. Ameer Ali together with a detailed list of all the articles supplied for our field-hospital by Messrs. Maw, Son & Sons. I have already informed you of the receipt of 252 packages, but a further supply was received last Wednesday numbering 69 (?) in all. This brings the total number of packages to 311; and when the remaining 19 packages will be received, the number would come to 330.

Jan. 9.

Except a visit from Shaikh Abdul Aziz Chawish to our hospital nothing of importance took place on this day. Shaikh Chawish is a very impressive man who chooses every word before uttering it. He talked to us about things in general, mostly weather, and then departed, after giving an invitation to some of the members to be at his house the next day where Enver Dey, Mahmud Shoyket Pasha and several other prominent members of the Party of Union and Progress were expected. I could not accept his invitation, but several men from the Mission went to his house and spent a very pleasant afternoon, although they were rather disappointed owing to the absence of the Young Turkish leaders. Dr. Asad Pasha, a very famous Turkish Ophthalmic Surgeon of European reputation, was present at the tea and made some pregnant remarks regarding the condition of Turkey and the Moslem world in general. Our Manager replied and made a great impression on those present by his weighty words! I should have loved to be present there, but I was unavoidably absent.

Jan 10

Whilst our friends were having tea at Shaikh Chawish's house, I went to see the Persian Ambassador with a few members. His Excellency was very very nice to us, gave us some cigarettes and Persian tea and talked to us for quite a long time. He understood English but spoke in Persian. The First Attaché to the Embassy spoke English very fluently, and discussed in a very animated fashion the causes of the gradual decay of Islam. He took the view of Mr. Garvin that the great cause of decay was to be found in the backward conditions of Moslem women both mentally and physically, and the only way to salvation lay in the emancipation of women. His Excellency intelligently followed the discussion and gave his approval to what his Attaché expressed to us. There is no doubt that the events in Turkey and Persia seem to have impressed deeply the mind of all the Moslem world and they are beginning to realise, though, alas! very late, that unless they improve themselves at once they will lose all they possess and be a subject race for ever.

Jan. 11.

I paid a visit to His Excellency Sir Gerard Lowther, the British Ambassador, accompanied by my cousin, and found him, to my intense pleasure, a perfectly amiable English gentleman. He offered us cigarettes and sat down for over half an hour for what appeared a friendly chat in a private drawing-room. I inquired after Lord Hardinge and was told that he was convalescent and progressing very satisfactorily. It seems Sir Gerard Lowther and Lord Hardinge are personal friends and have spent several years together at the Turkish Embassy. His Excellency was interested in the Mission and inquired about the members of the Mission, our hospital equipment and the place where we were going to fix our hospital. He asked me to always rely on his ready help whenever we were in need of it. After thanking him for his previous kindness and his promise for the future, we returned well satisfied with our visit.

In the afternoon some twelve members of the Mission went with me to Haider Pasha, a place across the Bosphorus in Scutari, the Asiatic portion of Constantinople. We went there in a boat and saw on our landing there the magnificent railway station which is the terminus of the line running between Constantinople and Aleppo. I have not seen any railway station either in Europe or in India which can come anywhere near it. We visited the Military Medical College and Hospital. Aziz Pasha, the chief of the hospital, was exceedingly courteous and took us round this magnificent hospital where we saw 1,000 Turkish soldiers being nursed and looked after. The wards were clean, paved with glazed tiles, and furnished with modern iron beds. The sheets, pillow cases and towels were clean; the blankets were thick and warm; and altogether there was nothing lacking to make the patients comfortable and cheerful during their stay in the hospital. All the patients in this building were medical cases and numbered 1,000. This hospital would compare favourably with any European hospital, and it was certainly much cleaner than the hospitals one sees in France and Italy. The building itself is very stately and, being situated on the shores of the Bosphorus, commands a beautiful view with plenty of pure ozonic air and sunshine. The next building, which is made of solid stone with very fine carvings, was the Army Medical College itself. At present this is also used for patients numbering 650 to 750. The building across the road facing it is devoted entirely to surgical cases. The entire interior of this building, the floor, walls and ceiling of the corridors and the wards are tiled with glazed tiles. There are small wards for one or two patients and large wards for 100 patients. The arrangements here were absolutely perfect. Everything was scrupulously clean, and I can assure you there are not many places in London, Berlin, Vienna or Paris which can boast of a hospital like this. The hospital has a most modern operating theatre and X-Ray department, and a staff of surgeons, assistant surgeons, sisters and nurses who are quite up-to-date. I was shown a patient who had an operation performed on his head following a bullet wound and the result was ideal. I was told on enquiry that the staff consisted of teachers and professors of European fame, and they turned out 100 to 120 army medical men every year. From what follows, when describing the hospitals at Hademkui, Omarli and San Stefano, you would see that not only the general Press of Europe was full of a series of calumnies and false reports about the Turkish organisation, but even the medical Press was affected by this religious bigotry and fanaticism, and stated facts about the medical organisation which on examination one finds altogether incorrect and exaggerated. I do not mean by this that there is no room for assistance in this present unusual situation. It is bound to affect even the best organised country. But what I maintain is that the assistance needed is not true to the extent that it is represented nor any more than any other European Power would require at the time of war. The story of the Turkish wounded being left in thousands on the battle-field to die in a tissue of malignant lies which is obvious to even a casual observer who visits the hospitals and sees for himself the number of major operations performed on the patients with results which even the best surgeons of Europe would be proud of. It may be of interest, by way of comparison, to mention here that the results of the German Red Cross Hospitals, the British Red Crescent Hospital sent by Mr. Anir Ali and the French Red Cross Hospital have been very unsatisfactory, whether due to the lack of skill or interest of the doctors sent in these Missions. In fact there is a feeling here, no doubt erroneous, owing to their bad results that these men deliberately maimed and dismembered the patients when a conservative treatment would have saved the lives and limbs of many of the patients placed under their treatment.

Jan. 12.

The Manager and myself left for Hademkui with Colonel Ali Darwesh Bey of the Red Crescent Society as our guide, philosopher and friend, and our interpreter. Dr. Muhammad Husain also accompanied us with the Manager of his Mission. We left Constantinople at 10.45 A. M. and passed a dozen stations on our way, San Stefano and Omarli being the important stations. At San Stefano we saw two Egyptian Red Crescent Field-Hospitals, one Ottoman Red Crescent Field-Hospital and one Military Field-Hospital, all in good working order. There were several Red Crescent Field-Hospitals at intervening stations, whose names I don't remember. We were met at several stations by officers of the Red Crescent and the Royal Army Medical Corps who accompanied us to Hademkui. At Hademkui General Abdus Salam Pasha, the officer in-charge of the whole of the medical department in this division, met us at the station and a salute was given by 100 soldiers awaiting us at the platform. We then proceeded to a house in Hademkui where we were presented to

...and ... Marshal. He is a grand ... He speaks to us in the ... and soothing in his ... He thought that true Islam was not to be found ... the Turks; that they had acquired all the vices of the West and lost their real great qualities inherited from Islam which had brought them to this plight. He was very kind and courteous to us and paid us compliments which we thought were out of proportion to our work. General Abdus Salam Pasha and Ahmad Abuk Pasha consulted for some time and then decided to send us to Omarli which is behind the lines of defence and yet not so bitterly cold or damp as Sanjaktapa. There is also a plentiful supply of good water at Omarli which is not found at Sanjaktapa. Judging from the sea of mud at Hademkui, which we were told was much better than at Sanjaktapa, we gratefully acquiesced in their selection of Omarli and left Ahmad Abuk Pasha to visit the Red Crescent Hospital at Hademkui.

Horses were brought for us to ride, but our Manager declined (Let it not be said through any fear!) to ride such a very very short distance as the Red Crescent Hospital, in spite of the 'Mud Atlantic'. The Turks are very polite people and to please the guests would even face the prospects of a mud-bath rather than refuse a request. We walked, or rather swam, in the mud. Our beautiful uniform, boots and breeches and all, were forgotten in our anxiety to prevent a fall which was imminent at every footstep as the mud was very slippery here. In one place I had actually to plunge my hand in the mud and just saved myself from a most ignominious fall. My hand was, however, icy cold, and yet I could not put on my gloves owing to the mud. We reached the shelter of the hospital, as you can imagine, with a sigh of relief. After a meal which would be considered regal, we inspected the hospital and found unsatisfactory owing to the mud which, in spite of dry dusting, was quite thick.

At last we got on the horses, Abdur Rahman's being the fleetest. At least that's what he thought. We rode on through lully tracts full of mud and water until we reached the Army Hospital where Abdus Salam Pasha met us with his staff and took us round the hospital. This is a brick building and accommodates 700 patients. The arrangements here were excellent, most of the cases being medical. They had a splendid pharmacy and a small operating theatre.

Dr. Muhammad Hussain took our photographs, after which we started on our ten mile ride to Omarli. The roads were lully and very difficult and with a cold wind blowing against our faces we rode on, our Manager bringing the rear, as he insisted on not allowing the horses to run (of course out of consideration for the animals!). In his anxiety he rode with ungloved hands which were simply frozen, but how could he possibly put on his gloves when once on horse-back? The latter half of our journey to Omarli was done in pitch dark. The Manager is very proud of his horsemanship in reaching Omarli safely without a fall. I must say that once or twice he was put to the severest test when Ali Ghalib Bey whipped his horse from behind quite unawares, the horse bolting off suddenly, of course, with Abdur Rahman on the saddle unaided, even to the extent of holding his saddle or putting his arms round the horse's neck. We stayed in a small room in Omarli and were treated to a sumptuous repast by Dr. Burhan Bey. The next morning we visited the place where our tents are to be pitched. It is under the shelter of a hill facing the Omarli railway station and separated from the railway line by a small stream. There is a natural spring with a plentiful supply of drinking water by the side of our camp, and with a bridge across the stream the camp will be a minute from the railway station. After saying goodbye to Dr. Ali Ghalib Bey, Inspector to the Army, and other medical officers who had accompanied us to Omarli, we returned last night to Constantinople and explained everything to Bassim Omar Pasha, the Vice-President of the Croissant Rouge, Stamboul. Owing to the wet weather and the damp soil I have ordered every tent to have wooden floor raised about 2ft. from the ground. This would keep our patients quite dry and prevent cold and damp.

Our transport has been sent to-day to the stores, where all our goods are kept, to separate the tents from the rest of the goods. These will be sent to-morrow and will be ready by Friday or Saturday when all the remaining goods will be sent with a batch from the Mission to get everything ready. We hope by the 25th of this month to be in working order. You would no doubt think us very slow; but I assure you so far as we are concerned not a moment is being lost. But the conditions of transport, etc., make this delay unavoidable.

The Bombay Mission which came a fortnight before us has neither got its tents nor the instruments yet, and I should be very much surprised if they get their things in a week's time and I work by the end of this month.

I will write to you in my next about the organisation of the Ottoman Croissant Rouge and the splendid work Medical as well as Relief, that they are doing. I am convinced after thorough and searching investigation that this is the only organisation worthy of support from India where every penny is used to good purpose and Dr. Muhammad Hussain and myself have thought it necessary to sign a telegram sent by Bassim Omar Pasha to the different papers in India for publication in order to direct all the money to the Croissant Rouge and prevent its going to quarters where one cannot find anything about the money.

Persia.

News of the Week.

The Persian Legation denies that the Swedish gendarmes are unequal to the task of policing the trade routes, or that they are disheartened. The Legation adds that Colonel Hjalmarsohl will leave on March 1st to inspect the southern routes. A thousand well-drilled and well-equipped men will go to Shiraz in the spring. Five thousand rifles and thirteen Maxims have recently been purchased, and are being handed over to the Gendarmerie.

Lord Lamington, speaking before the Central Asian Society, gave an account of his recent travels in Persia.

He said that British prestige in the south had been enormously weakened by the outrage on Consul Smart and the murder of Captain Eckford passing without effective reparation being exacted from the offending tribesmen. The Swedish officers in charge of the Gendarmerie had not a knowledge of Orientals as we had and they should be replaced by British officers. Britain should provide a loan under guarantees and should resist any attempt to allow Saad-ed-Dowleh to return in any administrative position. He would be strong in everything except in a desire to save his country.

Colonel Yate said that we could not think of occupying Southern Persia with less than 15,000 or 20,000 troops. The only alternative was to put local levies, not less than 5,000 strong, under British and Indian officers. This should be a condition of granting any loan to Persia.

The French have lost 18 killed and 72 wounded in another fight between Mogadin and Marrakesh.

Replying to Colonel Yate in the House of Commons with reference to concessions for a railway between Tabriz and Julfa and between Mohammerah and Khoranabad, Sir Edward Grey said that neither concession had yet been granted, but there was good hope of both being granted very shortly.

The Pioneer's London correspondent cables:—The Berliner Tageblatt says that the Persian Council of Ministers has granted Russia a concession for a railway from Julfa to Tabriz, and also the rights for coal mines and petroleum wells on either side of the line.

Salar-ed-Dowleh has resumed his rebellious career. He is reported to have taken the village of Nardin, half way between Astrabad and Brnard. It is surmised that his main object is the capture of Meshmi. The resumption of hostilities is surprising, as the Persian Government, at the instance of the Russian Legation, is prepared to grant him generous terms.

News has reached India which confirms the report from Teheran that Salar-ed-Dowleh, brother of the ex-Shah, has appeared in the northern district.

In the Commons Sir Edward Grey stated that he was unable to say what measures would ultimately be necessary in Persia in consequence of the murder of Captain Eckford.

Government would, however, be reluctant to take any action likely to hamper the efforts of the new Persian Cabinet to restore order. Government was now considering how they could best assist the Persians and encourage them in their task.

The Persian Foreign Minister has signed an agreement with a Russian company granting the latter the right to construct a railway from Julfa to Tabriz with an extension to Lake Urumiah and also the preferential right to construct a railway between Tabriz and Kazvin.

Sir Edward Grey, replying to Mr. Dillon in the Commons, said that certain negotiations in connection with mining concessions were proceeding between the Persian Government and a British syndicate. He was unable at present to disclose details. His Majesty's Government had given support with reference to the British concessions but in no form which might be described as premature.

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUP.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It.

When H. E. retired from the Council Bootlair Sahib laid on the table all the Fellows, Senators and Syndics in the Universities promised to irresistible Rajah in the last Simla session. After this the Shikari opened the rifle range of the Council by firing the first shot as the first representative of Modern Behar. Never dreaming what the womb of 12th December, 1911, contained, and little suspecting its good fortune, Modern Behar jumped up with joy at the double event of the birth of Behar and Orissa. Sturdy and loyal Behar may have been; but it was neither sturdiness nor loyalty that had gone to the creation of the province. If truth be told, it was all Sirrar ka iqbal se. But Behar is anything but Malthusian, and satisfied with nothing short of a Barnum and Bayley freak. It wanted another set of twins within six months. Ancient Delhi is still ancient Delhi in spite of the capitalisation, although the fleabite of 49½ lakhs has given us a Munshikhana and some tents and a few signboards showing how well Government can imitate the Creator with the fiat "Let there be light." But Behar wants magic palaces rising up for its newly created L. G. and Councillors and host of Secretaries just to satisfy it that Behar is really and truly a province and has not been dreaming a foolish dream for over a year. So Shikari fired point blank not a shot but a volley of questions which took three Hon. Members to answer. What steps are being taken to build up the capital? Have the plans been approved? If not, why not? Has money been sanctioned? If so, how much, and is it to be spent in a day or a week or would it take so long as a month to get rid of it? And, having got the province, are we going to have another double event the same year in the shape of a University and a High Court? Is it not a fact that hope deferred for a day now makes that Behar heart sick and the people are clamouring for a definite statement about the number of windows and the shape of the arches in the Government House at Bankipore? To all of which the new Sage replies that, fearing its sturdiness and loving to retain the loyalty of Behar, Government has sent a scheme and an estimate for the capital at Bankipore to the Secretary of State, demanding orders by telegram so that Behar's patient practicalism may not become impatient idealism. But with due humility the Sage begged Behar to forgive Government for looking to conventions even where Behar is concerned, and not getting plans of buildings approved before the Secretary of State's sanction of the general proposals. Would Behar deign to accept the trifle of 12½ lakhs as an earnest of many crores to follow so that land may be acquired for its capital? The Sage was all submission and humility and repentance when he tremblingly told the Shikari, just as he was loading his gun for a second right-and-left, that Government, sharing the weakness of ordinary mortality which includes a disposition to err, had unconsciously omitted to include provision for a High Court or a University building, although they had made some amends by making provision for the acquisition of land for the High Court in case the Anglo-Indian Office

Association and Behar's Allah Bayley permitted the Imperial Government to create such an institution. But, concluded the Sage, Government were not aware of any apprehension in Behar that the capital of the province would be located elsewhere than at Patna. How could there be such apprehensions in a province which was told that it was loyal and felt that it was sturdy? As the Sage sat down the Shikari levelled his gun in the direction of two of the Sage's colleagues, bringing down Sandow III and Bootlair Sahib both in a single shot. Sandow III confessed his inability to declare when the decision to have a High Court would be arrived at, and Bootlair Sahib announced that in spite of Behar's few colleges and Bankipore's few collegians the Local Government was considering the question of having a new University for Behar. Not desiring to embarrass Government too much the Shikari shouldered his gun and left the Government covertly in peace without asking when Behar could have an army of its own and a navy with two keels laid down to one of the rest of the world.

The day's shooting over, the Administrative Orphan moved that the Indian Companies Bill be referred to a Select Committee, thus supplying five newly-elected Indian members a rattle to play with. Knowing only too well that Hon. Members mostly new to the Council and knew nothing of the mysterious procedure of introduction of Bills and their publication and reference to Select Committees, politely disguised the fact, and said, that, "as Hon. Members were aware," at this stage debate is restricted mainly to the discussion of principles. The main principles followed in framing the Companies Bill were, firstly, absence of Government interference, which was the copyright of hon. colleague in charge of Education, and secondly, provision of full measure of publicity, for commerce, unlike Government, should not be a kala jugga. As usual, very voluminous opinions and suggestions had been received—for opinions and suggestions were somewhat cheap in the Indian markets—but none challenged the high principles of Government. This a matter of great congratulation, although Government could always set at naught such challenges when they did come. But one suggestion challenging the principles made up for the lack of others inasmuch as it challenged the need for legislation itself. The Uriya of Onttaek thought the Bill would hamper seriously the formation and growth of indigenous companies. No doubt all legislation was to some extent a restriction on freedom; but society is not yet perfect and, glancing in the direction of the Uriya returned to Council in spite of the assistance of the fugitive pilgrims of assurance from Behar, the Administrative Orphan said that perhaps even in the Arcadian groves of Orissa, the staple industry of which was the trusty Uriya Bearer, there were rogues and swindlers who were able to rob the innocent with impunity in companies and companions. What was required was that people should gain confidence and learn to invest freely instead of boarding. India's wealth should no more be a purdanashin than India's womanhood. The laws regulating companies should do what they can to prevent any shock to credit just as laws regulating companionship should do what they can to prevent any shock to credulity. This Bill would increase the security of shareholders and investors just as new social conventions were designed to increase the security of partners in life, and the Orphan saw every reason to hope that the influence of the Bill would be all in the direction of promoting genuine commercial enterprise in this country as the influence of modern social conventions was in the direction of promoting a certain kind of enterprise in sociability. There were signs that the ancestral habit of hoarding was beginning to give way before modern influences, just as the ancestral habit of seclusion was giving way before them. 'Tis a wonder, however, that nobody in the Council asked the Orphan whether the ancestral habit of hoarding wealth was disappearing because the ancestral habit of having wealth had also disappeared. Was there only no wish or was there also no wealth to hoard? 'Tis a nice speculation whether in social conditions also the same thing would result, Indian manhood saying like Othello, "Wife? What wife? I have no wife!", and freedom in social intercourse may combine the absence of the wish to seclude with the absence of the wife to be secluded.

The Administrative Orphan also outlined the proposals he intended to put before the Select Committee about the relationship between companions in a company and their agent. It was clearly none for Government to step in, for two is company and three is none; but he wanted to prevent the possibility of agents "taking improper advantage of their positions." As things stand at present it is open for an agent to treat a transaction subsequently according to its success or failure either as his own or made on behalf of the undisclosed principal. The Orphan's suggestion was not intended to interfere with "legitimate business" but only with the illegitimate business.

His speech was so far unlikely to create any serious apprehensions; but there was a commotion in the new capital of India when the Administrative Orphan referred to "the dangers involved in the present indiscriminate use of the word 'Bank' by companies engaged in all kinds of activity," which he characterised as a "serious menace." But there was a sigh of relief when he announced that he would not deal with such Banks in the present Bill. Once more it was the lawless science of law which came in the way of drastic Government action, for the Orphan's hon. colleague, the Moslem Dowager, had pointed out "weighty technical objections." But he warned such Banks that the matter will not be lost sight of and that Government had under examination the "question whether a special Act can and should be framed dealing with evils which it is desired to repress."

Nobody expected another speech at this stage, as Government's principles had not been challenged in the country, and "the great Chambers of Commerce" had already succeeded in getting their recommendations accepted by Government. But if they had no Dashing Boy to say "Amen!" to Government's proposals of all sorts and conditions in a dozen printed pages, the Council still had a Headstrong man from Bombay who took half an hour in welcoming the introduction of a Bill which had been introduced long ago, and in announcing to the world that "the Bill meets with my approval!" Long live the Headstrong and may the swelling in the head never grow less!

Sandow III moved that the Extradition Bill be referred to a Select Committee empowering Rajahs and Residents to extradite all and sundry from Presidency Towns for the ordeal of a trial in the courts of Protected States. In support of the measure he cited before the Council, which was entirely convinced, the opinions of Rajahs and Residents that they approved the measure. Good luck to the millionaires of Bombay who, unlike the new Extradition Bill, are not favoured with the approval of the Rajahs and Residents in Kathiawar. Would like to know what the Resident of bad Baroda thought of the measure. Would also like to know whether Baroda is a Protected State within the meaning of the Act.

The Moslem Dowager came forward with a similar motion about the Administrator-General's Bill. There was little in the proposal to arrest attention; but after the Durbur you can never be sure what revolution may be lurking in the most innocent-looking speech. Who in the Council or in the country would ever suspect that this peaceful Bill would contain a clause which "empowers the Governor-General in Council to constitute new provinces" and "to appoint separate Administrators-General for such provinces"? Have we not had enough of partitions and re-partitions and the making and unmaking of new provinces?

After the Dowager had succeeded in imposing on the same Select Committee a second Bill dealing with the Official Trustee, the Administrative Orphan stepped in once more into the breach with his Bill for the abolition of a certain kind of match-making. According to him match-making even with the assistance of automatic machinery and powerful fans was a "dangerous trade." It is true that match-making has become with a class of people a business; and it is also true that it involves certain risks which, however, only give it an added zest. But to call it a "dangerous trade" is to wage war on an army of dowagers whose occupation would now be gone. The Orphan cited the instance of the United States of America which had now joined the conspiracy of anti-match-makers. "Americans," said he, "are not given to importing sentiment into matters of business," and he added that all the "elaborate precaution" taken in America against the dangers of match-making had broken down and the "conscience of the American people will not allow this dangerous industry to continue longer." Such a profitable business as the great match-making concern in Ohio, which did not mind letting the world know that it was associated not silver nor gold but actually with diamond, and which had excellent "facilities" of a curious and somewhat unmentionable character, had been closed by the American Senate, which "has proved itself time and again more tender to vested interests probably than any other legislative body in the world"—except, of course, our own. This indeed is a new departure for the United and disuniting States, which had hitherto acquired very laboriously the reputation of being the greatest unmarried. That business would now presumably also cease when match-making is abolished. America having enjoyed the existence of every precaution against the dangers of match-making had failed to insure immunity from such risks. Are we to believe that in India where such perfection of machinery did not exist the result was absolute immunity? "Are we then to hold that the ordinary laws of nature have become inverted and that the degree of risk varies with the amount of precaution taken and not inversely to it?" Little does the Administrative Orphan know of India if after more than two years he still believes that any laws, whether ordinary or extraordinary, of nature or of Government, can be otherwise than inverted in the Wonderland of India. "India has no laws," says the Indian, and "India should have no laws except those of sedition" says the Anglo-Indian. But our Wonderland laughs at both, and although she has no laws, she makes up for the deficiency by having a plethora of lawyers, and her sedition laws serve the purpose of creating sedition.

To those who wanted evidence to convince them of the risks of match-making the Administrative Orphan offered the consolation that in England itself the campaign against such match-making was much hampered in its commencement by the difficulty of obtaining evidence. "Naturally," said he, looking in the direction of the lawyers in the Council, and of the Delhi Main whence the trains go towards the Judges in the High Court of Calcutta, "the difficulty is much greater in India." But after all that the C. I. D. was doing, it was unpardonable for the Orphan to ask whether we could possibly rest easy "with our far more imperfect methods which affect detection as well as prevention."

With reference to the objection of Bombay that for such a damp climate as India's it would be a real hardship to stop such match-making, the Orphan cited the example of Assam "which boasts of some of the heaviest rainfall in India" and "the waterlogged districts of Eastern Bengal" which—it may be presumed—boast of malaria and river densities. There was no match-making in Burma, for the Silken East was a land of freedom and strike-anywhere affection. He asked, "why should what is possible in Burma be impossible in Bombay? We had no answer to that question last year for the best of all reasons that there was no answer." That is exactly what the Mild Hindu would have said to Never-shut-up Gates in the matter of being fed on Government doles. Several scheming dowagers sitting up in the gallery were really frightened when the Orphan promised to show the Council his Chamber of Horrors formed out of photographs of those who have been employed in such match-making in Vienna. "They exhibited the faces of men and women scarred, brutalised, barely human. And all this suffering is incurred not for some high object of human welfare which alone could justify it, but simply and solely for the production of an article which is convenient, no doubt, but which is in no sense a necessity, and for which adequate and efficient substitutes exist." The Orphan could not believe that knowing these things the Council would be content to expose people to this contagion for "so trivial and unjustifiable an end."

Headstrong could not resist the temptation of speaking once more and proving to the satisfaction of St. Luke that even in India people suffered sometimes from the awful malady of "Fanny Jaw."

A Sunday-school teacher asked a little fellow how many commandments there were. To her surprise the lad answered, glibly enough, "Ten, ma'am."

"And now, Sammy," asked the teacher, "what would be the result if you should break one of them?"

"Then there'd be nine," triumphantly answered the youngster.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Jan. 31

In an interview Dr. Daneff affirmed that Turkey's reply was unacceptable. The Allies have given notice to terminate the armistice. The text of the Note has been published. It makes no mention of fortifications, but insists upon the necessity for retaining under direct Ottoman sovereignty the part of Adrianople to the left of Maritza where the holy shrines are, as their surrender would throw the whole country into commotion and involve the gravest consequences. A reference in the Note to the Aegean Islands urges that any diminution of Ottoman authority would transform them into foci of agitation which might spread to the neighbouring coasts and result in a situation similar to that in Macedonia constantly endangering peace. The Note is confident that the Powers in determining the status of these islands will have regard to these considerations. It hopes that the Powers will recognise the extent of the sacrifices proposed and will agree that Turkey would be right in rejecting further demands.

The besiegers of Adrianople number 105,000, of whom 80,000 are Servians. The besiegers are furnished with heavy artillery strongly placed. They are confident that they are able to destroy the fortifications in two days. Hitherto the bombardment has been very slight, but the operations will now be pressed. There will be no more waste of time, and the business will be ended quickly and thoroughly.

A Sofia message states that the official journal Mir says, "It is useless to conceal our gratification at Turkey's action, which leaves us a free hand. In submitting to two months' barren negotiations we have paid a heavy tribute to the cause of European peace."

Later.

The Balkan Allies announce that fighting will be resumed at seven o'clock in the evening on the 3rd February. No war correspondents will be allowed. The Allies declare that before further discussion is possible Turkey must sign the preliminaries to peace on the battlefield. Adrianople will be first attacked and then Tchataldja. Bulgaria will claim an indemnity. The Turks are disagreeably surprised at the conclusion of the armistice. They expected that the Allies would await the Porte's reply to the Powers and believed that the Powers would have the last word on the question of the resumption of hostilities.

Much excitement prevailed at Jassy (Rumania) yesterday owing to the appearance at night of an aeroplane provided with a powerful searchlight. The aeroplane manoeuvred over the town for ten minutes, passing afterwards towards the barracks. Two guns were fired at the machine when the aviator extinguished his lights and disappeared in the direction of the Russian frontier.

The Freidenblatt (Vienna) hardly believes that there will be a resumption of hostilities, but says that in any case the Powers will be passive spectators.

The Committee of Union and Progress has issued an appeal to the people to sink party differences and join the national defence organisation for collecting funds to arm volunteers and equip ambulances.

The Times, commenting on the Turkish reply to the Powers' Note, believes that no real obstacles to peace are left but nominal sovereignty of part of Adrianople and the question of the island in the Aegean. The journal does not think that the Bulgaro-Rumanian claims are irreconcilable or that the future of Scutari will perplex the Powers. It says that the belligerents will incur the severest reprobation of the civilized world if they again plunge the East of Europe into war over matters of vanity and selfish amour propre.

London, Feb. 1.

A Constantinople telegram states that all officers have been ordered to join their regiments in 24 hours.

The Greek conscripts for 1918 are largely joining the colours with a view to the resumption of hostilities. Greece is confident of her ability to carry out her task in Epirus and give effective help at Tchataldja.

The text of the Porte's reply shows that Turkey does not shrink herself to immediate issues, but is taking advantage of the promises of support made in the recent Note of the Powers for the future development of the Ottoman Empire and demands the right to establish an autonomous customs tariff, to conclude treat-ties of commerce on modern principles, to increase meanwhile the customs duties by 4 per cent, to suppress foreign post-offices and to abolish capitulations.

Though the representatives of the Allies continue to make uncompromising assertions that a resumption of hostilities is inevitable unless Adrianople and the Archipelago are ceded inspired articles in the European Press pay a tribute to the conciliatory tone of Turkey's reply, and the belief is expressed that the moderating advice of the ambassadors in London and of the British Foreign Office will induce the Balkan Allies to resume negotiations.

It is officially announced in Sofia that military attachés will not be allowed to enter the theatre of war.

A telegram from Constantinople says that Ismet Pasha, Chief of the General Staff, has been appointed commander-in-chief of the army. He has addressed a general order to the troops urging them at this critical moment in Ottoman history to prove themselves worthy of their glorious traditions.

A number of the Balkan delegates left London to-day. M. Venezelos, interviewed by Reuter before departure, said it was "an revoir, not adieu." He was persuaded that they would be back in a few weeks to conclude peace, but the Turks must first admit defeat and sign the preliminaries of peace on the battlefield.

London, Feb. 3.

Reuter states that the Ambassadors in London have telegraphed to the Governments expressing the opinion that the Turkish reply to the Powers' Note afforded a possible basis for the resumption of negotiations. It is understood that a similar view prevails in official quarters in London and that Dr. Daneff's visit to the Foreign Office yesterday was connected therewith. It is doubtful, however, whether the Powers will succeed in their efforts to prevent a resumption of hostilities.

A Sofia message states that the Turkish deserters who have arrived at the Bulgarian headquarters declare that they fled from the persecution of the Young Turks. They alleged that sanguinary conflicts have taken place between officers and soldiers at Tchataldja.

Mahmud Shekret Pasha in a statement says that the troops at Tchataldja have never been more united, as the enemy will find to their cost. He believed that Rumania would reach an agreement with Bulgaria. He says that he never shared the belief that Turkey could count on Rumania. He hoped Rumania would not have occasion to regret her attitude.

Dr. Daneff has left for Paris.

King Nicholas has left Cetinje for a camp outside Soutari. The fall of the latter before the conclusion of peace is ardently desired by the people.

The Daily Telegraph states that the Ambassadors on Saturday discussed the question of a guarantee for Moslem religious sanctuaries at Adrianople in the event of Turkey's surrendering it.

The Powers are recommending that Bulgaria should grant the Caliph right to be represented by a high religious official as in Tripoli.

After the meeting of the Ambassadors Sir Edward Grey conveyed this recommendation to Dr. Daneff.

In order to rid itself of the responsibility for the renewal of hostilities the Porte has ordered the delegates to remain in London till fighting has been resumed, and the Turkish troops will wait for enemy to fire first.

The Berlin Tageblatt states that Germany has advised Bulgaria to show a conciliatory spirit and continue negotiations on the basis of Turkey's reply to the Powers. Britain and France have informed Germany that they will give Turkey no pecuniary assistance till peace is concluded. Germany has replied that she will adopt the same course.

The Tageblatt also states that France has intimated to the Allies that it is desirable that their delegates should remain in London to continue negotiations even if hostilities are resumed as was done in the Turco-Italian War.

Later.

Bulgaria is willing to agree to the appointment of a representative of the Caliph at Adrianople after the cessation of the town.

A Constantinople message states that official quarters have not abandoned the hope that hostilities will be prevented. It is understood that the British and German Ministers have made urgent representations at Sofia the outcome of which is eagerly awaited at Constantinople. Meanwhile the Government is not neglecting precautions to meet all eventualities.

London, Feb. 4.

Hostilities have been resumed with the bombardment of Adrianople and a slight skirmish at Tchataldja, both of which began punctually at seven o'clock last evening.

The Bulgarian offer embodied in the recent protocol is a straight frontier from Silistria excluding that town, which will remain Bulgarian, to Balchick. It is not expected that Rumania will accept the offer.

The Bulgarians repudiate the suggestion that they acted precipitately. They point out that they have upwards of half a million men on a war footing whose maintenance for two months during the protracted negotiations has been an enormous matter.

It is semi-officially declared that when hostilities are once resumed the question of Adrianople will disappear giving place to that of Constantinople and the Dardanelles.

The Servians are already transferring troops to assist the Bulgarians at Tchataldja and the Montenegrins at Scutari.

Owing to stagnation as the result of the war there have been eighty-five bankruptcies in Vienna since the 1st January with liabilities totalling over a million sterling as compared with fifteen bankruptcies in 1912. Yesterday three of the leading dress-making firms failed, their liabilities being £89,000.

London, Feb. 5.

A Bukharest message states that through a diplomatic indiscretion the contents of the Bulgarian protocol were revealed. The Frontier demanded by Rumania is from Turtukai southward to a point near Rustohukvarna railway and thence eastward to Ekrene on the coast, a little southward of Balchik. This would give Rumania Silistria, Dobrich, Kavarna and Balchik while the line proposed by Bulgaria would only give Kavarna.

The bombardment of Adrianople was resumed yesterday morning and some quarters of the town are reported to be in flames.

It is officially stated in Constantinople that the Bulgarians attacked the forts to the north and north-east of Adrianople on Monday, but were easily repulsed. The garrison is full of courage and enthusiasm.

There has been no serious fighting at Tchataldja, but the Bulgarians have burned the village of Tchataldja at the extreme limit of the lines.

The bombardment of Adrianople lasted for four hours on Monday evening. It was suspended for five hours at night and was resumed at four in the morning. The Turks replied vigorously, but according to reports from Sofia the Bulgarians steadily advanced.

The impression in Sofia is that the war will last altogether about ten days, but Constantinople believes that there are surprises in store for the Allies as the result of new blood at the head of Turkish affairs and fresh troops, mostly Asiatic mountaineers. The Turks are confident that Adrianople will hold out for several weeks.

London, Feb. 6.

At five o'clock on Tuesday afternoon the Commander of Adrianople sent the following wireless message to Constantinople:—"The enemy are bombarding us. One hundred and thirty-eight cannon shell and eleven shrapnel have fallen into the town. Eight men have been killed and ten wounded. Fifty-three houses are in flames. The bombardment continues."

A Sofia telegram says that Adrianople was bombarded on all sides yesterday. There has been no fighting at Tchataldja.

Mahmud Shevkot Pasha has gone to Tchataldja from Constantinople.

Private reports of the fighting at Adrianople received in Belgrade state that the Serbian seventh and fourth regiments distinguished themselves.

Sheikh-ul-Islam has instructed the Faithful in Constantinople to offer up daily prayers in the mosques for the success of Ottoman arms.

Later.

The Turks are at present the sole purveyors of war news. It appears from Constantinople despatches that the Bulgarian right is retiring from Tchataldja after burning the villages of Tchataldja and Ismeddin, destroying bridges and culverts and otherwise making the railway unserviceable.

The scene of the fighting has been transferred to the Peninsula of Gallipoli where the Bulgarians possibly contemplate a land attack on the Dardanelles forts or may attempt to take Tchataldja in the rear.

The commandant of Scutari sent to the Montenegrin headquarters a parliamentary announcing that he had now been informed of the armistice and requesting the arrangement of a neutral zone. The Montenegrins replied that the armistice had terminated and that hostilities had been resumed.

It is rumoured that Hassan Riza, Commandant of Scutari, has been murdered.

The Montenegrin parliamentary interviewed Anad who said that Hassan Riza was ill.

A Turkish official dispatch says: "The enemy, who are partly concentrated at Gallipoli, sent a regiment on the 4th instant to Kavak. After a fight lasting all day we retired in accordance with previous arrangements, and the enemy were unable to pursue. Another force of the enemy has occupied Myriofo to the coast of the Sea of Marmora. The warship Zaaf inflicted serious losses on the enemy, advancing towards Charkeui."

A Sofia message states that General Savoff has issued an order to the Army declaring that the Turks were mistaken in thinking that they would gain time by protracting the negotiations. "The Bulgarians have been enabled to concentrate their forces, and are now more ready than ever and are prepared to dictate terms on the battlefield or drive the Turks beyond the seas."

The Turkish Committee of National Defence is endeavouring to place treasury bonds in Turkey and Egypt and among Moslems in India. The Ottoman Consul in Bombay reports that he has received applications and subscriptions amounting to a million sterling.

A Sofia message states that negotiations are proceeding with a view to establishing a neutral zone for foreigners and possibly also for women and children at Adrianople.

A Sofia message states that the Turks in Gallipoli have been defeated in great disorder south of Kavak river. They are pursued by the Bulgarians who now possess nearly all the coast of the Sea of Marmora as far as Bolazir.

London, Feb. 7

Rechid Pasha has been instructed to remain in London for a few days. The other Turkish delegates are departing.

An irade published at Constantinople authorises the Italian cruisers "Pisa" and "Sammarco" to pass through the Dardanelles.

M. Venizelos, the Greek Premier, had long conferences with the Serbian Ministers after which he proceeded to Sofia where he conferred with the Premier of Bulgaria and was received in audience by King Ferdinand.

Dr. Daneff, the Bulgarian delegate to the London conference, has passed through Belgrade without stopping. The action has aroused a disagreeable impression.

Reuter's correspondent telegraphs from Constantinople that the official accounts of the fighting in Gallipoli make it clear that a reverse was sustained although details are lacking. The engagement was probably not of a serious character because it took place outside the Bulsar lines where the principal forces are concentrated. Nevertheless it shows that the fresh Turkish troops stood their baptism of fire badly.

Reuter's Constantinople correspondent states that all day long firing has been heard in the direction of Derinos at the northern end of Tchataldja. It is officially announced there that the Turks have occupied Kallikratia and other villages and heights on the Turkish right and that reconnoitring parties have come into contact with the enemy.

A Sofia message states that the Foreign Ministers of the Powers have communicated with M. Guechoff, the Bulgarian Foreign Minister, at the request of the Consuls in Adrianople on the subject of either the establishment of a neutral zone for foreigners or permission for consuls themselves and foreigners to leave Adrianople. M. Guechoff has replied that he refuses, pointing out that there are no precedents for such a course and stating also that it would be embarrassing to the military authorities.

It is announced in Constantinople that an internal loan of five and a half million pounds Turkish will be issued shortly.

A considerable Turkish force has been collecting in Asia Minor and it is proposed to place Enver Bey in command and effect a landing near Rodosto or Midia and thus threaten the Bulgarian flank on rear.

Apparently in anticipation of this move the Bulgarians have retired from Tchataldja to near Tchortu.

It is feared that the Turks in seeking to stir war enthusiasm are more likely to cause dangerous fanaticism. Considerable disquietude prevails in diplomatic circles and foreign warships are returning.

It is believed that Adrianople will hold out for weeks as horse flesh and dog flesh have not yet been touched. It is felt, however, that the fall of Adrianople will clear the situation and that the Porte will place itself unreservedly in the hands of the Powers.

In reply to Mr. Ginnell in the Commons Sir Edward Grey again refused to publish the reports of the alleged atrocities in Macedonia.

Mr. Ginnell asked: "Is Sir Edward Grey aware that Moslem opinion in India is contrasting the former action of the British Foreign Office in pressing Turkey to introduce reforms in Macedonia with its present reticence, which is regarded as screening far worse atrocities?"

Sir Edward Grey: "If any such inference has been drawn it must have been stimulated by the misleading nature of questions put in the Commons." Sir Edward reiterated that he was applying to the reports of events in the territories occupied by the Allies exactly the same rule as he had applied to the Turkish reports. "Ever since 1908," he said, "I have been doing my utmost to bring about peace and good settlement for the future. There has been nothing about Macedonia for some years that is not unpleasant reading. If I were to rake up the past at the present moment it would be most unfortunate from the point of view of both Christians and Moslems."

The Tchataldja Lines.

A MILITARY correspondent, writing from Constantinople in the Berliner Tageblatt, gives an interesting and detailed account of the situation at Tchataldja. Great fortification works, equipped with all modern appliances, have been thrown up, armed with the best and abundant modern artillery. He gives a complete list of the guns placed in the positions, their calibre and type, and mentions the fact that the works at Makry Koy are turning out under the supervision of the German director Kopp, 100,000 rounds of various ammunition daily. The troops, too, are undergoing daily training in shooting formations and in shooting, so that in this respect the defences are well-nigh impregnable. Very different, however, is the situation with regard to food supplies, the importance of which seems still not to be fully appreciated by those in command. There are no magazines behind the lines, and the supplies are coming in a roundabout way from the central depôts at Hadem Koy, en route Constantinople, and a number of other points by water, rail, and oxen. The arrangements are working so slowly that men are starving even now. Nor is there enough wood for fires, and the troops suffer considerably from the cold weather.

"The lack of a food supply," the writer concludes, "constitutes, as before, the weakest point in the Turks' defences, and unless it is remedied the power of Turkish resistance will prove inadequate."

The Attitude of the Powers to Turkey.

The Vossische Zeitung comments upon the diplomatic situation in a rather cynical fashion. It says:—

What do the poor Moslems think of Europe? The question has no high political character. The time now seems to have passed when the foreign Powers raced each other to win the favour of the Sultan. The spectacle was never very edifying. In fact the cries of triumph or the sighs of disappointment in various countries according as this or that ambassador had gained the upper hand at the Golden Horn were among the most grotesque sights of the European game of diplomacy. It need to be carefully noted whose ambassador had been received by the Sultan three times, and whose ambassador had been received only twice, and whose ambassador had not been received even once, and this formed the endless subject of all diplomatic gossip in Pera. To gain over the Turk, to keep him in good humour, to find favour with him in order to cut the ground from under the feet of a rival—this was the art that was regarded as the most important of all. And now? Who ever asks in these days what the Moslems think of Europe? Sentimentalities do not belong to the trade of diplomatists. The regard for Turkish feelings has been "suspended." They may think what they like, and nobody cares a straw about it.

This is all very natural, and yet the part which is now being played by the Powers in the peace business is such as to compel one to revert with a feeling of shame to the question—What do the poor Moslems think of Europe? It is known to everybody that before the war the Powers warned the Balkan States that they would not permit any change of frontiers. This was the famous status quo, which it was forbidden to touch. Nevertheless, the status quo was killed by the accomplished fact. The Powers bowed before the accomplished fact, and invented a new formula in the shape of the principle that the fruits of victory must not be taken away from the victors. But to-day the Powers are proceeding beyond even this principle, inasmuch as they are making representations at Porte in order to induce it to abandon Adrianople. It means, that the fruits which have not fallen to the victors should also be yielded to them at the will of the Powers. And what about Scutari and Jeddah?

Again, is not the attitude of the Powers towards the shameful atrocities committed by the victors on the vanquished deplorable also? For months these unspeakable deeds have now been going on without a single Government in Europe uttering a word of reprobation. Formerly in those parts where these things now happen the foreign consul was a demigod in the eyes of the population. To him did the Christians go when the Turks did them some wrong, and the consul would transmit the complaint. The ambassador at Constantinople would lay it before the Turkish statesmen, the Ministers in Europe would deal with it, and in the Parliaments long speeches would be made on the subject. "Yoyo had a cow stolen from him; what would Europe say?" Yoyo and the whole village knew that the abduction of the cow would find an echo throughout Europe. Ah, those were different times! Yoyo's cow was a property of the Christian groaning under the Turkish yoke, whereas the Turks have no business to go to the consul, and nobody needs concern himself if they be exterminated or not. It is not a very brilliant reputation for morality which Europe is gaining from the present war.

Germany and the Balkan Settlement.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, Jan. 14.

Public opinion here is getting somewhat uneasy at the part played by German diplomacy in the London Conference. Why, it is asked, should Germany consent to put pressure on her old protégé, Turkey, in order to hand over Adrianople to the Bulgarians? It was bad enough to have to accept the actual results of the war as accomplished facts, after having announced, together with the rest of Europe, that no territorial alterations could be allowed. But to present Bulgaria through diplomatic pressure with a citadel which she could not win by arms would surely involve the loss of whatever shreds of prestige Germany may still command in Turkey. The members of the Triple Entente may all have their own good reasons for their support of the Balkan cause, but Germany has nothing to gain by the increase of Slavonic power. The exponents of a vigorous foreign policy say that Germany should have taken a strong line in support of Turkey. They protest against Germany's over-anxious regard for the peace of Europe, and ask why Germany's interests in particular should be sacrificed in order to avoid the possibility of war. They are certain, too, that the Triple Entente would have given way. France, England, and even Russia, they are convinced, are just as anxious to avoid war as Germany herself. As usual, it has been a game of diplomatic bluff, and, as usual, Germany has been beaten. Liberal opinion does not go as far as this, but even here there are some anxious voices asking whether too heavy sacrifices are not being made. Germany is likened to a truck, lumbering along over strange lines behind the engine of the Triple Entente. Will the waggon come back empty, or will Germany get her share in the "compensation" which is certain to fall to the lot of the other Powers?

The hopes of many lie in an understanding with Great Britain over the final adjustment of the Egyptian question. Here, they suggest, is an opportunity for a bargain, a bargain which may be extended to cover all the various small points at issue between the two countries. Fortunately the death of Herr von Kiderlen has not shaken these hopes, for, to judge by various statements in the press, Herr von Jagow is equally convinced of the necessity of an understanding. In an article on the new Foreign Secretary in to-day's Tay Legationserat von Flockher, writing from personal experience, again emphasises this. "Hard struggles," he says, "stand before the new Secretary but all who know him are convinced that he is strong enough to meet them. It is indeed a fortunate disposition of providence that has brought him to the head of foreign affairs at this moment when all interest is centred on the faithful question whether it is possible to bring about a permanent understanding between England and Germany. Jagow is a declared advocate of an understanding, and has held this opinion for years. And we may expect him, as Foreign Secretary, to use the whole force of his personality in order to carry through his idea. We may expect all other diplomatic questions to be subordinated to the solution of the Anglo-German problem. On the basis of an understanding the development of Germany as a world Power can continue in safety."

Interview with Nizami Pasha.

In the course of a conversation with a London representative of the Manchester Guardian his Excellency Osman Nizami Pasha declared that the present deadlock was due to the position taken up by the Allies at the last meeting of the Conference.

"It is not within the power of Rehid Pasha," he continued, "who by rotation was to be the chairman of the next sitting, to convene another Conference. First, because the power of the chairman begins and ceases with each sitting of the Conference."

Secondly, because it is the Allies themselves that have broken off the work of the Conference.

"The object of the Conference was the discussion of the conditions of an equitable peace, and one which, moreover, should prove profitable to both parties. It seems to me that in our case there has been virtually no discussion at all. The delegates of the Allies came forward with an ultimatum, to which they apparently wished us to submit unconditionally. Yet they asked us for our counter-proposals, and when we made those counter-proposals they declined to listen to them, and suspended the work of the Conference. If that was the object of the Conference, what was the use of our coming here?"

"We have already with regard to Adrianople declared we would not, and could not, entertain any peace proposals which meant the loss of that town, and we have political and racial reasons upon which we based our attitude. Adrianople is the key to Constantinople, and must remain in our hands if Europe is, as she should be, desirous of an honourable and lasting peace. Without Adrianople we should have to keep a permanent army of about 300,000 men along the lines of Tchataldja, or else we should feel exposed to the constant danger of attack. Bulgaria as well as Europe is aware of that. They are both agreed that Constantinople must remain with us. Under these circumstances I fail to see why they lay so much stress upon the surrender of Adrianople to the Allies. These are the reasons which should chiefly appeal to Europe. I need not dwell upon the racial ones, which are in themselves very important and vital to our country."

"I may add," his Excellency concluded, "that Turkey has already surrendered a great deal. The Allies have surrendered nothing. While the Conference is not sitting the armistice continues. During this armistice our garrisons are being starved, and Moslem women and children whose men are fighting at the front are being exterminated in Macedonia by Bulgarian bands."

Atrocities in Macedonia.

THE Kölnische Zeitung publishes from its Salonica correspondent a description of massacres committed upon the Moslem population (some 20,000 souls) in the Doyran district by Serbian troops (200 cavalry and 500 infantry) and Bulgarian komitadjis. As soon as these entered the town of Doyran they at once took possession of the Turkish offices and began levying blackmail and breaking into Moslem houses, plundering and outraging the women. Some 64 persons who had set out for Salonica without arms were massacred at Madenler and 59 of the foremost Moslem inhabitants were tortured and killed. Numerous villages in the neighbourhood were burnt down and their population destroyed. The Moslems of the villages of Kirbat-i-Bala and Kirbat-i-Zir, also of Sinenikohah and Palmeah, were compelled under pain of death to go over to Christianity. Only when the Greek troops arrived did the atrocities cease. On the road between Doyran and Geygeli sixteen Moslems were shot down by artillery. From Urgandjilar it is reported that ninety Moslems were tied to one another by ropes and transfixed by the bayonet. Christian women who had gone over to Islam were rebaptised and their husbands were killed. Numerous persons died of hunger. In the Sandjak of Serr, out of a Moslem population of 184,000 souls, only about 20,000 males are stated to have been left alive. The Bulgarian population co-operated with the komitadjis in this work of destruction, and all obtained a rich booty.

A correspondent in Rome transmits to the Berliner Tageblatt an extract from a letter which the writer has received from the diplomatic representative of a Great Power in the Balkans. The writer says: "Here unfortunately matters are still in a troubled state. The massacres of innocent Turks are still going on in the interior. The number of those massacred is estimated at 240,000, and I do not think the figure is exaggerated. When at last will Europe intervene as she used to do in the past whenever a Bulgarian or Greek cattle thief received a hiding from the villagers?"

European Official's Charges.

Dr. E. Jaekel, the well-known German authority on Balkan affairs, communicates in the Frankfurter Zeitung extracts from a report by M. Bauman, the Inspector-General of the Ottoman Gendarmerie, on the atrocities committed at Kavala and Dedeh-agatch by the Bulgarian and Greek soldiery as well as by the komitadjis. The latter, about 150 in number, arrived at Kavala at eight in the evening and "at once began a massacre among the Turks which lasted till midnight. They broke into the houses, plundered, and murdered everybody, women, children, and old men. There can be no doubt as to the co-operation of the Greek Christians, or at least of certain Christians in the town. I myself saw more than once native Christians conduct these Bulgarian brigands through the streets and point out to them Turkish houses and persons. Some Moslems, including women, children, and old men, took refuge in a mosque. The Bulgars surrounded the building. A revolver shot resounded through the half-open door. Immediately a lively fire was opened on the unfortunates in the sacred building. Bombs were thrown into it, and then a veritable slaughter began. On the next morning I counted more than twenty-five dead bodies."

A number of Italian priests who maintained a Catholic school at Kavala gave refuge to about thirty Turks. They were denounced by some Greeks to the Bulgarians, who immediately broke into the house and demanded the surrender of the refugees. Among the latter was a certain Riza Bey, a Turkish Government Commissioner on the French railway, who, being anxious not to abuse the hospitality of the priests, gave himself up to the assailants. He was taken away from the school. "I myself saw them stop, place a bayonet against his breast, and demand to be shown his house and money. Riza Bey was an educated man, recently married, and of one of the best families and I knew him very well. He had a young wife and a little child. The thought of the danger which his family might incur if he were to indicate his house induced him to offer resistance to the bandits. He was pierced through by the bayonet on the spot." For five days his body was lying about in the street, and was robbed one by one of its articles of attire.

The Greek Bishop of Dedeh-agatch made every effort in his power to stem the wild passions of the komitadjis, but no one else did anything. The Bulgarian army was encamped quite near the town, but it did not appear on the scene until the arrival of a French ship. To all complaints its commander, General Genoff, merely replied that war was war. When he learnt that the bishop had some Turkish women concealed in the Greek school he demanded that the women should be turned out in order to make room for the troops. The unfortunate women had to return to their plundered houses, where they were outraged by the general's soldiers.

Herr Jaekel, in quoting these and other facts from General Bauman's report, adds. "What is now going on (in the conquered portions of Macedonia) is something unique and new. A victorious army is destroying with a violent hand the peaceful population which has taken no part in the war. And not one Power is moving! Not one of the Great Powers which have so solemnly guaranteed the status quo utters a peremptory word that should at least stop these bestialities, which have their only parallel in the Thirty Years' War."

Appalling Stories.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

But these stories of murder and outrage are nothing when compared with those related regarding the situation in the Salonica hinterland: in Stroumnitzza, Jouma, Kotohana, Petrich, Kavalla, the Pristina and Ghilau districts; in fact, wherever the Bulgarian and Serbian armies have passed. What are four Turks, a woman, a child, and two Jews? A mere nothing! But what we hear from the interior is altogether too appalling for belief; the pillaging, the wholesale sacking and devastation of entire districts, burning of villages, carrying off or destruction of every living thing, the utter ruin and desolation may in the course of time be forgotten. But what of the cold-blooded slaughter of men, women, and children? From many sources the rumours are confirmed, all being to the effect that in numerous districts not a living soul has been left; all have been wiped off the face of the earth, occasionally the women and children being spared to destitution and starvation, but mostly massacred with the rest; while in some places, Stroumnitzza, for instance, the men were taken to the common shambles and there butchered like cattle. Can all these horrors be true? It does not seem possible that the armies of so-called civilised States whose boast is that they have made war to free the oppressed, have been guilty of such deeds of primeval savagery. Yet these rumours persist and grow in consistency and if they are true, the massacre at Batak by Turkish irregulars some thirty-six years ago, which sent Mr. Gladstone through the country and so thwarted the policy of the then Conservative Government, cannot be compared with the deliberate and wholesale slaughter of this present invasion.

Question in the Commons.

Mr. M. Sykes (U., Hull, Central) asked the Foreign Secretary whether he had received any information regarding the conduct of the troops of the Allies toward the civil Moslem population of Albania and Macedonia, or that of Ottoman troops towards Christians in the Gallipoli Peninsula of the Troad.

Sir H. Grey: Various reports of this nature have reached me, but as is only natural under the circumstances they are not sufficiently substantiated to justify an official statement on the subject.

News from Turkish Sources.

THE following is a translation of a paragraph that appears in the Jeune Turc of the 29th December:—

Panitia, the companion of the famous brigand Sandansky, has transformed the prosperous Sandjak of Draman by taking possession of all the wealth of the Mussulmans and massacring as many of them as he possibly could, while Sandansky has treated the Sandjak of

Serres with incendiarism and bloodshed. All the komitadjis will become notables of these towns to-morrow—and this is the purpose of these ignoble murderers who have won the "victories" of staining the whole of Roumelia with human blood. Between two and three thousand innocent women and infants have under the orders of Sandanaky been burnt alive in the mosques of the Sandjak of Serres where they had taken shelter. The burnt corpses can still be seen in the ruins of the mosques. Charred remains of women and infants can be seen in the mosques of Petrowa and Vetrina villages also. The brigands of Serres have found a pretext for this massacre in the report of a rifle

The murder of some Jews at Salonica in broad day light by Greek soldiery on the 24th December is much commented upon by Constantinople newspapers. A Jew, named David Amur, was relieved of the two hundred pounds Turkish that he carried on his person, by some Greek soldiers who saw fit to deprive their unfortunate victim of his life also. The Jewish women of that quarter of the town raised a hue and cry and the murderers quickly disappeared. The noise of the women brought several Greek gendarmes to the scene who chivalrously responded to the feminine appeal by killing with the butt-end of their rifles two of the women who had collected round the dead man. "The Greek newspapers of Salonica," says the Jeune Turc (30th December), "remark with customary bad faith that the authors of this crime should be looked for amongst the Jews themselves."

Numerous other assassinations and barbarities are described and names, dates and other particulars are given. This state of affairs, as may well be expected, has not escaped the observation of the Powers. Hussein Hilmi Pasha, in an interview with the correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse at Vienna remarked (Jeune Turc of the 30th December): "Lieutenant-Colonel Foulon, a French Officer occupying an eminent position, has submitted a report to the French General Baumann, the Inspector in Chief of the Ottoman Gendarmerie. This officer which the French Government had deputed to Salonica in connection with the Reform Scheme of the Gendarmerie has submitted to General Baumann a detailed report on the state of things in Salonica after the Greek occupation. . . . This report says among other things that Greek bands in uniform entered the residences of Muhammedans and Jews, and under the pretence of search, looted the houses and violated women."

Ruined Turkish Peasantry.

Mr. Wilkie Young, Vice-Consul at Philippopolis, who is acting as relief agent for the Fund, writes with reference to the distress in Macedonia:—In some cases entire villages have been practically annihilated; in others walls are standing but the houses are roofless, and the inhabitants, having lost all they possessed, have taken refuge in villages removed from the line of march. They have nothing to eat, and—needless to say—nothing to sow for the coming year. It is necessary to traverse this district from end to end along the routes referred to in order to ascertain its condition, which varies considerably in different localities. In some villages, for instance, only women and children are left; others have lost all their animals, and both these categories have consequently no means of sending down to the towns for supplies even if money were placed in their hands. To these, therefore, help must be brought in kind. Other localities within reach of supplies, can fend for themselves if given the wherewithal to buy. Approximately every pound sterling should suffice to keep one hundred adults for one day in this district. It is a disappointment to learn that only £1,000 is at present available. For a large part of the Gumurdjina district now is the time of most urgent need; for in a fortnight it is only too likely that the passes will be closed by snow and many villages become inaccessible, it is important to note that in a great part of the Gumurdjina district the vast majority of those who have suffered most cruelly and irreparably from recent events are Muhammedans of the peasant proprietor class. I venture to hope that the above suggestions of the work to be done, if some thousands of unfortunate families are to be saved from utter misery—perhaps from actual starvation—during the extreme cold now beginning, may encourage the Committee to make a great effort to supplement the funds already allocated.

British Relief Work at Constantinople.

Constantinople, December.

At a time when war, pestilence, and famine have been inflicting cruel losses on the non-combatant population of European Turkey, the European colonies of Constantinople have been vying with one another in relieving a great mass of human misery and suffering. In this unselfish and sometimes thankless task the members of the British colony have shown themselves mindful of the great humanitarian tradition handed down from Crimean days, and their activity has taken a practical form which has enabled them to get the fullest relief for the sums which they and their helpers have generously contributed in aid of the afflicted.

The work done by the British colony and their helpers from home falls into two classes—relief and hospital work. All the former work is carried out by the committees and sub-committees which have been formed under the presidency of Lady Lowther, wife of his Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, for the expenditure on charitable objects of Lady Lowther's War Relief Fund.

The following rough sketch of what the managers of the fund are trying to accomplish may be of interest to British readers. The principal object is the relief of absolutely destitute women and children. To their relief a sum of £16,000 is being devoted. Two large committees, a men's committee, of which Sir Adam Block and Mr. Edwin Whittall are vice-presidents, and a ladies' committee, with Lady Block, Lady Woods Pasha, and Mrs. Eyres, wife of his Britannic Majesty's Consul-General at Constantinople, as vice-presidents, have been formed for organizing purposes, while 16 sub-committees of ladies and gentlemen are dealing with the distribution of relief in various quarters of the capital and its suburbs. A ladies' sewing committee, assisted by sailors from his Majesty's ship Hampshire, meets daily at the British Embassy. There are 160 in and out sewers, who have actually made clothing for over 2,000 refugees and wounded soldiers since the middle of October. Nearly 3,000 souls are being supported out of this branch of the relief fund at present.

The relief granted to refugees and soldiers' families consists mainly of charcoal, clothing, and bread, when the municipality does not provide it, as in the case of the soldiers' families. Refugee women and children receive medical aid and are housed when necessary. The extent to which the beneficent activity of the managers of the relief fund has been exercised may be realized by the fact that during the last month 6,000 garments, 58,000lb of charcoal, and 110,000lb of bread were distributed, not to mention other relief. These results are in the highest degree creditable to the zeal and activity of the president of the War Relief Fund and her helpers, and the members of the Relief Committee formed in London by Sir H. Babington-Smith may be assured that the funds they have so generously subscribed will not be wasted.

HOSPITAL WORK.

In consequence of the urgent appeals on behalf of relief for wounded soldiers, the scope of Lady Lowther's War Relief Fund has been slightly enlarged, and with the permission of the Imperial Ottoman Bank and several other donors about £260 has been expended on grants to hospitals and soup kitchens. The Turkish military hospital at Tashkishla, the municipal hospital, and the Turkish "Asile des pauvres" have received such aid. A soup kitchen has been started for the refugees at Kum Kapu with the aid of the Sisters of the Assumption. But this does not conclude the activities of our countrymen and countrywomen at Constantinople. Two Red Cross missions have been at work for some time here. The first, which was formed by the efforts of Sir F. Cassel, comprises three groups. Two of these have been working under the management of Major Doughty Wyllie at Tchataldja, the third has been divided between the hospital formed at the Museum by Mrs. Doughty Wyllie and the hospital at the Vefa, where it is working conjointly with the American mission. The second Red Cross Mission, formed by the generosity of Mr. Ameer Ali, is composed of five doctors, six nurses, and ten assistants, and is under the direction of Colonel Surtees, C.B., D.S.O., formerly Attaché here. It has charge of 60 beds at the hospital at Scutari. A third mission, which will deal specially with cholera, has arrived here, and will, it is understood, work at Fuzia or Beikos, whither Major Doughty Wyllie has now repaired.

Other hospitals have been created by British initiative. I may mention that which has been organized at Shishli by Dr. Glenow, doctor to his Britannic Majesty's Embassy, which contains 50 beds, and an excellent hospital created at Moda with the aid of the French Catholic Brothers, where very good work is being done. In spite of the small accommodation available, ten beds for Turkish sick and wounded have been added to the British Seamen's Hospital, while, thanks to the courageous initiative of Misses Eyres, an annexé to the British Hospital has been fitted up for 30 convalescent cases under the direction of Dr. McClean, of the British Hospital.

The Montenegrins and Their King.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS.)

Cettigne, Jan. 5.

SCUTARI having not yet fallen into the hands of the Montenegrins by force of arms, the decision of the Powers in regard to the eventual inclusion of the town within the borders of the future Albanian State is, naturally, awaited here with much anxiety. Rightly or wrongly, the people of Montenegro consider that the whole future economic prosperity of their country depends upon the possession of Scutari and the district which will go with it. At all events, this was the principal reason for which Montenegro was ready to go to war with Turkey. Since she has failed in her enterprise from the military point of view, it is natural that efforts should be made to repair this failure by diplomatic means; which, in the circumstances, is merely another way of saying that Montenegro is trying every means in her power to induce the Ambassadors Conference to draw the boundaries of Albania in such a way as to exclude Scutari and the country on this side of the Drin.

Although it is denied in official quarters that anything in the nature of definite proposals have been made, it is an open secret that conversations have taken place with Austria on the subject. But Austria already possesses considerable interests in Scutari, which, in the event of the town being included in Albania, would be valuable as a nucleus for the extension of Austrian influence. The price asked for the support of Montenegrin claims is therefore higher than King Nicholas will pay; far to give up to Austria the Lovichen Mountain, which dominates Cetigne and which is closely connected with the patriotic sentiments of the Montenegrins, might easily set a spark to the agitation which even the much-desired acquisition of Scutari might not allay, quite apart from the resentment which the conclusion of any compact with Austria would probably arouse among the people.

As I indicated some weeks ago, there is considerable discontent in Montenegro at the non-success of the conduct of the campaign. To speak of the existence of a definite anti-dynastic movement, as has been done by certain organs of the Vienna Press, is probably at present inexact or, at any rate, premature. Nevertheless the feeling exists, of which King Nicholas is well aware, and to allay which he, naturally, will seek to employ any means within his power. The surest means is, obviously, the achievement of the object of the war. If this—the extension of Montenegro to the Drin—can be secured by diplomacy, the position of King Nicholas will be further strengthened inasmuch as he will be justified in not having acceded to the desires of his generals, which would have entailed great loss of life. If an attempt has been made to strike any sort of bargain with Italy, the Power which, together with Austria, first espoused openly the cause of Albanian autonomy, and the Power which, from the commercial point of view, together with Austria, is most directly interested in the future of Scutari, such an attempt, so far at all events, is not public property. At the same time, it is by no means unlikely that something of the sort is contemplated, if not already in progress.

Meanwhile, pending the conclusion of the peace negotiations, rumours are again in circulation that, in the event of a continuation of hostilities, a definite attempt will be made to take Scutari. Whether, possibly, in any such eventual attack the Serbian troops, of which there are large numbers beyond the Drin, will take part is not clear, though there are indications that unwillingness on the part of Montenegro to profit by Serbian co-operation is diminishing. At the same time it must be added that, in view of past experience, such rumours of impending assaults on Tarabosh are received with a certain amount of scepticism.

Confu. Dec. 25.

For those who have been in touch with Montenegrin affairs since the outbreak of the war the reports of an anti-dynastic movement in the kingdom come as no surprise. It was evident nearly a month ago that there was a growing feeling of discontent among the people with the lack of success attained by the Montenegrin Army, and that this discontent might have serious consequences. It was doubtless in order to attempt to counteract this that King Nicholas himself took over the command in the field, since it was generally rumoured that Prince Danilo had lost his popularity with the troops. But, according to well-founded report, his Majesty's reception on his arrival at his headquarters was not as enthusiastic as the official telegrams from Gruda represented it to have been. Montenegro, in spite of its Constitution, still remains a patriarchal State, and consequently success or failure is not unreasonably attributed by the people to the person of the Monarch. Paternal government may answer excellently well with a winning hand, but possibly King Nicholas may now be learning that it is not a trump card in a losing game.

THE RESULT OF OVER-CAUTION.

The causes of the discontent are not far to seek. As has been repeatedly pointed out, the real reason of Montenegro for making war was to gain possession of Scutari. The first successes near Tudi had flushed the Montenegrins with victory, and they believed that they had only to assault Tarabosh at once for Scutari to fall into their hands. In many quarters it is believed that had they done so they would have succeeded, since at that date the reinforcements which arrived later had not reached the town. But, out of the desire not to lose men unnecessarily—a desire which was strengthened by the comparatively heavy losses at Detitch and Zegaj caused by the foolhardy courage of the men—King Nicholas forbade an assault to be delivered. Since then the Army has remained in front of Scutari, in sight of though as far from capturing the town as before the war began. For an army such as the Montenegrin army, with practically no organization and ill-supplied with artillery, it was unfortunate that the task set it should have included the siege of a modern fortress. But of late, and especially since the junction with Servians at Alessio, the Montenegrins have been asking themselves whose fault it is that there are no proper guns. And, as was to be expected in the circumstances, the blame, rightly or wrongly, is attached to the King.

Without the acquisition of Scutari and the fertile land which would go with it the outlook for Montenegro is, it must be admitted, not an encouraging one. Large sums of money have been expended, resort has already been had to the issue of a paper currency, and there is much distress among the people. From the latter, it must be remembered, horses and cattle were requisitioned at the beginning of the war for the use of the Army. The people gave them willingly in the first flush of enthusiasm, but with no signal success to record this feeling has changed. Although—unless the Montenegrins have sustained very heavy losses during the last fortnight—the figure of 6,000 killed and wounded mentioned in some journals is grossly exaggerated, the casualties have been severe enough for a small army which has little to show in return. By a competent authority they were estimated on December 10 as about 2,500.

THE VOLUNTEERS FROM AMERICA.

The feeling of discontent engendered by these various causes is further increased by the numbers of Montenegrins who have returned to their country as volunteers from North America, whither many thousands emigrate in order to earn a living less laboriously than among their own barren mountains. These men have become accustomed to a democratic form of government, and are not slow to point out to their comrades the disadvantages of patriarchal rule. That in quarters closely connected with the Palace some such result was apprehended from the return of the so-called "Americans" was clear from the manner in which certain detachments of them were received, a reception which, in one case at all events, resulted in the men concerned taking service with the Montenegrins only after they had applied in vain to serve as volunteers with the Serbian Army.

RELATIONS WITH SERBIA.

Although it may be questioned whether dissensions are not being purposely sown, and those dissensions which already exist between Serbia and Montenegro purposely exaggerated for the ultimate benefit of a tertius gaudens, it would be idle to pretend that complete harmony prevails between the two branches of the Serb race. Although King Peter's late wife was a Montenegrin princess, there are longstanding differences between the Petrovitch and the Karaageorgewitch dynasties, and the representative of each is popularly credited with the belief that the other is desirous of uniting in his person the kingship of the two nations. In Montenegro an outward manifestation of this animosity was furnished in 1907 by the lamentable "bomb affair" which led to the imprisonment and exile of many of the Progressist party in the country. Relations between the two countries improved in consequence of the annexation of Bosnia Herzegovina and the declaration of Bulgarian independence, both of which events served to drive the two Serb States closer together. But the improvement was not lasting, and, though an agreement was patched up for the purposes of the war, it requires only slight acquaintance with Serbian officers to realize that various incidents in the course of the last few weeks in which both armies were concerned have accentuated already existing differences.

Whether or not the eventual absorption of Montenegro is seriously contemplated by Serbian statesmen, the project is being warmly advocated in Montenegro by the "Young Montenegrins." Many of these men were imprisoned or exiled as a result of the "bomb trial," but with the exception of the sometime Prime Minister, M. Radovich, who was kept in prison, all were arrested at the outbreak of the war. For the most part, the members of this party are men who have completed their studies in Belgrade and have become imbued with Serbian democratic tendencies. A Constitution, it is true, exists in Montenegro; but, since the Montenegrin Constitution in the hands of King Nicholas is merely a thinly veiled autocracy, let us, they say, solve the question by pensioning off the Royal Family and uniting ourselves with Serbia. Unless events have marched rapidly in Montenegro during the past fortnight it would probably be wrong to attach too immediate an importance alike to popular discontent and to pro-Serbian agitation; but at the same time it is not impossible that a situation is developing from which to extricate himself successfully King Nicholas will have need of all his skill and diplomacy.

Tied to a Cartwheel.

The experiences of war correspondents at the hands of the allies were often by no means pleasant, and on occasions they received positive ill-treatment. A prominent example of this phase of the altering state of war correspondents is revealed by the experiences of Mr. Angus Hamilton, as a prisoner in the hands of the Bulgarians which he recounts in the Sphere. "I first accompanied the Turkish army," says Mr. Hamilton, "and encountered the Osmanli army in flight from Lüle Burgas. I pushed forward and fell into the hands of the Bulgars. My captors seemed determined to regard me as a Turkish spy rather than as a war correspondent and to torture me accordingly. Of course such a view may explain the lack of gentleness with which I was treated though it does not in any way detract from the alarming character of the whole episode.

I was captured between ten and eleven in the morning and about two o'clock I was led past the halting place of the officers of the 36th Infantry, where I was stopped and questioned. The escort's explanation that I was being taken to the quartier-general by General Popoff's orders was not sufficient for the colonel commanding, who ordered me to dismount. Before I could comply I was seized by a number of people and dragged from my horse. A revolver was held to my face, a sword to my throat, and my arms were twisted behind my back. I was searched and asked for my revolver and papers. When this little scene had continued for some time I was warned that I was in danger of my life and that if I attempted to get away I should be shot.

Then I was ordered to mount my horse, my knees were strapped to the saddle, and my escort was increased to six, one of whom, an officer, rode behind me with a loaded revolver pointing at my back.

As we failed to find the quartier-general I was taken back at nightfall to the bivouac of the officers of the 36th Infantry, where I was told to dismount and sit upon the ground while my knees and ankles were bound with ropes and the whole wearisome business of ascertaining my identity was repeated. When some three or four hours had passed in this way I was taken into a small tent and for the best part of all hour submitted to an experience which I never wish to have repeated. The ceremony was prefaced with the statement that if I would confess to being a Turkish officer I should be given a comfortable bed for the night and a good dinner. I was made to stand up, my arms were twisted behind my back and bound, while an officer with a drawn revolver sat just behind me. In front of me were other officers, who proceeded to examine me all over for any marks which would prove that I was a Turkish officer.

"When the examination had continued for a long time some soldiers thrust into the tent a boy between sixteen and nineteen years of age, who having been beaten across the face with a whip and so reduced to a condition of absolute terror was asked whether my clothes were not those of a Turkish Army officer. Without a moment's hesitation he identified me and my clothes, his willingness in this respect being equalled only by the engaging candour of one of the officers present, who suddenly recalled my name as that of a Turkish officer he had learned about at Salonica. I was now told that my identity was established, and as I elected to maintain my own point of view I was taken outside the tent to a cart which stood three or four yards away, thrown upon the ground, pulled into a sitting position and tied to a wheel. In this position I was left, though my reflections were soothed by a sentry who stood at my feet and by an officer with a red moustache, who from time to time emerged from the tent to explain that he was a man of humanity and it was his sorrowful duty to advise me to confess so that my soul should be in peace, for in the morning I was to be shot.

"When I had remained in this position for something like three hours an officer who had spoken to me during the course of the day was attracted by the signal spectacle and questioned me as to what had happened. After hearing both sides of the case he went to headquarters for instructions, and an hour later, being half led and half dragged across country with a rope round my neck, I reached headquarters at half-past one in the morning. All violent treatment now stopped though it was not until some days later that it was decided that I was actually an English war correspondent and that my papers were in order. Eventually I was able to return to England, but it is sincerely to be hoped that the treatment meted out to me will not form a precedent for the authorities in command during the next conflict."

A Book on the War.

The first book published by returned war correspondents is Adventures of War with Cross and Crescent, by Philip Gibbs and Bernard Grant, from which the following extracts are taken:—

"The noise of the guns, which was terrific even as far away as Midan Pasha, was absolutely hellish in Adrianople itself. By day it kept people quivering with the shock of it as the great crashes followed one another with a fury of sound; at night the noise became infernal in its violence, stunning the ears of the inhabitants and making the very houses tremble. It was like living in a continual earthquake. To those poor people in Adrianople the nervous strain was increased by the ordeal of suspense. Ignorant of the military situation, inside as well as outside, they never knew from one day to another whether the besieging army would not carry the city by assault and come through the streets with a general slaughter and an orgy of blood and loot. They could not go to bed on any night without the possibility of being awakened by the shouts of the Bulgarians, by shots in the streets, and by the clash of cold steel. And when the garrison made their sorties, generally under cover of darkness, there was no sleep for any living soul because the adventure might end for all of them in massacre and death."

IN THE TRENCHES AT TEHATALDJA.

Mr. Bernard Grant thus describes the Firing at Tehataldja:—

"From a dismantled fort we watched a thrilling scene. The Turkish rifle-fire from the trenches was very thick. I shall never forget the peculiar rushing whirr of it, terrible in its intensity and in the menace of its sound. When we imagined that one of these bullets, whose shrill note blended into this great chorus of swift shot, might find a living mark it was grim in its significance. There was no lack of ammunition in those trenches at Tehataldja. The Turkish soldiers seemed to be firing almost simultaneously, reloading as fast as they could and sweeping the enemy's line with a perfect hurricane of lead. Only now and then did the fire drop and languish away. In a few moments it would break out again fiercely with that kind of screaming song of death which cannot be described in words but which leaves ineffaceable sensation in the minds of those who have once heard it.

"All the field guns were using shrapnel. The air was alive with those flying shells which burst high up and scattered the missiles of death as they fell. They had a strange and deadly beauty. I was fascinated with those sudden flashes of flame, those white puff-balls, those bursting clouds. Perhaps if they had been as innocent as fireworks the sight of them would soon have become tedious. But, our imagination was set at work. One realises the deadly effect of those high-bursting shells. One knows the terror that falls with them. But Bulgarians seemed to get the distance better than the Turks, whose shells in many cases burst short.

"I have since seen criticisms of the Bulgarian artillery. It has been alleged by at least one critic who can speak as an eye-witness that the guns were badly served and that the gunnery was not at all good. It is his opinion that there was no real superiority on the Bulgarian side over the Turkish guns and that it was luck and the recklessness of life and the irresistible nature of the infantry attacks which enabled the Bulgarians to achieve their success. I do not pose as a military expert or as a competent judge of shell fire, but I can only speak according to the impression of personal observation, and certainly to me it seemed beyond argument that the Bulgarian artillery was very much better than that of the defence. The village of Tehataldja, which lay ahead of us, was in the hands of the Bulgarians, who had made it their headquarters, and now it seemed to be vomiting fire. There was a great concentration of guns there, and from that direction there came an immense number of shells which as far as we could see were bursting well over the Turkish lines. I was unable to form any accurate idea of the losses on my side. Shell-fire is proverbially uncertain in its effect, and as I have said the Turks were in most excellent trenches which provided them with good cover.

"Towards dusk a village to the right of Tehataldja caught fire owing to the shells which had burst over it and flamed up as a torch, casting a lurid, quivering light above its volumes of smoke, which spread out in far reaching clouds."

Constitution of the Lebanon.

Constantinople, Dec. 28.

THE term of office of Yusuf Pasha as Governor of the Lebanon expired on July 8 of the present year. His administration was marked by several collisions between the authorities of the Mountain and the population, and opinion is divided as to his success. His difficulties, however, were largely due to the inapplicability of what amounts to a constitution. I refer to the Organic Statute of Mount Lebanon—dating from nearly 60 years ago—to the present needs of what is in many respects the most civilized province of the Turkish Empire.

Towards the end of Yusuf Pasha's term the Administrative Council of the Lebanon, and Lebanon Committees in Beirut, Egypt, and the United States of America, forwarded petitions to the Grand Visier and to the representatives at Constantinople of the protecting Powers for the modification of the Organic Law. These petitions were moderately worded enough, but met with objections on the part of the members of the Committee who formed part of Said Pasha's Cabinet, while the Committee Press, which has always discussed the affairs of the Lebanon with a great lack of knowledge, openly denounced some of their desiderata. On the fall of the Committee Government the Lebanon question was treated in a more conciliatory manner by the Porte, and the Protocol of December 23, 1912, contains modifications in the Organic Law of the Province which are certain to meet with the approval of the Lebanese, many of whose grievances are removed thereby.

The following are the principal points in the new Protocol, under the terms of which Ohannes Bey Koyumdjian has been appointed Governor-General of Mount Lebanon:—

(1) The system of election of members of the local Administrative Council is assimilated to that which is in force in the Lebanon Canton of Zahle, where it has given satisfactory results.

(2) The Maronites of the town of Der-el-Kamer are given a seat in the Council, while the Druses receive another seat in the Canton of the Shuf.

(3) The Ports of Djunch (Maronite) and Nahr Punes (Druse) are opened to foreign merchant vessels.

(4) The new Governor is empowered to study the application of a new survey and census to the local system of taxation, and shall submit a report not later than six months before the expiry of his term of office concerning the revision of Art. 15 of the Organic Law of the Lebanon, which deals with the finances of the province, which shall be effected by the Porte in concert with the Protecting Powers.

(5) The Provincial Budget shall be drawn up by the Governor in concert with the Administrative Council. The accounts of previous years shall form the subject of a definite liquidation.

(6) Commercial cases between natives of the Lebanon shall be tried by Lebanon Courts of first and second instance.

(7) The local Gendarmerie force shall be increased to 1,200 men, and will be commanded by one of the foreign officers lent to the Ottoman Government for the purpose of the reorganization of the Imperial Gendarmerie.

The opening of ports removes a grievance on the part of poorer Lebanese emigrants, who were sadly fleeced in the past by the Moslem boatmen of Beirut, and the establishment of commercial tribunals saves the peasants the trouble and expense till now involved by a journey to Beirut. Of the other articles in the protocol that dealing with a new census and land valuation is most important. Till now all land in the province has been taxed on the basis of the valuation of 1861-1865, with the result that tracts that have long since gone out of cultivation continue to bear taxes, while hotels that have been built and orchards that have been planted since that date get off with a payment of a few metalliks (halfpence).

The new Governor, Ohannes Effendi Koyumdjian, is an Armenian Catholic. He was for some time Counsellor to the Turkish Embassy at Rome, and has since been Under-Secretary of State to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. His character is high, and the only opposition to his appointment has come from members of the Committee belonging to the Grand Orient of Turkey, who apparently believe that any Catholic, even a member of the Armenian Catholic community, which has always shown considerable independence in its relations with the Vatican, must be an extreme cleric.

LADY LOWTHER'S TURKISH RELIEF FUND.

The following is an extract from a letter from Lady Lowther received by the Hon. Secretary. "It is all for the relief of women and children, of whom we are already helping 8,000 and will be keeping them alive throughout the winter. There are said to be 150,000 refugees in this town alone, besides the soldiers' destitute families, who are our first care, as the Government can do nothing for them."

From this it may be seen how urgent the demand for funds is, and how the money already despatched will have the effect of alleviating the sufferings of, and probably saving from death by starvation and disease, many helpless Moslem women and children. The fund remains open indefinitely, and, as the number of destitute families will increase, the demand for subscriptions will increase proportionately.

Up-to-date Rs. 81,000 have been despatched to Constantinople. Donations may be sent to—

DEAR SIR,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

restore order. The Government was now considering how they could best assist the Persians and encourage them in their task.

Sir Edward Grey, in reply to Colonel Yate, confirmed the statement emanating from Teheran with reference to the railway concession granted to a Russian company in Persia. He added that two years' option for the construction of the line from Mohammerah to Khoramabad had been granted to British syndicate, but the details were not yet settled.

The Arnold Case.

INFORMATION has been received here that the Viceroy has remitted eight months of the sentence on Mr Channing Arnold, who was sentenced to one year's simple imprisonment by the Chief Judge on the charge of defaming Mr. Andrew, Deputy Commissioner, Margui, at the Chief Court Sessions.

In connection with the orders by the Governor-General in Council directing the reduction of Mr. Channing Arnold's sentence of one year's imprisonment by eight months, Mr. Arnold will be released by the 18th February. A cable was sent to-day to the London solicitors of Mr. Arnold urging them to defeat the Government's action and hasten the appeal. On a local newspaper representative interviewing Mr. Arnold's Counsel (Mr. C. H. Campagnac) he was told that Mr. Arnold was very much surprised at the action of the Viceroy in remitting a portion of his sentence in view of the recent statement made by Lord Greve that there would be no interference by the executive and that when the appeal was filed the question of bail would arise. Mr. Arnold wished the public to know that he had never at any time asked for clemency and that no such application had ever been made to the Viceroy.

In the House of Commons Mr. Baker, replying to Mr. Morrell, said the Government of India had reviewed the case of Mr. Arnold of Rangoon on its merits, and had come to the conclusion that four months' imprisonment was adequate.

"I would like to make it clear," added Mr. Baker, "that the decision does not affect Mr. Arnold's power to apply to the Privy Council for a review of the case."

The Arnold appeal to the Privy Council was to have been presented on 10th February. It will be argued early next week.

New Delhi.

Mr. BAKER, replying in the House of Commons to Mr. Joseph King, said that no instructions had been given to the Delhi architects with reference to the employment of Indian craftsmen, materials and traditions. They had been informed of the proposal to appoint as their responsible adviser Sir Swinton Jacob, who was specially qualified to advise on the points mentioned. The Government did not propose to publish the Town Planning Committee's first report, as it was purely provisional, and its recommendations were under consideration, but a copy had been placed in the Library. The final report is expected shortly which will explain the reasons for selecting whatever site may be proposed.

The Week.

Sir EDWARD GREY, replying to Mr. Dillon in the House of Commons, on February 6th, said that certain negotiations in connection with mining concessions were proceeding between the Persian Government and a British syndicate. He was unable at present to disclose the details.

His Majesty's Government, said Sir Edward Grey, had given support with reference to British concessions, but in no form which could be described as pressure.

The Foreign Minister has signed an agreement with a Russian company granting the latter the right to construct a railway from Teheran to Tauris, with an extension to Lake Urumiah, and also a right to construct a railway between Tauris and

In the House of Commons on 6th February, Sir Edward Grey said that he was unable to say what measures would ultimately be taken in Persia in consequence of the murder of Captain. The Government would, however, be reluctant to take any action likely to hamper the efforts of the new Persian Cabinet to

TETE À TETE

Sheikh Abdul Aziz Shawish, Editor of the Illet-i-Osmani, has sent us the following cablegram, dated Latest War News. Stamboul, 16th February, 6 p. m. The paper is on the machine, but we cannot deprive our readers of the good news received just now:—

"Montenegrins Serbia 16,000 defeated around Scutari after heavy fighting, leaving three thousand killed and wounded, also six guns. Editor, Tasvir-i-Efkar, authorised by most eminent officials to declare Government did not ask for peace, though willing for 'an honourable one'."

We have already published through our contemporaries the still more pleasing news of the great Turkish victory against the Bulgarians at Uzunkiuipri, and of the brilliant sortie at Adrianople, the relief of which is imminent, and would refer our readers to page 141 of this issue where Dr. Ansari's very welcome cablegram of the 11th instant is published. We have no hesitation in believing these cables, and are confident that very soon Baron Reuter who is babbling of the peace proposals of Turkey would prove to be as truthful as Lieutenant Wegener and his informants. The myth of European veracity was really a fascinating creation, and we do not wonder at Lord Curzon's infatuation. But "the Korean lie" was insipid when compared with this rich repast of unadulterated falsehoods.

We have already noticed at length the peculiarly prejudiced account furnished by the Times Constantinople correspondent about the events of the 23rd January, as well as the peculiarly venomous article written by the Times itself. We also pointed out that the version of the Times' correspondent was very much at variance with the version supplied by Reuter. We laid bare its absurdities and naive insinuations and showed how barefaced attempts had been made to belittle the import and distort the facts of an event which, we believe, will remain memorable in recent Ottoman history. An issue of the Times received with the English mail this week contains another account by the same correspondent which it calls "uncensored."

We need hardly say this "uncensored" account is, if possible, a still more elaborate tissue of fables and falsehoods. We would have very much liked to reproduce it this week, but for want of space we have been obliged to hold it back till our next. Our sole anxiety has been to learn the truth, and we are glad we have at last received a letter from Dr. Ansari containing the account of the coup d'état. Dr. Ansari was an eyewitness of the memorable drama, and his brief but straightforward narrative at once disposes of the malicious lies with which one of the greatest achievements of the Young Turks has been sought to be blemished. We have delayed the Comrade in our desire to include the portion of Dr. Ansari's letter dealing with the events, as we felt that our readers must be impatiently waiting to learn the truth, and we hope we are forgiven. Dr. Ansari writes:—"I returned to Constantinople on the afternoon of 23rd January. As I drove past the Sublime Porte I saw some five to eight hundred soldiers standing inside the enclosure of Bab-i-Aalee, and a crowd at the balcony of Bab-i-Aalee along the steps, the road, the gate-way and the entire public thoroughfare. This was the memorable day on which the coup of the Party of Union and Progress was carried out in order to catch the Cabinet of Kiamil Pasha red-handed in the very act of signing the reply to the Note of the Powers ceding Adrianople. Enver Bey had ridden on a horse all night from Gallipoli and, reaching Constantinople on the morning of 23rd, made all the necessary arrangements, placing his men in the different cafés and houses in the vicinity of Bab-i-Aalee. He rode on a horse with a few soldiers to Bab-i-Aalee and, on being challenged by the sentinel at the entrance, he said he had come to save Turkey, and made a brief but touching speech, which moved the soldiers so much that they all joined him, and he marched into the room where the Cabinet had assembled to do the work of selling their country to their enemies. He entered this room accompanied by another army officer, Najef Bey, and demanded the resignation of the Cabinet from the Grand Vizier. He held the form of the resignation and asked for their signature, which was meekly complied with by Kiamil Pasha and a few others. But Nazim Pasha got up in a rage and ordered his A.-D.-C. to get these intruders arrested by the gendarme. Shots were exchanged in which Nazim Pasha, his A.-D.-C., Najef Bey and two others were killed, but the remaining Ministers were kept under guard. Enver Bey then proceeded to the Sultan's palace and got the Imperial iradeh appointing Mahmud Shevket Pasha as the Prime Minister and entrusting him with the formation of a new Cabinet. The crowd was waiting for the arrival of Enver Bey, and the appearance of a motor-car with Enver Bey, Talaat Bey and Mahmud Shevket Pasha was the signal for a tremendous outburst from the crowd outside Bab-i-Aalee. Enver Bey was the hero of the moment, and the crowd carried him shoulder high to the Bab-i-Aalee. He was embraced and kissed until he was nearly smothered. Then the Grand Vizier, according to the ancient custom, made a short speech to the crowd in which he expressed the hope that he would receive their co-operation and help in the difficult task of government at such a critical time. The crowd cheered him very heartily. The party then entered the Bab-i-Aalee, followed by the great crowd in which some of the members of the Mission were also included. They entered every room and also saw the chair in which Nazim Pasha had been killed. Very soon after the streets were quiet, and no external sign of such a great revolution was obvious even in the streets round the Bab-i-Aalee. It struck an outsider as a very extraordinary thing that events of such great moment should be enacted in such a quiet manner without any obvious change in the daily life of the Turks. Is it possible that the Turks have got inured to these vicissitudes and take them with a philosophical calm, unthinkable by us Indians to whom such events are extraordinary and unusual? Or, is it that they have grown indifferent and callous and take any sudden change in their government with the indifference of an absolutely lifeless, and spiritless people? I think probably the former is the truer explanation, for on the opposite side of the Bab-i-Aalee, inside the editorial office of Sheikh Abdul Aziz Chawish, were gathered a goodly number of people quite hidden from the passers-by, discussing with obvious jubilation the great triumph of the only patriotic party in Turkey. I am told that every moment an emissary would enter this place with news of what was going on inside the Bab-i-Aalee to the intense joy of the people gathered in this house. At about half past nine, just as we had finished our dinner in the Kadirgah Hospital, a telephone message was received from the Bab-i-Aalee to send ambulance-bearers and doctors at once. The Director of the Hospital, with six of my ambulance-bearers, and a few others from the Hospital, reached the Sublime Porte immediately, but the men were returned after a long wait, the staff of the Hospital, however, being asked to remain. I was informed the next morning that they had quietly buried the dead during the night, with the exception of Nazim Pasha whose funeral took place the next day, most of the members of the new Cabinet being present. Next day the State Entry of the Grand Vizier and the new Shaikh-ul-Islam (Ziauddin Effendi) took place in a very quiet manner. I cabled to you on the night of the 23rd the names of the chief ministers in the new Cabinet; but there have been some changes since then, the principal one being Prince Saeed Halim Pasha, who has been appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs. Every day the Grand Vizier first visits the War Office, where things are made to move. Already a great many changes have been made in the army, and every day one sees troops being moved from one place to another. To-day six mountain batteries were seen going in the direction of the harbour. There is a great change in the attitude of certain European Powers, the Triple Alliance openly giving assurance of help to Turkey. The Deutsche Orient Bank has made an advance of half a million Turkish pounds, and has promised 2½ millions by the end of January. The attitude of Russia has changed from a threat to an assurance of neutrality. Only England and France are still reticent. It is obvious that the Young Turks have saved the prestige of Turkey and mean to die honourably, if death must come. It is impossible even for an adversary to abstain from admiring their pluck, although it still remains to be seen whether this pluck is going to save Turkey. The new Ministers have come to power on condition that they would not cede Adrianople or give up the Aegean Islands, even if it comes to a re-declaration of war. I am sure that the Balkan Confederacy is exhausted and will not be able to proceed with the campaign. We wish to God that Turkey would declare war again, and regain a moral and territorial victory over her foes. My previous letters must have made plain to you what impression I had of Kiamil's Cabinet. It was the Hasenian régime only in a more obviously constitutional garb; hence the manner in which all the business was transacted." We think Indian Muslims have now no desire to "harass" the Minister with frantic resolutions and telegraphic appeals.

The mass meeting of Delhi Muhammadans, which took place last Friday Combined Prayer on 12th Rabi-ul-Awwal.

in the Jam'i Masjid, has decided to celebrate the birthday, and according to some the anniversary of the death also, of the Prophet of Islam which comes off on the 12th instant, by a series of sermons on the life and work of the Prophet, ending with prayers after the Namaz at sunset for the success of the Turkish arms. It is proposed that all the Muhammadans of Delhi should join this prayer, and that prayers should be offered in a similar manner in the Jam'i Masjid of every town, and in the mosque of every village throughout India. We hope at least two or three crores of people would send up their united prayers to the God of Peace and War, and that the divine response would be the relief of Adrianople and a decisive Turkish victory. We invite the co-operation of all our Moslem contemporaries so that this programme may successfully be carried out throughout India. We feel sure that prayer, if sincere and earnest, is even more effective a weapon than Oerlikon or Krupp guns, Aeroplane bombs, machine guns and repeating rifles, and we may well hope that on the 12th of Rabi-ul-Awwal the story of Badr will repeat itself.

We have already announced in our last the particulars received by the Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay, regarding the issue of the Treasury Bonds. This has now been confirmed by a cable from the Ministry of Finance to the Alliance Bank, Delhi, which we publish below :—

"We are issuing for purposes of National Defence
"Treasury Bonds for 5 million pounds sterling at
"5 per cent interest. The smallest denomination is 10
"shillings (Rs. 7-8-0). Repayment in 5 years by "annual instalments. The first instalment payable on "30th November, 1913. Please open subscription list
"and inform us of the number of subscribers and cable
"daily the amount subscribed.

"Rifat,

"Minister of Finance,

"Ottoman Empire."

Subsequently to this the Consul-General from Bombay has wired to us as follows :—

"For Alliance Bank. In answer to telegrams of "8th and 12th instant I engage you to open sub"scription list for Ottoman Treasury Bonds on account "of the Ministry of Finance at all your branches, accord"ing to your terms, without having the monopoly,
"and to address yourself to the above Ministry when "required.

"Djater."

We are glad to announce that the Alliance Bank has opened a subscription list and money is coming in. The Comrade has deposited with the Alliance Bank £75 (Rs. 1,125) for the purchase of the Bonds. Many names were entered in the Jam'i Masjid here after the Friday prayers when a very crowded mass meeting was held in this connection. In obedience to a resolution passed at the meeting we have sent telegrams to all Moslem Rulers in India appealing to them to assist their Moslem brethren in Turkey in their hour of need with a loan to drive back the enemies of Islam. We have informed them that His Excellency the Viceroy has already announced such a loan to be unobjectionable, and we have beseeched them to purchase a number of these Bonds worthy of themselves and of their States, for the love of Islam and of God and His Prophet. We hope they will be pleased to follow the example which they wish to invest in this manner. We trust it will not be long in this case that—

اتانکہ ہر راند محتاج برادر

(There is greater influence are the neediest.)

We know well enough that in this matter the Moslem princes and the Moslem peasant feel alike, and if even then it is only the peasant that lends money to the Ottoman Government, the princes by their inaction would be casting the most unfortunate reflection on the true inwardness of our Government's profession of strict neutrality. We feel sure that so far as the Government of India are concerned such a reflection would be cruelly unjust. Will the Indian princes also justify the divine condemnation voiced by Iqbal?

(It is the poor alone that fall in rows in the mosques; it is the poor alone that undertake the privation of the fast; it is the poor alone that take Our name, and it is the poor alone that throw a veil over your failings. The rich neglect Us in the intoxication of wealth; the Lustrous Community is alive only through the poor.) For the information of all intending purchasers we may repeat that the amount of the total issue is five million pounds or 7½ crores of rupees. The Bonds bear 5 per cent interest for such as may care to take it. The Bond of the lowest value would be for Rs. 7-8-0. Every year Bonds for one and a half crores of rupees would be redeemed, presumably by drawing lots of the Bonds. In five years the whole amount would be redeemed, and the first lot would be redeemed on the 30th November, 1913. These Bonds would be Bearer Bonds which can be transferred by one holder to another without any registration by Turkish authorities. They could easily be redeemed through the Banks just as they are purchased. A special source of revenue is earmarked for the payment of interest due thereon and for their redemption. Those who intend to purchase these Bonds should send the money at the rate of Rs. 7-8-0 for each Bond and commission at the rate of two annas per cent. (with a minimum of two annas for each transaction, no matter how small) to the Alliance Bank of Simla, at Delhi, or any of its branches in Bombay, Calcutta, Agra, Ajmere, Cawnpore, Darjeeling, Lahore, Mussouri, Murree, Rawalpindi and Umbala or to the Head Office at Simla. The Bank also requests that a specimen signature of the purchaser should be sent with each application so that the Bank may satisfy itself about the authenticity of any communication received from the purchasers. The Bonds have not yet arrived from Turkey, so provisional receipts are being issued by the Bank, and would be substituted for by the Bonds when received. We have asked the Consul-General at Bombay to let us know when the Bonds are expected here. As regards the Alliance Bank of Simla, we learn from the last annual report of the Directors that the paid-up capital of the Bank is 20 lakhs, and its Reserve Fund in Government Paper amounts to 28½ lakhs. The Reserve Fund was increased, after the year ending in June 1912, by another half a lakh. From a statement of progress we learn that the Bank was started in 1874, and that its dividend per annum has steadily gone on increasing from 7 to 14 per cent. Its working capital last June amounted to Rs. 5,40,14,568. We may point out that the Alliance Bank has no monopoly for the sale of these Bonds, but hitherto only the Bank of Bengal—which however insists on a minimum commission of one rupee for each transaction—and the Alliance Bank have agreed to receive deposits and purchase the Bonds for the depositors. We are, however, in communication with other Banks as we wish to provide ample facilities for the purchase of these Bonds, and we trust many Banks would come forward to undertake this work. But we also hope that intending purchasers would, whenever possible, make their own private arrangements with other Banks so that there may be no delay in the matter.

We confess we are astonished at the ways of the Orient Bank and the use it is making of its patrons. When Mr. Mohamed Ali was at Lahore in company with Dr. Ansari towards the end of November, he had occasion to discuss the proposal of the Orient Bank with its Managing-Director, Mr. Ahmad Hasan, and Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, the Editor and Proprietor of the Zamindar. Mr. Mohamed Ali was not convinced of the advantages of the Orient Bank's scheme, and, in his turn, failed to convince its Managing-Director of the advantages of a scheme in which the Bank will be merely a broker in the loan, and not the borrower and subsequently the lender. When he accompanied the All-India Medical Mission to Bombay he had an occasion to discuss the two schemes with His Excellency the Consul-General for Turkey, who also disapproved of the Orient Bank's scheme, but, about the middle of January, we heard from the Orient Bank that shortly after the departure of the Mission, and after Mr. Mohamed Ali's return to Delhi, its Managing-Director reached Bombay, that he saw the Turkish Consul-General and other friends there and discussed with them the "Bank's proposal to advance money to the Ottoman Government without interest," and that "they approved of the scheme and promised their full support." It was also stated "that Mr. Zafar Ali Khan also saw His Highness the Aga Khan who also approved of the scheme." We were also requested to give full support and announce this scheme favourably in the Comrade and to open a list in the paper, and it was stated that, on our promising to give the Bank our full support, it will open a branch at Delhi. Unfortunately the scheme itself was not sent to us at the time, and the letter itself stated nothing of the Bank's borrowing money without interest and without security in order to lend it to Turkey. When, however, we got the papers relating to the loan scheme we learnt as follows:—"The Directors of the Bank, having been requested to arrange a loan for the benefit of Turkey in co-operation with the Mussalmans of India, have decided to raise a big sum of money by issuing advance loan bonds of the Bank without interest and to advance the same to the Imperial Ottoman Government free of interest. The Bank will only accept from Turkey a small fixed amount by way of commission to meet the expenses connected with the issue of this loan. On sufficient funds being collected the Directors will immediately enter into negotiations with Turkey, either to contract entirely a new loan free from interest on behalf of the Indian Mussalmans, or to take up a portion of any of their existing loans issued by them in the shape of Ottoman Bonds. As at present advised, they would prefer to adopt the former course as being "more convenient and more acceptable to the religious feelings and susceptibilities of the majority of the Indian Mussalmans." Now, we do not know who requested the Bank to arrange such a loan, for we have it on the authority of the Consul-General that he did not give any countenance to the scheme. The analysis of the scheme itself shows that the Bank is not going to sacrifice anything of its own, for it will accept from Turkey "a small fixed amount by way of commission to meet the expenses connected with the issue of this loan." In other words, it will do exactly what the Alliance Bank of Simla or the Bank of Bengal would do, except that the latter Banks would charge the commission from the purchasers of the Ottoman Bonds, while the Orient Bank would charge the commission from Turkey. But where the danger lies is the statement that "on sufficient funds being collected the Bank will enter into negotiations with Turkey for lending her the money it would borrow." We do not know what would be considered sufficient funds, and we should like to know what security the Bank is offering to those who will buy its own Bonds for the interval between receiving their money and lending it to Turkey. What, however, passes our understanding is the remark that the Bank would contract entirely a new loan in preference to taking up a portion of the Ottoman Bonds as being "more dignified" and "more convenient." We fail to see the dignity and convenience of such a course, particularly when the Ottoman Government is issuing its own Bonds and has not asked anyone outside the Ottoman dominions for a loan in any other shape. The difference between the schemes of the Ottoman Government and of the Orient Bank is practically the same as there would be between two schemes if the Orient Bank issued its own paper bearing interest at 3½ per cent. with a view to lend the amount to the Government of India, instead of selling the Indian Government's Promissory Notes bearing interest at 3½ per cent. People would certainly find it more convenient and decidedly safer to purchase Government Paper than to purchase the Bonds of the Orient Bank with a view to lending it to the Indian Government. We doubt if even the Orient Bank could have the audacity to call its scheme more convenient than the scheme of the Government of India, and people's ideas of dignity must have undergone a tremendous change if they can readily believe that it adds to the dignity of a Bank with a Paid-up Capital of something over five lakhs only to induce people to believe that it is as safe as the Indian Government. The Ottoman Government may not be as safe as the Government of India, but we do not think that it has come down so low as to make it safer for the people to lend money to a Bank with 5½ lakhs of Paid-up Capital than to itself. Frankly, we think that the credit of Turkey is still far greater than the credit of the Orient Bank, and it would certainly be more dignified if the Bank made it clear to the people that the choice lies between trusting Turkey and trusting the Orient Bank. Another point we think worth noting is that the Orient Bank would repay money to its bond-holders after 10 years, whereas Turkey proposes to repay its bond-holders within five years by annual instalments, the first of which would be due on the 30th November, 1918, or in less than ten months. It is all very well for the Bank to say that "if the advance is repaid by Turkey before the expiry of the period for which the Bonds are issued the money would be returned to the bond-holders should they so desire" (The italics are ours). What we should like to know is how it proposes to inform the bond-holders when they can exercise the option contained in the words italicised. At present Turkey has given no indication that it wants or would accept the loan of the Orient Bank, and if the Bank subsequently purchases the Ottoman Treasury Bonds instead of giving a separate loan to Turkey, what steps does it propose to take to find out which of its bond-holders to repay when every year some of the Treasury Bonds are redeemed by Turkey? And if its bond-holders do not exercise the option of being repaid, what security and what interest is the Bank prepared to offer? We have already dealt with this aspect of the Orient Bank's scheme in the Comrade of the 8th instant, but we have been compelled to discuss the matter in detail because we have noticed that the Orient Bank is acquiring a factitious merit for its scheme by coupling the names of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali and His Highness the Aga Khan as the patrons of its latest business venture. Now, we do not know if the Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali is prepared to take any responsibility for its scheme, and we have received sufficient indication from him that he did not contemplate the Bank's borrowing "crores of rupees" which "may be collected in a short time." As regards His Highness the Aga Khan, he wires to us, in reply to our telegram as follows:—

"Please distinctly mention I disapprove of any other loan except that sketched by you and approved by me and mentioned by me in my Times of India paper. If Orient Bank works on that line I approve, otherwise not my patronage."

This is publicly contained in the issue of the Times of India of the 14th instant in which His Highness says that "these Bonds should be sent by Turkey to India, and the various banks here, including the Orient Bank, might sell as brokers only and not as borrowers, while the security would be that of the Turkish Government and not that of the Bank except, of course, in the interval between the receipt of the deposit and the delivery of the Bonds to the purchasers, which would be very short." As we have said in an earlier issue, we have no quarrel with the Bank, and we have no desire to cast on it any aspersions. But we certainly do not approve of its methods and we think it is far "more dignified" for the Bank and far "more convenient" for the people if it acts merely as an honest broker between the people in this country and the Government of Turkey than its advertising the patronage of great people and securing for a tortuous scheme, in which it acts both as a principal borrower and principal lender, factitious merit. One of these patrons, viz., His Highness the Aga Khan, has already said in the Times of India: "I am afraid the suggestion of a loan made by the Orient Bank in the form it is advanced is neither feasible nor practicable." We wonder whether the Orient Bank would publish these statements of His Highness as prominently as the statements about the acceptance of the patronage of the scheme.

We are glad to note that Nawab Mohamed Ishaq Khan, Sahib, the new Hon. Secretary of the M. A. O. College, Aligarh, is showing commendable energy in his efforts to attend to the heavy and various duties of his responsible office. It will be remembered that, according to the resolution of the Moslem University meeting which was adopted on 29th December 1912 at Lucknow, a deputation was appointed to wait on His Excellency the Viceroy on the question of the Moslem University. About a month and-a-half have passed since then and no steps were taken to carry out the resolution. Now, however, we learn that "His Highness the Aga Khan and the Hon. the Raja of Mahmudabad are arranging the time when the deputation can conveniently be received by His Excellency, but it is quite unlikely that an early date will be fixed for its reception." It is some relief to know that some steps are at last being made to give effect to the wishes of the community. We trust the members of the deputation will be allowed ample time to meet together and fully discuss and formulate their views before proceeding to lay them before His Excellency. They all of them, we are sure, know the value of the community on the subject of the Moslem University. To those who are expected to take their responsibilities lightly the late of Khatib and his "National Assembly" will, we hope, be a clear warning.

The Moslem University Deputation.

The Comrade.

Indian Moslems and the War.

ONE of the most interesting personalities in India is His Highness the Aga Khan, whose intellectual attainments, personal fascination and an established position as one of the great magnates of India, coupled with the first-hand experience he has gained by his world-wide tours which have made him, as the Times of India says, "an accomplished citizen of the world," lend to his utterances a great deal of weight not only with the Mussalmans, but also with the Government and other communities. Whatever one's opinion or politics, one always looks forward with eagerness to these contributions to public discussions during His Highness's all but fleeting visits to this country. Indeed the Indian Muhammadan is apt to get a little jealous of the rest of the "world" for taking away such a big slice of the time of this "accomplished citizen" every year, and it is not unoften that one sees the unique spectacle of the sheep searching for their lost shepherd. This year His Highness had remained unusually reticent, and was much missed at the meeting at Lucknow in which the future plan of action of the Moslem community with regard to the Moslem University was discussed. Even during the discussion in a meeting of the All-India Moslem League's Council, which resulted in an amplification of the League's creed, the audience missed the clear exposition of His Highness's views on so important a subject. But the Aga Khan has now contributed to the columns of the Times of India a signed article dealing with the position of the Indian Mussalmans during and after the war, and incidentally with the League's amplified creed, which we have no doubt will be read by all with great interest and discussed in many circles with some animation. We reprint it elsewhere in this issue and regret we cannot also reproduce the comments of the Times of India which, although it says nothing about the League's creed, endorses every other word of its distinguished correspondent, and practically paraphrases it, adding, however, a few flourishes of its own which the Mussalmans would give much to know if His Highness is equally prepared to endorse.

At the very outset let us make it clear that no matter how unpopular this may be with any section of the Moslem community, we condemn most strongly what His Highness aptly calls "an attitude of useless vagation." We have not spared the Turk when he was caught napping, and we do not mean to spare him if we wish to compensate to be his friend. The responsibility for his misfortunes is mainly his own, and if he keeps himself wide awake and utilises to the full the fund of goodwill and fraternal feelings which has always been at his disposal throughout the Moslem world, there is no reason why he should not rule in Europe for another six centuries, as he did during the last six centuries, in spite of the combined hostility of all Christendom and of all Europe. Again, although we find much to despise and abhor in the civilization of Europe, and pray to the Giver of all good things:

(Give to this habited of the town once more the vastness of the desert), we do not for a moment hesitate to mark our disapproval of a "mere dislike of the European" and of an attitude of mind of which the logical conclusion would be that we should walk on all fours and revert to savagery. But while we view, with the Times of India, "with the greatest concern the tendency of a section of the community to adopt language and to suggest courses of action which could do Turkey no good and which could only do the Moslem cause in India an infinity of harm," we cannot like the contemporary view with a smug complacency the tendency of almost the whole British Press in India and in England to adopt language and to suggest courses of action which, whether they be any good to the Christian Allies or not, are bound to do England and her Government an infinity of harm. Indian Mussalmans are often enough in need of advice; but their candid friends would do well if they would sometimes remember that such charity should often begin at home.

His Highness the Aga Khan analyses the situation and presents himself with asking two questions: firstly, how "to prevent as far as possible suffering and pain amongst the hundreds and thousands who have been rendered homeless and helpless by the war," and, secondly, "what can be done to make Turkey as unassailable by the war powerful Asiatic State." We agree with him that the first is, or, at any rate, until recently was, the question of the moment, "a question of life and death," which could not wait till the Moslem University. That can, of course, go on as a general peace wandering between the leaders among themselves and the Government. But His Highness writes that the Mussalmans of India may have "the grace to realise this immediately," we regret we must remind him that at least the poor in his community have done nothing to merit the reproach. There is no doubt that His Highness has himself opened his purse widely enough in all such cases, and thousands of Turks owe their existence to-day to his generous fellow-feeling. But we know of many cases in which Turkish lives have similarly been saved by much poorer Indian Muhammadans who have sacrificed practically all they had to relieve their brethren in Turkey. The response of Moslem India, and particularly of the poorer section of the community, has been splendid, and all that is wanting to make the result of such a response still more successful and effective is an organisation which could co-ordinate the work of many Relief Funds and Red Crescent Societies scattered throughout the country. In the absence of a large number of workers, and with a view to effect economy of expense and effort we suggested that the Moslem League, with its different branches, should collate the data for consolidated periodical reports of the progress of such work, and stimulate the endeavours of all such societies by advice and suggestions. His Highness, however, did not for some reason or other approve of this, and the work is going on according to the capacity and industry of the office-bearers of numberless organisations of varying energy and cohesion. Mere exhortations and dehortations will do nothing, and grace will not come to the Mussalmans unless the most eminent among them are prepared to organise the community patiently and unceasingly by sustained effort and constant stimulus. We have no right to demand all this from any single leader; but the one that can give this, as Sir Syed Ahmed Khan did during the last forty years of his life, would deserve to be remembered for all time as the greatest benefactor of his community.

(This is an open challenge to all understanding friends.)

Between the first question of His Highness, regarding immediate relief, and the second, regarding assistance to Turkey "as reconstituted by the war," there is, however, a gulf which is not so easy to jump over. We are glad that His Highness has not ignored this, but the gulf is there all the same, yawning and unbridged. The Ides of March have come, but they have not yet gone. If we do not misunderstand the Aga Khan he considers any expression of feeling in favour of war by Indian Mussalmans as so much irresponsible advice which only harasses Turkish statesmen and, in spite of their knowledge of the consequences of such action, drives them forward against their will to prolong the war. Now, we agree with His Highness that peace or war is primarily the concern of the Turkish people and their Government, but this is not all. We shall be disguising the truth if we suggest that any assistance sent from India to the Turks is in the main the result of any feeling of admiration for people defending their hearths and homes with patriotic zeal, or of mere humanity at the sight of so much suffering. In a sense unknown to Europe and even to Christendom, Turkey is almost as much and as little the Fatherland of Indian Mussalmans as that of the Turks themselves. Well may it be said of the Moslem:

یا کھ می گرد وطن می سر دامان تیرا

تو وہ یوسف می کہ ہر مصر می کمان تیرا

قالہ ہونہ سکی گا کبھی ویران تیرا

غیریک ہانگہ درآ کجہ نہیں سامان تیرا

(The hem of thy skirt is unpolluted with the dust of a homeland: thou art a Joseph to whom every Egypt is the land of Canaan. Thy caravan can never be plundered, for thou hast naught save the sound of the caravan bell for thy belongings.) It has been the call of faith and not of physical neighbourhood or ethnic relationship that has roused Indian Mussalmans like a trumpet blast, and if physical neighbourhood and ethnic relationship give one a claim to offer advice when circumstances demand it, surely the kinship in creed and culture, and all that Islam stands for to the Moslem, creates a no less claim. Moreover, every Moslem throughout the world owes it to his God and to His Prophet to protect the Holy Places of Islam from the hand of the aggressor, and any action of the Turks, whose Sultan has special merit in the eyes of all Moslems as the Protector of the Holy Places, which may weaken their defence, must needs concern every Moslem throughout the world. We can quote chapter and verse in support of the claim that we have discouraged more than once any tendency on the part of Indian Mussalmans to presume to dictate the policy of Turkey to those who are in a better position to judge the merits of different policies and measures. But everything has a limit, and no one has a right to treat the Mussalmans of the world as the milch cow of Turkey. If they owe a duty to Turkey they have also corresponding rights, and for our part we believe that they have every right to refuse to subscribe a shell to relieve the sufferings of others through a war in, declaring which they were never consulted and in terminating which their feelings and sentiments are to be of no account. Was it not our smug contemporary of Bombay that dived in the ocean of pretences and rescued the pin-point of reality that the mandate of Europe to Turkey to submit to those that had not conquered her had a moral sanction inasmuch as money-grabbing Europe had invested millions of its ill-gotten gains in the Ottoman Empire? And must not the voice of the Moslem World be heard in the Babel of ministerial weakness and treachery when the Moslem World has placed in the safe keeping of the Ottomans a treasure which can be lost only when every Moslem life is lost? His Highness the Aga Khan may well plead for the Sultan's discretion and for a free hand for Turkish statesman. But this plea would have had some relevance if it had preceded the great events of the 23rd January. If the Moslems of Lucknow and Lahore, of Madras and Bombay have no right to assume that Turkish Ministers and the Padishah are one whit less sensitive on the point of Moslem honour, what right has anyone to assume that in forcing Kiamil and his clique to resign and in placing Shevket Pasha and the Committee of Union and Progress in power the Turks and their Padishah have been one whit less sensible than their advocates in the English and the Anglo-Indian Press? Does His Highness really wish the Mussalmans in India to be convinced that it was the telegraphic appeals of Moslems abroad that hurried Enver Bey on horseback from Gallipoli to Constantinople—a distance of more than a hundred miles—in a single night to save the integrity of his country and the prestige of Islam, any more than these telegraphic appeals influenced Kiamil and Nuradunghian in signing away that integrity and destroying that prestige? But if they did, it is an achievement of which the journalists of any country may well be proud. For when Europe, unshamed and unclean, was commanding the Turk, in the words of a writer in the Daily Mail which we reproduce elsewhere, to do what was once unspeakable—what is still unspeakable to the "unspeakable Turk" alone of all men in Europe—namely, to yield before he was beaten, to acknowledge all lost because not all remains, to hand over his territory to an invader who shivers outside his unconquered cities, to lie down for ever because he was once or twice felled, and to tear his own flag from pinnacles which undaunted have flown, and still fly, his colours tattered by tempests of lead and of misfortune, Moslem journalists and those who felt like them the shame of this betrayal only asked Turkey to refuse to open unforced gates and level unstormed parapets at the trumpets of hosts, however Semitic, who circumambulate the walls in the hopes of a safe, miraculous and lucrative possession. This is the sin of Moslem journalists, and for this His Highness seeks the support of Tolstoy and Gladstone in order to send them to the front. We cannot speak for all, but for such as we have a right to speak for we would assure His Highness that they would love nothing better. It was one of our countrymen and a Moslem who wrote not so long ago:

آشد نیر شکسته بیا کن قلم

(When the occupation of the soldier was gone I clutched the weapon of verse, and the broken arrow of my forebears became my pen.)

To our mind it is still necessary for Indian Mussalmans to subscribe as largely as they can for healing the wounds of those who have gone to war in defence of their country and their creed and for feeding and clothing those that they have left behind whether for a time or for ever. But the problem of the moment is to assist the Turks with funds so that they may prevent with their unparalysed arms what Europe has not been able to prevent with its paralysed conscience, the lives of their children and bed-ridden parents and the shame and dishonour of their women. The blood of the martyrs and the shock to the modesty of women for whose dwelling place the Islamic World has the same word as is used to signify the House of Allah, call aloud for revenge, and the divine commandment which says that "in revenge there is life" has to be obeyed. Europe itself has laughed for centuries at the doctrine of one whose merciful disposition had pleaded for the turning of the other cheek towards the smiter. But while Islam emphasises the virtue of being forgiving, it accords with human nature, which is divine as well as human, in tempering justice with mercy and stiffening mercy with justice. It recognises the eternal and immutable principle of revenge which is the basis of all law and order. The integrity of Turkey, the security of Turkish lives and of the honour of Turkish women, and, above all, the prestige of Islam may be vindicated. But asks the Times of India: "Patriotism and honour are fine things; are they quite so fine when they are upheld by deputy? Is there anything heroic in passing frantic resolutions bidding the Sultan and his ministers go on fighting and then going home to dinner, whilst those who bear the burden and heat of the day are either starving in the trenches or gasping out their lives on the stricken field?" Are those sneers and gibes going to be justified by the inaction of Indian Mussalmans? They have talked of the fraternity of Islam; but if that brotherhood has any meaning, can they remain satisfied merely with praying for the success of Turkish arms against the foes of Islam? Is a loan of a million sterling too great a price to pay for hundreds of thousands of Moslem lives and the honour of thousands of Moslem women? Is it too much to pay for the redemption of thousands of mosques and sanctuaries which have been polluted by impious hands. We pause for an answer, but that answer must be the success or failure of the scheme of Turkey's internal loan in which Indian Mussalmans are for the first time invited to take a share. Let each Moslem only lend to his brother the Turk what he is prepared to spend unhesitatingly in order to save the life of his own brother and the honour of his brother's wife. This can be the only test of the fraternity of Islam, and those who are not prepared for this ordeal had better remove their names from the list of those to whom it was said that verily the Moslems are brothers.

His Highness the Aga Khan, however, is not content with an appeal for funds to relieve Turkish suffering and the support of the internal loan to Turkey which is needed for the war, but deals with the question: "And after?" We wish we could find it in our hearts to admire "the larger outlook" as the Times of India calls it when His Highness deals with Turkey's future. We fear His Highness the Aga Khan will not convince many Mussalmans in India that he has acted justly by the present or probed successfully into the future when he says "whatever happens, whatever the result of the last stages of this war, Turkey must in the future be an Asiatic Power; she must concentrate in Asia." Verily here is a prophet that has prophesied away the whole of European Turkey while the Ottomans still have for their Grand Vizier a soldier like Mahmud Shevket and Islam a hero like Enver Bey. With an army larger than that which we have in India entrenched behind Tehtaldja, garrisoning Gallipoli or marching towards Adrianople, an army that has not met with any reverse or serious check, but which has dealt a crushing blow to the Allies at Usunkupri, less than thirty miles from Adrianople, His Highness the Aga Khan would wish that the Turks, even after upsetting the schemes of Kiamil would themselves sign away the whole of European Turkey. And all for what? Merely that Turkey may thrive as an Asiatic Power on the disinterested goodwill, friendship and support of England, and these two may carry out in Asiatic Turkey the spirit of the Cyprus Convention and the policy of Lord Beaconsfield. Was it not a countryman of His Highness who gave away Samarkand and Bokhara, which it cost Tamerlane much effort to conquer, merely for the mole on his sweetheart's cheek? Verily poets and prophets are equally generous, when it comes to giving away kingdoms and territories watered with the blood of whole armies.

But to take the analogy a little further, we are not quite sure whether the bargain of Hafiz was not the shrewder of the two! The price on which even he insisted was that his Turk of Shiraz may conquer his heart. But we do not know whether His Highness really believes that even such a conquest would be attempted in the case of the Indian Mussalmans. It was a noble woman and a great queen who had said that in the prosperity of her subjects resident in India "will be our strength, in their contentment our security and in their gratitude our best reward." But what a world of difference between Victoria the Good and this pale grey Liberal who thinks that in helping France to usurp Morocco is his country's strength, in fawning on the Muscovite in Persia is its security and in the gratitude of the Confederates for his silence about their unspeakable crimes in Turkey is its best reward. We believe that it is not to the advantage of England that Turkey should be weak. But that applies to Turkey in Europe as well as to Turkey in Asia. Whether the Germans gain control of European Turkey or the Slavs it is equally to the detriment of Great Britain. But even assuming that it is to the advantage of England that European Turkey should be partitioned among the Allies, but that it is to her disadvantage that Germany should be in Asia Minor, Russia in Armenia and France in Syria, and also taking it for granted that it is essential for her to gain control of Arabia and make the Sherif of Mecca another Khedive, saddled with a War-Lord like him of Khartoum so that England may ride outside the two coasts of the Red Sea, what guarantee is there that, apart from any ultimatum which the Times of India is honest enough to rule out of court in international politics, the statesmen of England would be wise enough to see what England's true interest lies and strongly enough in the pursuit of that self-interest? Is the problem of imperial strategy in the Levant, along the shore of the Red Sea and on the Western littoral of the Persian Gulf more simple than that of France and its relation to our Balkan frontier? And yet His Highness does not aware that during the last two years every Turk in the Foreign Offices in London and Simla, in the Army Department in India and in the office of the Naval Commander-in-Chief for the East Indies Station has been scratched and scratched to select that knotty problem whether it is better to give up seriously built-up Perso-Baluch Frontier and wait securely behind the imaginary lines of the British sphere drawn by the Anglo-Russian Convention or, at the very worst, keep between ourselves and the Colossus of the North the marshy desert of Southern Persia? We will not be so unjust to the Government of India and to Lord Crewe as to allow it to be understood that they were not influenced by the feelings and sentiments of Indian Mussalmans towards the era of their culture and the unity of their literature. But it was more the fear of Russia utilising the occupation of the South even for a time as the surest vantage of annexing the North which she already occupied that weighed with Sir Edward Grey and his condutors. Who knows whether the fear of Germany or of Russia may lead England? And so long as the fear of a foreign nation counts for more in the councils of Great Britain than the love of Indian Mussalmans it is wholly safe to enter the realms of prophesy? To our mind it will be the most sordid transaction Indian Mussalmans used any influence which they may have acquired with the Turkish Government by their present sacrifices to induce Turkey to accept the so-called Just & Comp before it was actually accomplished. In the words of the Daily Mail writer, we would take shame on our countrymen if they joined in the enjoinery which would inveigle the victim into embracing his own infamy.

But we are glad that enjoinery is in vain. Neither could the alluring prospects of "self government within the Empire and under the Crown and Flag," and of union with their Hindu fellow-countrymen in order to secure that distant goal, induce Indian Mussalmans to ask for, nor could the dim memories of the Cyprus Convention and the shadowy figure of Lord Beaconsfield reconcile the Turks to compliance with the request that they should hand over European Turkey to Serbs and Bulgars, Greeks and Montenegrins, before the verdict of the stricken field is given and the judgment of the sword and the mightier arm pronounced. It is one of the canting conventions of a class of writers that the Turk is essentially an Asiatic and his Empire must be in Asia. Is it forgotten that he has been in Europe for no less than six centuries, and that it is a dangerous lesson to teach those who know that no European nation has been in Asia for a quarter of that period?

Need we repeat what we have said so often that nothing would please Indian Mussalmans so much as a sincere alliance between Turkey and Great Britain? But we refuse to believe that Turkey, as a European Power or Asiatic, or for the matter of that any country in the world, "can live and thrive only if she has the goodwill, friendship and the support" of any other country. Turkey can live and thrive only if she relies on herself and on the God of Turkey, and if the Turks strive like men and like true Moslems to uphold the honour and integrity of their Fatherland, and fear and sustain the God they worship. It is clear that many of them have not always done so in the past, and it is to this that they owe even their temporary reverse.

We should like to refer before we conclude this comment on the pronouncement of His Highness the Aga Khan and the Times of India to the crimes of the Allies and the attitude of Great Britain. The miseries of "that bitter tragedy called war" in Thrace and Macedonia have been redoubled by more than the two factors which the Times of India mentions, the malevolence of the seasons and the migration of a great proportion of the Moslem population. Or rather the latter of these two factors is only the effect of a cleverly suppressed cause, viz., the brutality of the enemies of Turkey and of humanity. Our contemporary accepts the tone of injured innocence in saying that "In the present mood of some Indian Moslems it is well-nigh impossible to obtain a hearing for any fair exposition of British policy," and naively asks whether it is suggested "that Great Britain should have gone to war to stave off the attack of the Balkan League on Turkey." It is not a fair challenge, for we have no Lord Crewe to be equally solicitous to save us from treading the wrong way to everlasting Andamans, and section 124A is far more brittle than the Ten Commandments at which Anglo-Indian journalists can hammer away without fear. We may, however, say this much that if Great Britain could go to war with America for Boston tea and with China for Malwa and Bengal opium, if she could challenge France over the Fashoda incident and Germany over the Moroccan Affair, it would have been more to her honour to have fought against Europe for the atrocities in Tabriz and Italy for the massacres in the Oasis of Tripoli. But even if all this was not sufficient, and the Treaty of Berlin was worth no more than Persia—too little to be the life of a single British grenadier—then at least the Allies should have led Great Britain to rattle its great guns, or move its fearfully built Dreadnoughts to frighten the Allies. Instead of that Sir Edward Grey sits silent and so every questioner in the House of Commons who would know the truth from official sources repeats the story of similar silence when allegations had been made against the Turk in Macedonia at some remote period. England could have at least asked her Lloyd Georges and her Mastermans, her Winston Churchills and her Asquiths to follow the example of her silent Sir Edward. Last of all, if England could not take sides with the Balkan League nor with Turkey, she can still take sides with honour, with love of country and stoutness of heart. But instead of loading those who have saved the honour, and may yet save the integrity of their country, with praise as the last receptacles of manhood in Europe, England and her Press are loading them with insult and indignity, and when we find our Bombay contemporary spurring a few crumbies of its approbation for Shevket Pasha and Enver Bey in a niggardly fashion, after having lavished every epithet of praise and flattery on Kiamul and his gang, we are compelled to remark that its praise, stuns the receiver more deeply than its insults and cheap sneers. But it is too late to ask what Great Britain could have done to win the love of Moslem India and assist her old ally. Let Adrianople be relieved and then we could say with the poet,

منہ جیکہ کارے پہ آگیا غالب خدا سی کیا سم و جور ناخدا کہی

Intemperance of Political Language.

THE inaugural speech of His Excellency Lord Hardinge at the first meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council in Delhi was a noteworthy utterance in many ways. We briefly dealt with some of its important passages in a recent issue, but there was one passage, the most important of all, which requires ampler and more adequate consideration. According to him,

It can only be entirely and for ever dispelled by the display and enforcement of public opinion in a determination not to tolerate the perpetration of such crimes and to treat as enemies of society not only those who commit crimes, but also those who offer any incentives to crime. Amongst such incentives to crime should be included every intemperance of political language and methods likely to influence ill-balanced minds and lead them by insidious stages to hideous crimes.

About the weight and value of these words there can be no two opinions. A strong, united and intelligent public opinion is the most salutary deterrent that a society can have against disruptive tendencies or anarchical developments. An evildoer stands abashed before the corporate conscience of a community. It very often annihilates him entirely. Again, it is manifest that a healthy public opinion would treat as enemies of society not only those who commit violent crimes, but also those who offer any incentives to crime. And it is equally plain that intemperance of political language and method may, in certain contingencies, become a direct incentive to acts of violence. It is, however, when we take into consideration the political and social conditions of Indian life, to which these general observations have to be applied, that we realise the need of a fuller explanation and analysis. What is the character of the Indian terrorism? What is the nature and strength of the public opinion that is sought to be invoked against it? What is the relation of political language and method to the general conditions of the country? These questions naturally and inevitably arise as we survey the situation in its entirety. And it would be worth while to try to find answers to these questions.

The root fact of the situation is that India is yet in the stage of political tutelage and has not evolved a self-reliant political personality. The power that presides at this process of evolution has brought to bear new standpoints, new ideas and an entirely new temperament on the execution of its task. And herein lies the seed for a vast process of change, rapid, incessant, and even painful—in fact, in all essentials, a revolution. A process of such magnitude and novelty is often subject to shocks, is full of risks and is, at any rate, never entirely free from doubts and misgivings. Those who speak of the governance of India by England as an experiment mean nothing more than that an ancient society is being sought to be revitalised through an alien inspiration. When once this fundamental fact is clearly grasped, the contradictions, the accidents, the shocks and the disappointments of the experiment cease to be surprising. India is changing—in response to an impulse that has come from without. And, under the circumstances, one has to recognise the inevitableness of the things as they are. At the dissolution of the old synthesis and with a huge society in the throes of a new birth, it is natural to hear, not the soft cooings of placid contentment, but angry questionings, shouts of fear and bitter cries of pain.

The Indian "society" is under such conditions a mere trick of expression. It has no organic mind as it has yet to create the new elements of its psychology. The mass consciousness is yet a medley of unique impressions. Indian public opinion is, therefore, a thing that has yet to become a reality. Till the Indian people have growth of a nation on the basis of common political faith and life. The nation must move confidently ahead under the impulse of a common public opinion which will not become an articulate power. The political and social life of the country will lack all conscious direction till this necessary instrument is forged. We know there exists in some form "the best mind" of India, but we know as well that it is as yet an acquisition and not a capacity, and in any case it does not as yet possess the full dynamic vitality to leaven the whole mass. It is no doubt becoming conscious and articulate and is throwing out fresh ideas and examining the foundations of its belief. Its growing attempts at self-expression are familiarly called "public opinion," although, for the sake of accuracy, they should be described as opinion in the making. One can not be unaware that, even as it is, we have to look up to this "mind" as the thing of real importance and power in the shaping of India's future. What it thinks to-day, the whole of India will begin to think to-morrow or a day after. It carries within it the germ of a full-grown, strong and united public opinion. But, till it bursts forth in flower and fruit, we will have to depend on something else as well, besides the best mind of India, in the regulation of the political and social life of the country.

In the absence of a full-grown national mind finding a complete and united expression, public opinion would naturally consist of loose, disjointed ideas reflecting themselves in many moods. Of the intellectual conditions like those of India, intemperance of thought is an inseparable accident. In the vast process of destruction going on in Indian society misunderstandings are bound to arise and many an old sentiment is sure to be hardened into a prejudice. Hard knocks and inconvenient shifts abound in the rough and tumble of a revolutionary change. Hopes and fears, faith and doubt, and joy and sorrow and pain seldom find an ideal expression in the heat of battle. In India, where a new order of things is beginning to supplant the old and modern and ancient ideals have come into sharp collision, political thinking can not be uniformly temperate. Nor is it possible, under existing conditions, to be perfectly sure that even a moderate view or opinion would seldom find an immoderate utterance. If we discount the meagre rôle of the Legislative Councils in the government of India, we have a State having little organic relation with public opinion. Even a strong, united public opinion may fail to have any appreciable weight in the guidance of Indian affairs. As long, therefore, as the will of the people, or what is more popularly styled as public opinion, remains an irresponsible factor in the conduct of public affairs, opportunities are bound to occur when it may be treated with scant attention and respect. Every such treatment would inevitably lead to increasing energy of expression. Human language is, after all, an imperfect vehicle of thought, and words charged with concentrated disappointment and bitterness are rarely of the choicest. One can not, of course, overlook the existence of individual temperaments that find relief only through explosion, just as one can not ignore individuals of low mental calibre whose sole substitute for thought is violent expression. But the political language of a community as a whole becomes intemperate simply through the abnormality of the conditions under which its political thinking is done. The conditions have been undeniably abnormal in India, and yet it is a matter of wonder that the mass of educated opinion in the country has, on the whole, been characterised with sanity and balance. Extreme violence of phrase and feeling has not been wholly absent from the views of the extremists of either school of thought,—of those who criticise the bureaucrat as a hopeless and arrogant reactionary, as well as those who condemn the Congress agitator as a rank additionist. And it must be admitted that a certain class of journalism, not much distinguished for its sense of proportion, has been preparing the soil for the growth of distempered ideas. But speaking generally, political thinking in India has been remarkably free from the taint of violent expression. Indeed, it appears astonishingly tame and sober when compared with the tirades with which politicians like Sir Edward Carson have been envenoming the contemporary politics of Great Britain. Again, it must be remembered that incentives to intemperate language are not inconsiderable in this country. A Congress orator who hammers away at a single "resolution" for nine years and still finds it a live "plank" of his platform, must be more than human if he does not burst forth at last into fierce invective. To take a recent instance, the refusal of the Secretary of State for India to allow the creation of the Muslim University on terms acceptable to the Muslims has led to a certain heated energy of language. It would, of course, be absurd to assume that Muslim discontent about an educational project of supreme importance to the community might assume a dangerous political character and, therefore, all frank reference to it should be hushed. It is the most important duty of India's rulers to keep in touch with the real feelings of the people. If those feelings happen to be very strong at a time it would be misleading the Government to attempt to steer them with a view to appear falsely moderate. The only useful source of information to Government is an independent public opinion, and not the opaque official agency of the Police.

Whatever public opinion exists in this country, and however anarchical it may be, it is the only power that will, we are sure, be started in setting the mind of the Indian government on its feet. Every intemperance of political language and methods that supplies a direct incentive to such crimes deserves censure and condemnation and should not be tolerated. Anarchism in this country is, as we have said on many occasions, a particularly ugly growth and may not be stamped out entirely. The safest course is to remove the causes that feed it and to apply to the government of India those courageous and liberal principles which will in due course evoke from a dull, inert mass a conscious, self-reliant and strong political personality. That is the supreme task of India's rulers. For, an enlightened public opinion based on the identity of ideals between the society and the State, will furnish the most effective weapon to cope with lawlessness, sedition and terrorism. It is hopeful to think that such public opinion is in process of creation. But political alcoholism in Indian journals and on Indian platforms is so often the result of ill-judged opinions expressed about Indians in the English and the Anglo-Indian Press, and the foolhardiness and obstinacy of prestige-mongers and upholders of settled facts, that their provocations must be checked if intemperance of political language in Indians is to be fully controlled.

The All-India Medical Mission.

We publish below another letter of Dr. Ansari received by the Mail which reached here on the 8th instant :—

Constantinople, Jan. 20.

I received your letter after a long wait, and I assure you it was very welcome. You would have learnt by now about the telegrams which I sent from Suez to the P. S. V. about the horrible outrage on His Excellency. It must have shocked everybody in India and caused no end of anxiety to the people in Delhi. However, the Viceroy is getting well, and I hope that the culprit would soon be found and punished for this dastardly attempt on the life of Lord Hardinge.

I have not yet seen the Grand Vizier, nor have I forwarded your cheque to the Sublime Porte. In future I would advise you strongly to send all remittances either to me or to the Cretissant Rouge Ottomane. I am convinced that this is the only institution in this country which has done any good work to lessen the sufferings of the emigrants.

I have thought over your scheme very carefully and think it not only very sound but most practical. The Mission can very easily be divided into two units, one working at the Omerli Hospital and the other either in the front (in case of war) or in Anatolia where most of the emigrants have been sent. In the latter condition, which seems to me most likely, our work would be just as useful as in the case of war. The section in Anatolia would have a house rented for the purpose for the hospital and dispensary. And the chief feature of the work of this section would be home to home visits not only to treat the patients there and to supply them with the necessary medicines in their homes, but also to furnish them with food and necessary clothing, and, when the bread-winners are cured, to help them with a small sum and start them on their work. I think this would be a far greater work than half a dozen field-hospitals. Of course, we shall have to have an office in Constantinople where the Manager and I would work and we shall visit the two hospitals alternately every other week and keep regular registers and accounts of the relief thus undertaken by us.

Both the Manager and myself have visited the Croissant Rouge and have had long interviews with Resim Omer Pasha, Vice-President and the real worker in this institution, as well as Mehmet Ali Bey, Inspector-General, and several other men who are doing good work for the Society. We have gathered every possible information regarding their work and have come to the conclusion that, although they are by no means very quick in their undertakings or progress in their organization, they have done a vast amount of work during this war. We have induced them to publish an account of their work in the form of a booklet and also the total amount of money received from India upto the present time. I think they are going to do it shortly. We have visited their stores and their work-room where the ladies sew linen, underclothing, stockings, etc., etc., for the patients and the emigrants. We have also seen for ourselves the manner in which clothes, blankets, and other necessary articles are distributed to the different sections of the emigrant population encamped round about Constantinople. And, although we have not been able to visit the tent camps, we know on good authority that good, wholesome and nutritious food is cooked and supplied twice daily to the emigrants. There is a certain class of emigrants who have run away from their homes with their families and effects and have been supplied with food and clothing daily for themselves and the animals. It seems that the found that no male members among the emigrants are given any money or clothing, unless they are ill as that would be an inducement for idleness. These are sent away to different parts of Anatolia or are supplied with work in Constantinople. For this work they have divided Stamboul into various sections or areas, each area being worked by one local man who prepares a list of the different families of the emigrants with their needs. The Central Office sends one of its members with food, clothing, bedding, etc., according to the requirements, to be distributed in the presence of this member and marked off in the registers. It is interesting to note that nearly all the workers of the Croissant Rouge, whether they are gentlemen or ladies, belong to the Party of Union and Progress. An important section of the organization of the Croissant Rouge is a bureau which supplies clothing, food and other necessities to the Turkish prisoners in the hands of the Balkan Confederacy and as much news as is permissible to their relations in Turkey.

Our idea is to work in co-operation with the Croissant Rouge, although we shall keep our own register and our own employees for the relief work. I would be very glad if you would let me know your opinion about this scheme.

I may mention also that the chief medical officers and managers for the two sections would, in my opinion, be quite capable of directing and managing the affairs of their sections. To make matters sure, you would see that I would be myself visiting the two sections every alternate week for doing important operations, auditing their accounts and directing them in other matters.

As regards blankets and clothing I had a long talk with Beasim Omar Pasha, and I think he is right in preferring money to ready-made clothes or blankets. As by the time these reach Turkey it would be spring time, the need for blankets would not be so urgent and the clothing will have to be supplied according to the climate. Moreover, I don't think that except under-clothing anything else made in India would at all be used by the people here, as their clothes are so entirely different.

The great event of the week has been a visit from Enver Bey. He came to visit us in the hospital where we are staying. He is only a young man of about 35, exceedingly handsome, with most expressive eyes full of determination. His demeanour was that of a very strong man, chastened with hardships and sufferings. It was quiet and yet characteristic, modest and yet commanding respect. A man who is born to command and to elicit implicit faith and admiration from those who work under him. He spoke with a certain reserve and expressed his appreciation of our work for his countrymen. It was a thousand pities that the difficulty of the language prevented talking to him at length. After a visit to the wards a group was taken and he departed.

I had another occasion of seeing Madame Halide Edib, who was as interesting as ever. She promised to become a contributor to the Comrade as soon as things had settled down in Turkey. We gave a few copies of the Comrade for distribution among her friends.

I have had to make some additions in the personnel of the Mission, as it was absolutely unavoidable. From the very beginning we had foreseen the necessity of employing interpreters, and our experience has only convinced us of this urgent need. I have secured the services of Dr. Fikad Bey who is the best interpreter (apart from his being a medical man) I have come across in Constantinople. We shall have to pay him a good salary which has not been definitely fixed, but will be between £6 and £8 a month. Dr. Fikad knows English and Turkish perfectly and is an Egyptian. I have also secured the services of two dragomen, both Indian, who can speak Turkish fairly well, on a salary of five Medjidieh, which come to about Rs. 12-8-0 a month. These men will be useful in getting out the history from the patient, and other general work. An Egyptian boy, Mahmood Mashar, of a respectable family, has joined us as a volunteer without any salary. He has been a student in the Mercantile Naval School and has been a volunteer also. He is willing to serve in any capacity with our Mission. Knowing English and Turkish fairly well, he is a very useful addition to the Mission.

I have met Sheikh Abdul Aziz Chawish and found him a very interesting personality. He is full of schemes for reviving the Arabic literature and language.

It is with a great sigh of relief that I am writing to you about the departure of a portion of our equipment to Omerli in charge of two of our men. I am going there to-morrow with four other men in order to get all the tents pitched and the other arrangements made for camp. I hope within three days to return to Constantinople and go back with the remaining articles and the members of the Mission. I cannot tell you what difficulties are placed in our way here even in arranging a small matter. Our things have all arrived last week, and in any other country but Turkey everything would have been arranged in a day or two.

CONFERENCE

Red Crescent Fund and Mr. Ameer Ali.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—As recently several sums of money have been sent to me from India for transmission to the President of the Ottoman Red Crescent in Constantinople, I beg to inform the Mussalman public through your columns that I cannot undertake such agency work.

I have the full administration of the British Red Crescent charity in my hands which imposes on me an enormous amount of anxious work, as the area of distress which we are trying to relieve is extensive and the suffering and destitution appalling.

No other organisation has attempted to touch even the fringe of this area of distress and the whole burden has fallen upon us.

2, Cadogan Place, S. W.

Yours very truly,

31st January, 1913.

AMEER ALI.

[We shall be glad to undertake the task which the Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali is unable to carry out, and we have decided to devote our Turkish Relief Fund to the maintenance of the All-India Medical Mission in Turkey and the support of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society which has done such excellent work.—Ed., Comrade.]

Moslem Problems.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I have read with much interest your refreshing views on the supreme problem of finding out "the true basis" for our renaissance and the goal of our ideals. In any scheme of social reconstruction, broad-based on such solid foundations as would ensure the physical, intellectual, political and economic strength of Muslim communities, the dominating factor, as tested and proved by the concordant experience of all progressive nations, must remain the relative position of man and woman in our national life, and if either of these two constituents of our being be lacking in efficiency and vigour, the whole mechanism of our society must fail in achieving any high purpose or in maintaining our position in the strenuous struggle for survival. The slothfulness and sickly apathy which have settled upon Muhammadan races, and which threaten to become embedded in the very fibre of their national life, cannot be eradicated without imbuing Moslem womanhood with that vitalising energy—the offspring of a healthy and active life—which is essential for the building up of sturdy and vigorous races of men fitted to revive the vanishing glories of Islam. I have briefly touched upon the predominant aspect of this socio-physiological question in my previous letters, to which you have courteously extended the hospitality of your columns, and I now venture to refer to some other causes, which have combined to bring about our decline and which seem to call for the serious consideration of all leaders of Muslim thought. These may be broadly grouped under the following heads.—(I) Educational, (II) Economic, (III) Political, (IV) Religious.

As regards (I), our co-religionists have not yet evolved in any Muhammadan country an adequate system of education suited to the changed and changing conditions of the world. They still pathetically cling to the outworn and obsolescent courses of study and formulae, which usefully served the requirements of a dead past, but which are as ineffective to-day as Nelson's victorious flag-ship would be in encountering a Dreadnought. The natural result is a pitiful waste of brain-power and intellectual stagnancy. Even the Muhammadans of India, who have been dragged from their comparative backwardness into considerable educational activity by the example of other communities, the inspiring patriotism of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan and the special encouragement of the British Government, have yet to make up a great deal of leeway especially in the domain of modern science. It is very discouraging that at the present moment some of our prominent men, oblivious of the example of Sir Syed Ahmad, are developing such reactionary tendencies as to seriously think of breathing new life into the dry bones of an out-of-date culture, which had nobly served its purpose in mediæval times, but is now like scrap iron, except, of course, in regard to Islamic history, our immortal classics and our personal law. The inadequately equipped and much neglected Science School at Aligarh is practically a sterile institution, and our students, on whom the hopes and aspirations of our community are centred, are, with very few exceptions, content generally to confine their mental horizon, both in India and in Europe, to the study of law and literature. I do not minimise the great importance of a legal or literary training, but it is to be regretted that Muhammadan students have not yet realised the value of unlocking the vast treasures which science has placed within their reach. The laurels, which this youthful branch of human knowledge wears, transcend in their triumphs all that has hitherto been achieved by mankind since the dawn of learning. Though the dictum of Herbert Spencer, that "the only proper preparation for citizenship is the scientific preparation," be appraised at its lowest value and the very recent pronouncement of Dr. T. P. Nunn, "that man's achievements were what they were very largely because of those facts of human effort that were called scientific," be heavily discounted, it cannot be gainsaid that no nation can expect to maintain its position in the world, except on precarious sufferance, without an adequate and up-to-date scientific equipment. Had the Turks developed a capacity to build even a couple of battleships of the latest type and to produce a few efficient aviators, a mighty and historic Empire might not have collapsed like a house built on sand, and the appalling misery which has overwhelmed millions of human beings would have been averted. Let our young men ask themselves seriously and honestly whether any amount of legal or metaphysical lore and literary or philosophical renown can save us from being trampled under the heel of the giants, which the creative genius of the men of science has brought into being. If the answer is in the affirmative, as it must be, it is incumbent on our leading educationalists in all parts of the Muslim world to elaborate a scheme of education in which the New Learning, especially scientific, has the place it has fully established its right to hold, and not to delude themselves with any illusions as to the effete intellectual ideals which were suited to a by-gone age, but which are as valueless now as spent cartridges. Our antiquated theories and conceptions of cosmic phenomena, of physical ailments and their causation, of the forces of nature, et hoc genus omne, which were also theories and conceptions of other nations before the advance of positive knowledge, are such as to do incalculable harm to plastic minds and developing intellects by giving them a wrong twist at an impressionable age and should not be allowed to encumber even the lumber-room of youthful memory.

In connection with the scientific training of our students I would invite the attention of our community to the encouraging results of the schemes started by our Hindu and Parsi fellow-subjects for the technological and industrial education of Indians in foreign countries, where the facilities and appliances requisite for that purpose are far in advance of those available in India. Is it too much to expect our wealthy and patriotic Muslim brethren to do for their community what a small band of far-seeing Bengali gentlemen and the late Mr. Jinnahji Tata have done to advance the bounds of India's progress and prosperity?

Before we aspire to rise to the altitude of the energetic nations who are making modern history, the ground work of a productive primary and secondary educational system, including well-equipped and efficient training institutions for Muhammadan masters and mistresses, will have to be prepared and strengthened with the help and co-operation of Government. The educational authorities will no doubt upon the door of financial assistance when it is knocked at. If this task is considered too vast for the efforts of a community, which is not abundantly blessed with worldly riches, our Anjuman, League, Conferences and other public bodies, under the guidance of our leaders, should endeavour to bring about the desired result by urging the special needs of our community upon the attention of Government, whose responsiveness to our requirements has often been manifested in various ways.

As I have already exceeded the ordinary limits of a letter, I shall crave your indulgence to revert to the subject on a future occasion.

Yours faithfully,

A MUSLIM LADY.

Muhammadans and the Allahabad Law College.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—We fully expected the letter which appeared over the signatures of K. S. in the Leader some time ago, and also anticipated its characteristic reasoning. K. S. assumes that "efficiency and interest of education," could only be served by giving the newly-created Law Readerships to the L.L. B's of the Indian Universities—he might as well have added—"provided they were Hindus." Of course being an L.L. B. or an L.L. D. of a British University is a disqualification especially if the holder of such a degree happens to be a Muhammadan and a Barrister. K. S. may not know, but the fact remains that Messrs. Sulaiman and Muhammad Raof were certainly among the applicants. Then, again, we do not know why notice of the meeting was not given to the Muhammadan members of the Law College Committee. We have also been unable to find out why after the first batch of candidates had been examined recourse was had to a process similar to that of creating new Peers in English politics to swamp the Opposition. We do not believe in mutual advertisement or in an indecent display of University degrees. Mr. Haider's qualifications as well as those of Mr. Sulaiman speak for themselves. But we can readily understand why Mr. Haider's lecture did not strike K. S. as "the most impressive or the most instructive." For, experience has taught us that there is such a thing as unconscious and instinctive prejudice which refuses to see any good in others. The ratiocination which condemned Mr. Haider's lecture must have been similar to that which for ages so jealously and successfully prevented any Muhammadan from being elected to the Local Legislative Council until the new Regulations of the enlarged Councils rescued Muhammadans from their unmerited obscurity. Another interesting object lesson is supplied by the Municipal and District Boards, which tell their own tale, of the justice and fairness shown to Muhammadans by their generous Hindu "friends" and countrymen. As to the general opinion among the students that Messrs. Banerji and Chaudhri would be selected, one is at a loss to understand whether K. S. makes his case stronger or weaker by referring to the intelligent anticipation of these young men. We think that he exactly supports our case, for, as already stated, we, too, on our part, were equally certain even before the lecture was delivered that a Muhammadan at any rate would never be selected. It is natural for K. S. to talk of "efficiency and interest of education" when Muhammadan candidates of high attainments happened to be in the field, but these Pecksniffian ideas never seem to have occurred to anybody when the Law College appointments used to be conferred, as a matter of course, upon persons who had influential friends or relations to support them. At present with the exception of Dr. Weir's lectures, which are universally appreciated for their learning and scholarship, we doubt whether the Law College suffers from too many "impressive" or "instructive" or even audible lectures. One lecture is usually full of sound and fury meaning nothing, another is—simply nothing. About a third, it is not easy to say anything because so few can hear it. No one can doubt for one moment the absolute integrity and high character of Dr. Weir, but we are afraid the learned Doctor did not sufficiently realize that he was in India, where Europeans in responsible positions have always to be vigilant to see that no one suffers on account of his race or creed. We certainly wish all British officers, who occupy positions of trust and responsibility in this country, to study not only Muslim politics but also the policy of that powerful but silent organisation, whose aggressive and widespread activities drove the Moslems, purely out of the natural instinct of self-preservation, to form the Moslem League six years ago and to seek the direct protection of British justice and fairness. We do not wish for one moment that any incompetent person, whatever his race or creed, should be favoured in any way or that the interests of the Law College should be disregarded. But we do most respectfully trust and hope that the large-minded, sympathetic and just Chancellor of the Allahabad University would graciously see that the University and the Law College are not treated as mere appendages to the ancient Hindu University.

A MUHAMMADAN ORIENTALIST.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Feb. 3.

It is reported that the Turkish fleet took part in an action south of Kavar River. Its fire, however, was ineffective.

Turks from Tchataldja endeavoured to cross the Karasu River, but were repulsed with heavy loss.

The bombardment of Adrianople continues.

Two Greek naval officers made a flight in a hydro-aeroplane from Lemnos yesterday. They reconnoitred the Turkish warships and the fortifications of the Dardanelles and Gallipoli and dropped four bombs after which they returned in safety having covered 112 miles in two hours and twenty minutes. They described the peninsula as a vast military arsenal. According to Constantinople reports the bombs from the aeroplane fell into the sea and on shore exploding harmlessly.

A Constantinople telegram published at midnight states that an official announcement states that the enemy continue their retirement from Tchataldja. There have been several fights, one of which, in the vicinity of Palais, developed into a severe battle. All ended in the retreat of the enemy.

A Turkish warship bombarded the enemy from Buyukchekmedje.

Later.

The bombardment of Adrianople continues night and day, but the damage has been unimportant. The courage and vigour of the garrison are admirable.

The enemy erecting fortifications on the heights south of the village of Xamilon in the vicinity of Gallipoli were cannonaded by the Turkish army and fleet.

It is semi-officially denied in Sofia that the Serbian reinforcements are going to Thrace where the Bulgarians do not require assistance.

M. Venizelos arrived at Salonica yesterday and was welcomed by the authorities and a crowd of thirty thousand. In a speech M. Venizelos predicted that the war would speedily terminate in the defeat of the Turks and lasting peace.

The Rumanian Minister at Sofia has been instructed to resume negotiations on the frontier question and also to urge upon Bulgaria the necessity for a speedy settlement.

A Cetinje telegram states that King Nicholas received the Malissori at Gruda. The proceedings were full of enthusiasm. Three thousand Malissori have joined the Montenegrins outside Scutari.

A Sofia telegram states that King Ferdinand has gone to the headquarters of the Army.

Later.

Yesterday's Greek aviation exploit was a remarkable achievement. Lieutenant Montomais and Moraitis left Lemnos on the hydro-aeroplane at nine in the morning ascending to three thousand feet. They circled for the European coast of the Dardanelles. They circled twice over Nagara and twice traversed the straits. The Turkish fleet was near Nagara and was seen with great distinctness. Little puffs of smoke and flashes showed that guns were being fired. The aeronauts reconnoitred thoroughly the Turkish encampments and dropped four bombs upon the arsenal. They returned by a zigzag course the way they came and encountered the Greek destroyer "Veleo" between Lemnos and Leros. They descended in the sea and the aeronauts went on board the "Veleo" which took the hydro-aeroplane in tow. The officers say that the success of the expedition exceeded all expectations and proved the utility of the hydro-aeroplane to the navy.

Sofia reports that the Turks yesterday advanced from Tchataldja in three columns, the first, consisting of six battalions, advanced against Arnaukeni under cover of the guns of the fort and two companies and two torpedo boats in Buyukchekmedje Bay. The Bulgarians made a counter-attack and drove the Turks towards Buyukchekmedje Bridge. Two battalions of Turks from Buyukchekmedje found the artillery too hot for them and retired beyond the Karasu River. The Bulgarians attacked with the bayonet a single Turkish regiment from Guktohal which retreated in disorder, leaving dead and wounded. The Turks' attempts in the Derkiza district also failed. The Bulgarian aeroplanes throughout the fighting reconnoitred the Tchataldja line. The bombardment of Adrianople continues.

According to a Podgoritz message King Nicholas ordered a general advance against Scutari and viewed the bombardment from the hill top. Uncovering his head the King prayed "May God give victory to my brave people." The bands played the Montenegrin National Anthem and the scene was most impressive.

The Serbian artillery was effective in silencing the Turkish battery at Muselim, which the Montenegrin infantry stormed and captured. The Turks made a sortie to the west of Scutari, but were repulsed. The Montenegrin guns sank two Turkish steamers in the lake.

A Belgrade message states that the Servians are actively engaged at Scutari and are meeting with considerable success. The scarcity of news from Thrace is causing dissatisfaction in view of the large numbers of Servians engaged.

London, Feb. 10.

A Constantinople message says that official despatches state that skirmishes continue at Tchataldja, but that the situation is unchanged. The infantry and cavalry on the Turkish left are harassing the enemy.

Fighting continues in the vicinity of Gallipoli, between the Turks at Bulair and the Bulgarians at Xamilon.

Great military activity prevails in Constantinople. Four big transports and a number of tugs and barges left on Friday night southwards. The departure is evidently connected with a plan for landing an expeditionary column near Rodosto.

It is reported that the Allies are advancing in strength against Bulair.

The Greek fleet appeared in the Gulf of Saros on Friday.

The retirement of the Bulgarian front from Tchataldja to Tchorlu strengthens the belief that the Allies intend to concentrate their efforts against the Dardanelles.

A letter from Mr. Roosevelt to Dr. Danef has been published at Sofia paying a tribute to Bulgarian bravery and patriotism. Mr. Roosevelt declares that their victories have delivered civilised humanity from the burden of Turkish domination and insists that Adrianople must be given up to the Bulgarians.

M. Venizelos is making a several days' stay at Salonica. He has been received by officials and fêted and has lunched with Their Majesties.

A well attended meeting of Turkish women was held at Stamboul to consider means for aiding in national defence. Patriotic speeches were made, and many ladies gave the jewellery which they were wearing towards the defence fund. It is stated that trinkets worth two thousand sterling were collected and that more were promised.

Two hundred houses in the Arsenal quarter have been destroyed by fire at Constantinople. Sailors from foreign warships helped to extinguish the flames.

A Turkish aeroplane reconnoitred over Tchataldja and discovered that the Bulgarians retiring from that front had deceived the enemy by means of clay dummies wearing military cap.

A Sofia message states that King Ferdinand and the princes and the ministers of finance and railways have left Dimotika en route for Dedesgatch.

A Sofia message states that six divisions of the Turks on Saturday attacked the Bulgarians before Bulair where the line of forts crosses the neck of the Gallipoli peninsula. They were repulsed, leaving an enormous number of killed and wounded.

At nightfall twenty Turkish vessels began landing troops at Shar-Kol, fifteen miles to north-east of Bulair. They were almost immediately attacked and driven back to the ships with considerable losses.

All attempt of the Turks to assume the offensive at Tchataldja have been checked. An attempt to land a force at Podima on the Black Sea fourteen miles south-east of Midia was repulsed, the Turks leaving fifty dead.

A Constantinople telegram states that two warships have destroyed the enemy's positions at Silivri, forty-three miles westward of Constantinople. An infantry landing was effected at Akburn. Part of the troops proceeded to Bogados on the coast thirty-six miles west of Constantinople.

It is declared that the reconnaissance from Tchataldja has reached Cherkasskai, twenty-five miles to the north-westward.

A Podgoritz telegram states that three days desperate fighting has taken place at Scutari and the Montenegrins admit having suffered terrible losses. Last night the height of Great Bardanjoli dominating Scutari from the east was taken by storm.

The "Hamidiye" passed Port Said to-day returning to the Mediterranean.

Later.

News from the seat of war confirms the official despatches, which are mostly brief and mutually contradictory. The one thing certain is that the Turkish treasury is empty.

London, Feb. 11.

It is officially stated in Cetinje that the Montenegrins' loss at Bardanjoli was 2,500 killed and wounded, while four thousand Turks dead and wounded were found on the battlefield. There has also been fierce fighting for the last three days at Tarabosh, and the battle still continues.

A Sofia telegram states that the Bulgarian losses at Bulair on Saturday were five officers and 412 men wounded and two officers and some men killed. The Turks suffered enormous losses, their death roll including twenty officers, while they also lost many quick-fires, rifles and stores.

Hakki Pasha, a former Grand Vizier, leaves Constantinople to-day for Vienna, Paris, London, and Berlin on a special mission.

A Sofia message states that after repulsing all Turkish attacks except near Salnamora where the Turks were supported by warships the Bulgarians have retired to fresh positions some six kilometres to the rear. Their losses were insignificant. The Turks lost fifty officers and five thousand men dead and double that number wounded. Their losses were mainly due to shell fire. The Bulgarians are entrenching before Bulair.

The Bulgarians also report having inflicted losses of several thousand on the force which landed at Shar-Koi.

A Constantinople manifesto on behalf of the women of Turkey addressed to the Army declares that if the soldiers retreat they cannot return to their homes unless they trample under foot the Moslem women, who are ready to die for their country, religion and honour.

Thousands of sturdy well-equipped troops are pouring in from Asia. Government appears to be calm and resourceful. Two troopships filled with enthusiastic troops have left daily for several days past for secret destinations.

London, Feb. 12.

A Constantinople message says that the Turks made a sortie from Adrianople on the 9th instant and captured at the point of the bayonet a Bulgarian position in the Deliden Hills, inflicting severe losses. The message adds: Our troops at Tchataldja have joined hands at Papaburgas. They attacked the enemy occupying the heights to the west and captured the Bulgarians, only ten of latter escaping. Our cavalry has occupied Pighados (Boghados?).

A Belgrade telegram states that the Government organ Samoupravu announces that the dispute between Bulgaria and Rumania has ended in a compromise.

A Kustenji message reports that the Turkish ironclad Assari Tewfik is badly ashore on the rocks south of Midia. Salvage steamers proceeding to her assistance have been fired on by the Bulgarians, who are holding the coast in strength.

France has made urgent representations to Bulgaria to allow French nationals to leave Adrianople.

It is reported from Constantinople that Hakki Pasha visited the British Ambassador prior to the departure for London. He will break his journey at Vienna to see Count von Berchtold. There have been conversations between Sir Edward Grey and Tewfik Pasha on the subject of peace for some days past, but nothing definite has been arranged. It is still felt that no diplomatic development is likely pending a decisive military action.

A Sofia telegram states that the Government has issued a statement repudiating the "fabrics" invented in Constantinople regarding Turkish victories and declaring that hitherto only two landings have been attempted by the Turks, namely, at Podima and Shar-Koi, both of which were repulsed. There has been no important engagement at Tchataldja. With reference to the operations in Gallipoli the statement declares that the Turks lost over fifteen thousand in the battle of Bulair, where the Bulgarians have hitherto buried 2,500 dead Turks, and three thousand are still scattered on the battle-field. King Ferdinand has expressed his warm thanks to the seventh Division, which routed six Turkish divisions, the latter being supported by the fire of the Turkish fleet.

It appears that two Turkish divisions were landed at Shar-Koi taking two days to disembark. The Bulgarians on the morning of the 3rd day fiercely attacked the Turks, who fled in panic. In the afternoon the Turks regained the shore with difficulty. They were hotly pursued by infantry and cavalry with mountain guns and the re-embarkation was carried out in the greatest disorder under the guns of the warship which afterwards steamed away hurriedly.

A Sofia telegram states that in the fighting at Shar-Koi on Monday the Turks lost over a thousand men and the Bulgarians only sixty. The bombardment of Adrianople continues intermittently.

A Constantinople message says that the greatest importance attaches to the expedition column under Enver Bey comprising about sixty thousand of all arms who were safely landed at Eregli under the guns of the fleet. The Bulgarians have apparently retired to the Ergene lines, where there is every prospect of a general engagement. The troops advancing from Tchataldja will co-operate with Enver Bey. Several hundred Circassians were despatched to the coast at Midia where they were landed to form bands to harass the Bulgarian communications. The first attempt failed as the men were ambushed and practically wiped out.

London, Feb. 16.

Renter learns that Tewfik Pasha some days ago asked for the intervention of the Powers in the interest of Peace. He was told that until Turkey submitted proposals likely to be acceptable intervention was impossible.

It is believed that Hakki Pasha is the bearer of fresh proposals. The Ambassadors sitting yesterday were wholly occupied with Turkey's request.

A Constantinople telegram states that a violent cannonade continued all day yesterday at Adrianople. Bulgarian aeroplanes dropped bombs into the town. Heavy fighting has taken place in the Gallipoli peninsula, but no details have yet been received.

It is officially declared that the Turkish losses at Bulair did not exceed eight hundred and that the Bulgarians did not gain an inch, but only held their ground. They are now fortifying their position.

It is understood in Bukharest that Bulgaria has offered Rumania further concessions on the Black Sea coast and that Rumania has abandoned her claims to Silistria.

London, Feb. 14.

A Constantinople telegram states that the enemy made a surprise attack on Adrianople yesterday morning. The battle lasted two and a half hours, but left the position unchanged. The bombardment continues in a feeble manner.

In the Commons Mr. Guinness called attention to the reports of the Serbian troop massacres at Prisrend after the occupation of the town.

Sir Edward Grey referred to his previous answers on the subject.

Mr. Guinness thereupon asked whether Sir Edward Grey could reassure Britains Moslem subjects by expressing horror and in well-authenticated cases by making friendly representations to Allies.

Sir Edward Grey replied: "Of course such statements must be most painful to me. Whenever our consuls have sent such reports I have brought them to the notice of the Government concerned and expressed the expectation that it would put an end to such happenings. The Bulgarian and Serbian Governments have replied that any such outrages will be punished, but so far as they know they have been committed by irregular hands."

A Malta message states that the Turkish warship "Hamidiye" has arrived there owing to stress of weather. It is believed that her destination is the Ionian Sea. In any case she will not return to Constantinople. She will have to leave within twenty-four hours unless she is damaged. The arrival of the vessel has caused great excitement among the Greek community who have proceeded to the harbour to watch her.

A Constantinople message says that the Sultan has congratulated the troops on their recent successes.

News from the Turkish Sources.

The following telegram was received by the Consul-General for Turkey in Bombay on 10th February, 1913.

"Sublime Porte, Constantinople, 10th February. Small encounters have taken place beyond Tchataldja line. Our left wing exercises pressure on the enemy. There were skirmishes without result at Xanthi and Gallipoli. Adrianople continues to repulse courageously the attacks of the enemy. The fire opened by the warships Idelic and Messini has destroyed the positions of the enemy."

on the coast of Silyve. Our cavalry has advanced as far as Courn Burgas. Landings of the Infantry have taken place at Atash Bournum, a part of which has gone to Bizudon."

The following cable was received from Dr. Ansari, Director of the All-India Medical Mission to Turkey, by the Comrade on the 12th February, 1913:—

Turkish victory Uzunkepri 35,000 Bulgarians killed. Sortie from Adrianople demolished enemy's battery. Captured ammunition. Relief imminent. Outlook glorious. Arranged free news.

The following is a translation of a message received from the special agent of the Habul Matin of Calcutta at Constantinople: The patriotic feelings of Turkish men and women know no bounds. Jewellery, apparel and cereals are offered enthusiastically. Thousands of volunteers enter the theatre of war daily, while sturdy Asiatic troops are arriving constantly. In Janina the Greeks have been repulsed so heavily that they cannot raise their heads soon. After five days fighting, in which the enemy suffered a loss of twelve thousand, Scutari is free from siege. The Turkish army at Tchataldja is marching vigorously to Lule Burgas. The Bulgarians have suffered enormous losses and it is expected to raise the siege any moment. The Turks are planning to envelop the invaders in Adrianople. In Gallipoli, in spite of enormous losses, the labours of the enemy are abortive.

The Collective Note

At three o'clock in the afternoon on the 17th Jan. the six Ambassadors went to the Sublime Porte and handed the Minister for Foreign Affairs a Collective Note.

The Sabah summarized as follows the information it had obtained on the three essential points of the Note:—

10. The Powers recommend the Sublime Porte to renounce its point of view concerning Adrianople; in other words they counsel the cession of the town.

20. The Ottoman Government is advised to leave to the Powers the solution of the question of the Aegean islands.

30. If Turkey favourably receives the above proposals, Europe will give her material and moral support. In the contrary case the Powers will decline all responsibility for the eventual consequences of the resumption of hostilities.

As regards the Aegean islands, we understand that the Note contains an assurance to the effect that the decision of the Powers will be such as not to endanger in any way the Asiatic possessions of the Empire.

The Ikdam says the Note of the Powers contains certain passages amounting to veiled threats. The Porte is informed that the Powers desire the prompt acceptance of their proposal concerning Adrianople and the Aegean islands. The Powers add that all the responsibility resulting from a delay in the acceptance of these proposals will fall on the Ottoman Government. They explain further that a refusal on the part of Turkey would lead to consequences prejudicial to universal peace and that Turkey would have nothing to gain from the results of an eventual general conflagration.

The Grand Council.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Jan. 22.

The Government has issued the following statement:—

"To-day the Grand Council, composed of Senators, the leading Ulama, and other military and civil dignitaries, met in the Imperial Palace. The Grand Vizier and the Ministers for War, Foreign Affairs, and Finance having given certain explanations in the name of the entire Cabinet, a frank and sincere exchange of views followed with regard to the situation of the Government. The Council fully accepted the point of view of Government, and, trusting in the sentiments of justice of the Great Powers, left to the patriotic hands of a loyal Cabinet the task of working, with the effective support which has been promised by the Great Powers for the future prosperity of the country and for the assurance of its vital financial interests."

THE PERSONS.

The Grand Council assembled at the Palace of Dolma Baghtche at noon. There were present: some 25 Senators, including Prince Said Halid, Chief of the Committee of Union and Progress, and some 40 other civil and military dignitaries. Prince Yusuf Izz-ed-

Din, the Heir-Apparent, and several of the senior members of the Imperial Family were present at the meeting, but did not take part in the debate.

After the Sultan had given audience to the Heir-Apparent and to two other Princes, he summoned the Grand Vizier, who was ordered to open the deliberations of the Council in the name of the Sultan. Kiamil Pasha accordingly entered the great reception hall of the Palace, where the members of the Grand Council were assembled, and, after saluting the Council in the name of the Sultan, opened the proceedings by explaining the functions of the "Grand Divan." The assembly, he said, was purely proposed to give an exposé of the situation and to explain its policy to the principal dignitaries of the Empire, who represented the Ottoman people. After the Grand Vizier had ceased his secretary, Said Bey, read a translation of the Collective Note of the Powers. The Ministers of War, Finance, and of Foreign Affairs then made their statements concerning the situation of the Empire as viewed from the standpoint of their respective Ministries. The meeting was held with closed doors, and therefore it is impossible to give more than the merest sketch of their speeches.

Nazim Pasha is believed to have informed the Council that while the Army was now in excellent condition it was not powerful enough to undertake a war of reconquest. The Navy had done its best, but nothing more could be hoped from that quarter. Abder-Rahman Bey described the financial situation in gloomy colours. Nuradunghian Effendi's speech was read for him by Said Bey. In it the Foreign Minister expressed the opinion that in the present circumstances the Government would be compelled to follow the advice of the Powers. He appears to have laid stress upon the menacing attitude of Russia, and upon the dangers to which the Ottoman Empire would be exposed in the event of a renewal of the war. He concluded by requesting the Council to give its opinion in clear and decisive terms.

It soon became evident that the majority of the Council supported the Government. Speeches in this sense were delivered by the Hodja Assim Effendi, Damad Ferid Pasha, Marshal Fâid Pasha, Aristidi Pasha, Logotheti Bey, the ex-Grand Viziers, their Highnesses Said Pasha and Ghazi Ahmed Mukhtar Pasha, and by Reshid Akif Pasha, whose speech made a profound impression. The Procurator-General, Ismail Hakki Bey, alone spoke in favour of war. Neither Prince Said Hishm nor any other of the members of the Committee present opposed the Government.

At 4-10 Kiamil Pasha declared the meeting over. He had sat during the meeting between the Sheikh-ul-Islam and his old opponent "Kutchuk" Said Pasha. At the close of the meeting the Grand Vizier gave his hand to Said Pasha and asked him to forget past quarrels in this hour of national tribulation. Said Pasha answered him cordially, and the two aged statesmen walked out of the Council room hand in hand—a symbol, thus, of the general reconciliation that is necessary if the Ottoman Empire is to profit by the lessons of the last three years.

The Council of Ministers will meet to-morrow to discuss the Turkish answer to the Collective Note. It is believed that the Porte will request the Powers, as reported yesterday, to guarantee that no further demands will be made on the part of the Balkan League, and on the receipt of such a guarantee will be ready to comply with their wishes and make peace.

The town is quiet to-night, and it is believed that the public has resigned itself to the inevitable and will accept peace without demur.

Almost Complete Unanimity.

Constantinople, Jan. 22.

The Grand Council met shortly after noon to-day at the Dolma Baghtcheh Palace is the department usually reserved for diplomatic receptions. Some eighty notabilities were invited, including most of the senators with the exception of those of Bulgarian, Serbian, or Roumanian (Vlach) extraction. The Under Secretaries of the various Departments and the high ecclesiastical Moslem dignitaries also attended. Neither the chiefs of the non-Moslem religious communities nor the ex-Ministers belonging to the Union and Progress Committee received invitations, exceptions being made only in the cases of Mahmud Shevket Pasha and Aristidi Pasha, who are members of the Senate. Mahmud Shevket, however, did not put in an appearance.

The personages invited began to arrive at half-past eleven. At noon the Crown Prince, Prince Vahid ed-Din, and Prince Medjid arrived. The Sultan received the whole assemblage in audience collectively, with the Grand Vizier and the Sheikh-ul-Islam. Kiamil Pasha was charged by an iradeh with the presidency of the Assembly. The members were grouped in order according to profession, military men, civil officials, Senators, and ulema (doctors of the ecclesiastical law) forming distinct groups.

Constantinople, Jan. 22.

From a reliable source I have received the following supplementary details of the meeting of the Grand Council. The Grand Vizier said that at a time of the gravest crisis the Government wished to consult the leaders of national thought and affairs in order to ascertain whether the course it was pursuing enjoyed the confidence of the nation, and also possibly to obtain suggestions for a different line of policy which might offer greater advantages.

Nasim Pasha said that the army was willing, able, and eager to continue the war. They might even hope for a measure of success, although there was little chance of recovering Salonica or Monastir, or even of relieving Adrianople. There were other questions, however, besides the purely military question, which required consideration and which militated against a continuation of the hostilities.

The Minister of Finance explained the dependence of the Treasury on foreign markets. The most onerous task, however, devolved on Noradunghian Effendi, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who set forth the international situation, the attitude of the Powers, and the results of the Turkish diplomatic representations. He dwelt especially on the attitude of Russia, which country, he said, had on two recent occasions warned the Porte that a continuation of the hostilities might compel her to depart from her attitude of neutrality. Noradunghian made it clear that there was little hope of any advantage to be derived from European complications.

All four speakers justified the standpoint of the Government, namely, that the continuation of the war was inadvisable and that adhesion to the recommendations of the Powers was the only course open to the Government.

Several speakers followed, including the late Grand Vizier, Said Pasha, who concurred with the views expressed by the Government, scarcely any dissentient opinions were expressed, the military officers present being all in favour of the standpoint of the Government.

How Kiamil Fell.

Constantinople, Jan. 23.

THE crisis has come with dramatic suddenness. Yesterday the Grand Council, representing the intellect and wealth of the nation, pronounced in favour of peace almost at any price. To-day a crowd drawn from all classes of the proletariat has declared for war rather than peace without Adrianople, and because the crowd was backed by the vast majority of the public the Government has surrendered and relinquished office.

The Council of Ministers met shortly before noon to give a final shape to the Note accepting the proposals of the Powers. Shortly before three a crowd began to gather outside the gate of the Grand Vizierate. Just then Enver Bey arrived on the scene, and he and Nadj Bey, a prominent Unionist, were deputed to inform the Cabinet that it must retire. On coming out of the Grand Vizierate again Enver Bey announced that he held in his hand the resignation of Kiamil Pasha, which he was taking to the Palace. He received a tremendous ovation, which was renewed with even greater frenzy when he returned an hour and a half later with an irade appointing Mahmud Sherket Pasha to the Grand Vizierate. While the crowd was waiting for Enver Bey's return their enthusiasm was kept at fever pitch by fervent addresses and the waving of banners.

After a flying visit to the Porte Enver Bey returned to the Palace, whence he went to the residence of Mahmud Sherket to communicate the Imperial message. Talaat Bey has assumed provisionally the portfolio of the Interior and Izzet Pasha that of War.

In an interview with Reuter's representative, Talaat Bey said that the movement which had led to the resignation of the Cabinet was quite unprepared, but was the outcome of popular feeling and was owing to the attitude of the Cabinet on the question of Adrianople. If Adrianople were abandoned disturbances would break out over the whole length and breadth of the Empire. No compromise was possible. As to money, the whole nation was prepared to make a sacrifice. "The movement," he added, "means that we are going to save the national honour or perish in the attempt. We do not want a continuation of the war, but we are determined to keep Adrianople."

The Hatt-i-Hamayan (proclamation) nominating General Mahmud Sherket Pasha to the Grand Vizierate was read at the Porte at seven o'clock. Mahmud Sherket was greeted with much enthusiasm by the crowd when he arrived, and people are still demonstrating before the entrance of the Grand Vizierate.

A Committee Manifesto.

The Committee of Union and Progress issued a proclamation, in which, after attacking the Cabinets of Mukhtar and Kiamil Pashas for pusillanimity and incompetence, it proceeds substantially as follows:—

"Seeing this weakness of the Government, the Allies have demanded Adrianople and the Archipelago. The representatives of the Allies have won over the Powers to their side, and the Kiamil Cabinet has given its assent to these sacrifices. In a consultative Council yesterday the Cabinet destroyed and betrayed the country and the Ottoman spirit. Kiamil handed over Adrianople to the Bulgarians and the Archipelago to the European Powers, and, to conceal his treason, he summoned this consultative Assembly. The Ottoman nation could not endure such a Government of traitors. When the existence of the country is in danger the nation thinks of exercising its right of revolution. That right it exercised to-day, and the Kiamil Cabinet accordingly resigned."

Crisis in Turkey.

(FROM THE "PIONEER'S" LATE CORRESPONDENT IN THE NEAR EAST.)

London, Jan. 24.

THE bomb which exploded in London yesterday evening with reference to the revolution in Constantinople, was certainly not unexpected by those who have followed the workings of Turkish political parties during the last five years. Kiamil Pasha and Said Pasha, creatures of the Sultan Abdul Hamid, have been repeatedly called upon to hold the chief offices in the State because they enjoyed the personal friendship of one or other of the Ambassadors, and because Turkish Ministers, children in many ways, thought that through them they might secure the support of one or other of the Great Powers. Both are octogenarians, both have the very worst of reputations dating back to the days when Grand Viziers and Valis made haste to get rich, and when pecadilloes in that respect were winked at by the Sultan. There is an old Turkish proverb, "He who does not drink of the waters of the State is a swine." Well Kutshuk Said and Kiamil Pashas have drunk largely of the waters of the State, so that when the Young Turks came into power, determined to do away with all acts of dishonesty, these two found themselves eyed with suspicion. However, that is another story, and will keep. Let me now advert to the happenings of the last few days.

In my recent letters describing interviews with different delegates, I have dwelt upon the crucial points of difference between the belligerents. The Allies demanded the cession of Adrianople and the Aegean Islands. This as a preliminary. When this condition should have been satisfied then came other minor points, which also would have caused much discussion and to which the Turks could have counted on the support of some of the Great Powers. These were—

1. The allocation of a proportion of the Ottoman debt.
2. The amount of the war indemnity.
3. The price to be paid for the railways in the ceded territories.

In the early stages of the Conference the Turks, finding that Europe was not sufficiently interested in the questions of the cession of Janina and Scutari, wisely gave way as to these two cities. The case of Adrianople was different and on this the Turks manfully stood out. At last, as you have already been notified by telegraph, in compliance with the urgent and repeated advice of the Powers, supported as it was by a Joint Note handed to the Grand Vizier by all the Ambassadors, Kiamil Pasha, the Grand Vizier, determined to surrender on this point also, but not wishing to bear all the blame for such an unpopular step he determined to call a meeting of the National Assembly to ratify his decision. The National Assembly was summoned for Tuesday last and with one dissentient gave a decision in favour of the surrender of Adrianople. A few hours later the Committee of Union and Progress once more appeared upon the scene, insisted on the Grand Vizier handing his own resignation to Enver Bey, the hero of the Revolution of 1908. Mahmud Sherket Pasha, the brilliant tactician who led the victorious Army from Salonica to Constantinople, was named Grand Vizier, and the decision of the National Assembly announcing to the Powers the surrender of Adrianople was mere waste paper. In fact at the moment when Enver Bey demanded the resignation of Kiamil Pasha, that veteran statesman was actually employed in drafting a Note to the Ambassadors on the very question of Adrianople.

I have this morning seen one of the Turkish Delegates, himself an ardent "Young Turk." He has all along assured me that the Turk would never give in on this point and even so recently as yesterday morning after we had heard of the decision of the so-called National Assembly he reiterated his firm opinion that on no condition would the nation ratify the decision of Kiamil Pasha's Assembly. Now a word as to the so-called National Assembly. It was merely a meeting of elderly gentlemen, who had held office under the Sultan Abdul Hamid admission was by invitation only and only one member of the Committee of Union and Progress was invited, and as he had been War Minister for five years it would have been inexcusable to have omitted his name. Mahmoud Shevket Pasha formally protested against the composition of the so-called National Assembly and urged that the Young Turkish Party should be represented. This was refused consequently the Field Marshal declined to attend. As soon as it became known that the Assembly had voted for the surrender of the ancient capital and had determined on addressing a Note to the Powers asking for their further intervention with the Allies in order to secure fresh modifications in the terms of peace, a meeting of the Committee of Union and Progress was called at which Enver Bey, who has just returned from Tripoli covered with fresh laurels, insisted on drastic action being at once taken to put an end to the Ministry of vacillation and he volunteered to force Kiamil Pasha to hand in his resignation as five years previously he had performed the same feat with Hilmi Pasha, the Inspector-General of Reforms in Macedonia. Enver Bey has spent the last few weeks in the camp at Tchataldja and is personally convinced of the high morale of the troops. He, as your readers know, though barely thirty years of age, has a most remarkable personality and carries men away with him. A gentle mannered, fair haired, blue eyed man of slight build and under middle height he does not lack the stuff of which heroes are made, yet no living man, indeed I will go so far as to say that no young man since Napoleon has ever dared what Enver Bey has performed.

In August 1908 he it was who led 300 men into the hills behind Monastir and lit the match which fired the Revolution. He it was who drafted the telegram to the Sultan which was sent simultaneously from every garrison in Macedonia demanding the restoration of the Constitution. He it was who went out to meet Shemsi Pasha who was marching down from Nitrovis with troops to stamp out the Revolution and warned him that if he proceeded one march from Monastir his life would be the forfeit. Shemsi Pasha ridiculed the warning and that night a secret meeting of the Committee was held and Shemsi Pasha's death decided on. Lots were drawn and Shemsi was shot as he left the telegraph office at Monastir after despatching a message to the Sultan that he was about to capture Enver Bey and send him in irons to Yildiz. The next message flashed through was to the effect that Shemsi had been evacuated by order of the Committee. Another action of Enver Bey is worthy of record. He had been for some time Aide-de-Camp to Tatar Osman Pasha, the Commandant of the Army Corps at Monastir, who previously had commanded the Army in the Epirus during the Greek War. Osman Pasha was known to be a man of liberal ideas but a stern disciplinarian and it was doubtful whether his liberalism would go the lengths of joining the Committee. Enver Bey entered the office of his General and told him that he was not to communicate with Yildiz and that unless he consented to join that Committee or pledge himself to accept their orders he would be placed under arrest. Osman Pasha at first thought his A.-D.-C. had gone mad, but when he found a sentry outside his door, who refused to obey his orders, he realised that great things were at stake. He waited patiently for Enver Bey's return and finally threw in his lot with the Revolutionists. Let me relate another story which came under my eyes.

On the outbreak of the Revolution in July 1908, there were some fifty thousand troops in Upper Macedonia ostensibly acting against the Bulgarian bands. These poor fellows had been long forgotten, none of them had been with the colours for six or eight years in lieu of this. They were two or three years in arrears with their pay and were on the verge of mutiny. Enver Bey's first thought was to reduce the military expenditure and he in conjunction with Mahmoud Shevket Pasha (who had at the invitation of the Committee accepted the command of the troops in Macedonia) determined to send these men to their homes in Asia. He rapidly visited all the garrison towns in Macedonia and explained matters to each battalion, parading the men for that purpose. He then took up some transports lying in Salonica's harbour, telegraphed to Constantinople for others, marched these regiments down to the port, saw them embarked, giving them the word they would be paid as soon as he could arrange with bankers. A few battalions after battalion swinging into Salonica with their fezzes decorated with the badge of the Committee and as each marched past the hotel where the Committee sat in permanent session, they were loudly shouted of "Enver Bey, Tchok Yaktochah" instead of the old cry "Padishah Tchok Yaktochah," with which they were wont to greet the Sultan's name.

Enver Bey never sought power, and refused it when it was within his grasp. He was a Major when he organized the Revolution, he is to-day a Lieutenant-Colonel. When the people of Constantinople wished to present him with a jewelled sword; he said "No, let the money go to the sick of the army." This is the man who has been the guiding spirit of the second Revolution and he it is who will animate the Turkish soldiery to make their last stand at the lines of Tchataldja.

General Osman Nizami Pasha, the second Delegate at the Peace Conference, is a member of the Committee of Union and Progress. He has more than once told me that Adrianople would never be surrendered and that if it fell no Treaty of Peace would be signed which included its cessions as one of the articles. Weeks ago he told me that any Ministry which ventured to take such a step would be swept from power, and to-day we see that His Excellency was right. "Rather than consent to such a humiliation, we shall die fighting. We shall cross the Bosphorus, and see Stamboul in flames, we shall establish our capital in Broussa; we shall fight to the last gasp, but surrender Adrianople we never shall." "It is true," continued the General, "that we have been defeated in Macedonia and have been compelled to withdraw to the Tchataldja Lines. But this not due to our lack of military spirit, but to the fact that we pinned our faith on the word of the Great Powers. Last July, when we learnt that Bulgaria was arming, and when Serbia was pouring war material into her country through our port of Salonica we commenced to take the necessary measures for self-defence and called up our Reserves. We were approached by the Ambassadors of the Great Powers with a request that we should do nothing that might be construed into a provocative act. We will take care that the Balkan States do not trouble you. We will be answerable for the peace. Then came the warning that if war ensued neither party would be allowed to derive territorial or pecuniary benefit, and it was believed in the Chancelleries of the Great Powers that such a fulminating threat would in itself suffice to keep the peace. Our hands were to a great extent tied. We had 150,000 men massed on the coast of Syria ready to repel any attempted landing on the part of Italy. Our fleet was blockaded in the Dardanelles because Italy held the command of the sea. For the same reason we were powerless to reinforce our army in Macedonia except by the one line of railway through Dodeagatch. Nor could we obtain supplies of war material from France or Germany on account of the Italian cruisers. Several hundreds of our best young officers were in Tripoli organising the Arabs and few of the battalions in Europe had more than four or five officers with them. When war broke out, the war which the Great Powers said they were going to prevent, we had but the skeleton of an army in the field and it was not until the Bulgarians were in front of Tchataldja and the Greeks in Salonica that the troops from Syria commenced to reinforce the army in Constantinople for they were compelled to make the long detour by railway via Aleppo and Konia with the long desert marches which intervene.

"Now we are better off. Large reinforcements have arrived from Baghdad and Erzeroum as well as from Syria. The Lasis from the mountains around Trabzon and the Kurds from Van and Diarbekir have arrived in their tens of thousands. We have upwards of 250,000 men and round Tchataldja. Seventy thousand are in the lines of Gallipoli and we have received over 200 quick firing field guns from Germany by way of Roumania and have trained our men to the use of the fifteen batteries of Creusot guns which we annexed en route for Belgrade via Salonica we are not deficient in that arm. The works at Tchataldja are impregnable as the Bulgarians know. They are armed with a number of semi-obsolete ships guns, of heavy calibre and of longer range than the siege guns which the Bulgarians have in position. As for the future who can prophesy. Adrianople may fall. Janina may be captured, the Serbian and Greek armies may rally round the Bulgarians at Tchataldja but of this I am convinced. The lines of Tchataldja will never be forced except when the last Ottoman has perished behind those earth-works and then our Royal family will retire to Broussa and we shall recommence our career of conquest as we did five centuries ago. Our trust in the Great Powers, in the neutrality of Europe is gone for ever."

"Hostilities will recommence either on Tuesday or Wednesday and there will be no quarter on either side. As for me I am hourly expecting my recall; as a soldier I trust I may be permitted to take up a command at Tchataldja, but as Ambassador in Berlin it may be thought that I may be of better use to my country in the German Capital than in the Turkish Camp. Of this you may be certain that the present Cabinet will not be swayed from side to side by every word of an Ambassador, it will march straight to the end, whether to victory or to annihilation I know not, certainly not to shame and humiliation as Kiamil wished to lead us. In conclusion let me beg you to thank the many Indians, Hindus as well as Moslems, who have sent us letters of sympathy. Only this week the Maharaja of Jhalawar called at this hotel and in the name of the ruling Princes of India begged to express their warmest sympathy with Turkey in her misfortune and their sorrow that England had not given us material aid. All this is most encouraging to us and leads us to hope that if the war is prolonged we may yet find some Power on our side, and then it may well happen that peace will be signed not in Constantinople for to that we shall never agree, but in Athens or Sofia. The blood of the Young Turks will revivify the fire of the old Osmanli and Europe will see the sick man come to life with renewed vigour. Will she then dare to proclaim the doctrine of the status quo?"

Shevket Pasha.

(By M. H. DONOHUE.)

Once again Constantinople is in the throes of a revolution, once more it is the turn of Shevket Pasha and the Young Turks to seize the supreme power and overturn the Government. Shevket is assisted by his faithful henchman, Miver Bey, who helped to pull the Red Sultan from power in the memorable revolution of 1909 and by Talaat Bey, who is one of the most calculating brains in the Young Turkish Party.

For three years Shevket Pasha, nominally as Minister of War but in reality as dictator, kept together the semblance of Government in Turkey.

Six months ago the then Government, yielding to the demands of the mutinous officers and soldiers of Monastir and to the growing power of the Military League (the force that had arisen in opposition to the Committee of Union and Progress), threw Shevket to the wolves. His downfall was caused by a variety of reasons. Among the army, which had hitherto been his most faithful supporters and whose swords had enabled him to drive Abdul from the throne, he had made a multitude of enemies.

MUTINEERS' HOLY WAR.

In a sense this was due to his stern, unbending character and to his refusal to adapt himself to circumstances. His enemies grow daily. Some accused him of having left Tripoli in a state of unpreparedness for war by withdrawing troops, others charged him with having displayed leniency in his treatment of the rebels. But the weapons which was used to the greatest advantage against the then War Minister was his decree forbidding military officers to take any part in politics. His enemies used this to stir up the animosity of the military leaders towards him.

The Committee of Union and Progress which had sapped the allegiance of the army, proclaimed a kind of Holy War against him. They attacked him in season and out of season. The climax was reached when the garrison of Monastir revolted. This was a disastrous blow to the War Minister who had always prided himself on the efficiency and organisation of the army. The mutineers, getting tired of their revolt, offered to surrender on conditions. They were given a free pardon: but Shevket Pasha, who whatever his faults may be, is a stern soldier whose fetish is discipline, refused to treat with them.

The revolt proved too strong, it spread to other divisions of the army, and threatened the very existence of the Government. The Government, realising the danger, found that there was nothing to do but to bow their heads to the storm. Shevket was given over as a scapegoat and was deprived of office.

A DICTATOR.

Barely six months have elapsed, and the man whose career politically and militarily was supposed to be ended by one of those curious turns of fortune's wheel which is so remarkable a feature of Turkish politics, returns this time to supreme power. Shevket Pasha has become Grand Vizier, but it would probably be more correct to say that in a sense he will be dictator.

The Military League, in its turn, has succumbed before the storm of public indignation. Its chief crime is that it has waged an unsuccessful war which has robbed Turkey of the richest of her European territory. Under the circumstances it is only natural, perhaps, that the army whose heart has been outter with indignation at the recent defeat and disaster, should once again turn towards the man who proved the saviour of Turkey three years ago, when, at the head of the Salonikan army, he swept the Turkish tyrant from his throne.

Born in Bagdad, Shevket Pasha is a plain, straightforward soldier, rather of the Cromwellian type, a man of the tented field who relies rather on the sword than on the intricacies and finesse of diplomacy of which he knows nothing, and with which he has no sympathy.

REFUSED A COMMAND.

Nine months ago I saw the Minister in his room at the War Office in Stamboul. It was during the Italian War. We discussed the campaign, and Shevket who, during this trying period, kept in his uniform at the War Office, expressed but one desire—that was to meet the Italian army on Turkish soil. Unfortunately, his chance never came. Shevket was full of optimism. He firmly believed in the invincibility of the Turks properly led.

"Let our chance come," he said, "and we will show what our army can do." Fate willed it otherwise. The Balkan War came, but Shevket was not in his place in the field. In a fit of pique he declined to associate himself with the Cabinet that had succeeded him. He refused to command a corps and preferred, like Achilles, to sulk in his tent.

His friends had always assured him that there was but one way to save Turkey, and that was by proclaiming a dictatorship. They pointed to Shevket as the man best qualified to assume this rôle. Then he refused. Now he has come back to power, and it remains to be seen whether his previous reluctance will be overcome.

TALAAT BEY.

Talaat Bey formerly held the portfolio of Minister of the Interior. During his retirement he has worked unceasingly against the Cabinet of Kiamil Pasha. He was in London early in October. On the outbreak of war he was called to the colours, and joined his regiment at Adrianople. A forceful speaker, he appears to have devoted himself to the rôle of agitator rather than soldier, and is said to have attempted to corrupt the allegiance of the Adrianople garrison. He was arrested and sent to Constantinople. He there exonerated himself, and was ordered to rejoin his regiment. He was implicated in the recent plot to overthrow the Government and establish a republic.

Interview with Fakri Pasha.

Dardanelles, Jan. 16.

A few days ago I had an opportunity of conversing with His Excellency Fakri Pasha, who commands the 50,000 odd troops in these parts, and it may be of interest to your readers to know what is, I presume, the general opinion in the Turkish Army. I began by asking him how he was faring in the little village of Madytos, where he is now stationed, and was informed that he was quite comfortable, but had a great deal too much to do looking after his men and attending to their drilling, etc. The ice once broken, he went on to give me his views on the political situation and the attitude Turkey was likely to take up.

"Kiamil Pasha seems anxious," he said, "to conclude peace at all costs, but the army by no means seconds him in that, and it is a foregone conclusion that if the Allies do not accept Turkey's counter-proposals hostilities will break out again. The Powers are anxious to clear us out of Europe, and we will abide by their decision when we have exhausted every means of defence and shed our last drop of blood for our Fatherland. Our position to-day is far better than it was at the commencement of the war. At Tchataldja we have a good army; disease no longer exists, with the exception of a very few cases, which barely average 1½ per cent; our food supplies are now plentiful everywhere, and the commissariat has been attended to carefully, and now lacks nothing. The superiority of the Bulgarian gunnery and weapons no longer exists, we have a large army of 52,000 men in the Gallipoli Peninsula, and another large army, the size of which I cannot confide to you, on the Eastern shores of the Marmora."

On my remarking that the army was in good condition, but did not receive sufficient support from the navy, he replied:—"That is the opinion of the man in the street, but those who are at the head of affairs know better. What we might hope to do to-day with our fleet by sending it outside the Dardanelles to meet the Greek fleet in a serious naval engagement, we could do a month later with as much success, which depends, of course, on the fortunes of war. The retaking of the islands is not as important to us as the prevention by our fleet of a landing of troops by the Allies in this vicinity. With our fleet intact, we need not keep so large an army here to prevent the Allies from landing troops on our coasts, and we could consequently spare more men for a final attack on the allied forces above Bulair and round Tchataldja."

I pointed out that he would have great difficulty in marching 52,000 men through the Bulair passes, where the Gallipoli Peninsula is narrowest. To this he replied:—"In war nothing is easy, but I hope that, with the help of the navy, the Allies will be kept occupied trying to prevent our landing a large army on the western shores of the Marmora, and that my men will then have an easier time in marching towards Constantinople and the Bulair."

I then asked him what would happen if on the resumption of hostilities the Allies contented themselves with thoroughly fortifying themselves before Bulair and Tchataldja, and did not take the offensive. "In the case," he answered, "our armies will not remain idle, but will make a forward movement in every direction possible. The Marmora army will, as previously stated, land under cover of the fleet's guns on the western shores of the Marmora, and then try to join the Gallipoli army, which will be advancing against the enemy. Meanwhile our Tchataldja army will also take the offensive; and we hope that, with a joint move of our forces, the Allies will have more than they bargained for."

Coming back to Kiamil Pasha, I asked if it was true that he was about to resign, and was informed that Kiamil Pasha might resign if the Allies' terms were too much for Turkey and unacceptable by the army. "If we have suffered losses, it is because we were assured by all the Powers before the war began that there was absolutely no chance of a rising in the Balkans, and we very imprudently removed all our regular troops from Macedonia. The war then broke out, and we were unprepared for what happened. With soldiers who had little or no training and with no proper means of keeping the army supplied with provisions, we were greatly handicapped; but now that experience has made us wiser is it possible to leave the whole of Turkey in Europe to the Allies without another attempt to redeem our honour?"

I then pointed out that, seeing how determined the army was to continue the struggle, it would be much more to its advantage to bring the pourparlers in London to an end, and give the besieged in Adrianople, Scutari, and Jannina a better chance of prolonging their resistance. Fakri Pasha replied: "We are in touch with Adrianople by wireless, and we know full well that the town can stand a siege of three months more, by which time we think something will come to pass that will change the order of things. As for the other towns, they are fighting, so it matters little how long negotiations last in London. There is plenty of wheat in Adrianople, besides other provisions. Flocks of sheep were driven into it when the Bulgarian Army was reported on the march. The only thing that we have not got there in abundance is hay and straw for the horses; but that is a minor consideration, as we feed them on barley and oats."

When I asked how the strength of the Greek fleet compared with that of the Turkish, he informed me that the guns of the Turkish fleet, taken as a whole, were superior, but that the Greeks had more modern ships, and some would take a lot to make them sink, as they were fitted with air-tight compartments, which could be closed off if necessary. "Our gain, therefore," he continued, "even if we were successful in attacking the Greek fleet, would be but small as compared with the advantage we should derive from having our fleet intact and worrying the Greeks if they attempted a landing on our shores."

The above details are all that I gathered from my conversation with Fakri Pasha. Personally, I am inclined to think that war is likely to break out once more, as the preparations being made at this end are greater than anyone who is not daily in touch with the army can imagine, and they certainly do not speak well for the peace prospects.—GODFREY WHITTALL in the Near East.

The Pressure of Europe on Turkey.

Constantinople, Jan. 21.

CONSIDERABLE sensation has been caused in Turkish circles by the publication in the Ikdam of what purport to be accurate and precise indications made by M. Sazonoff to the Turkish Ambassador at St. Petersburg in their last interview. The Russian Foreign Minister said he strongly urged Turkey to cede Adrianople without delay, talking which the political and military situation of the Ottoman Empire would enter a particularly embarrassing phase. M. Sazonoff, it is further reported, explained the above phrase, in answer to a question on the part of Turkish Pasha, in the following words:—

"Should Turkey refuse to cede Adrianople the Russian Government will not be able to maintain her present neutral attitude. In that eventuality she will support her fellow-Slav States, Bulgaria, by all the means in her power." M. Sazonoff added that the Russian Ambassador in Constantinople had received instructions to make representations to this effect to the Sublime Porte.

Even for the Ikdam. Official circles, while they do not confirm the version of the Russian Foreign Minister's declaration, admit that Russian pressure on the Porte has greatly increased in intensity of late, and hint that the language used by M. de Giers in his last interview with the Minister of Foreign Affairs to some extent justified the description that the Russian attitude is threatening.

After his interview with M. de Giers, Gabriel Effendi visited the Austrian and German Ambassadors, who both are believed to have urged on him the necessity of the rapid conclusion of peace in the best interests of the Ottoman Empire.

The Ikdam states without hostile comment that the Porte has cabled instructions to its Ambassadors to sound the Powers on the subject of the application of a special administrative régime, partly Bulgarian, partly Turkish, for Adrianople. It is further reported, and on good authority, that the Government are now discussing the expediency of informing the Powers in their answer to the joint Note that they will accept their recommendations provided they guarantee that Turkey shall not have to meet further demands emanating from the League or other quarters respecting such matters as the payment of a war indemnity, or, inter alia, the administration of the Asiatic Provinces.

A Concert of Cowardice.

The Locks of Samson.

BY "LINESMAN."

WHILE we are glad to give the hospitality of our columns to this distinguished writer, it should be pointed out that the opinions he expresses are his own and not those of The Daily Mail.

It is more amusing to the cynic or more disgusting to the (in his real sense) philanthropist to perceive with what amazement that snarling congeries of cowards yclept "The Powers" suddenly find themselves confronted with anything like sanity in those whom they, the little tin gods, have decided to destroy?

In the presence of the so-called "revolution" in Constantinople behold them trembling like guilty things surprised, surprised by manliness where they thought and hoped that there was nothing but emasculation, by courage and patriotism where they, possessing so little of either, have for months past derided only flight and treason. They are literally struck dumb, that is to say so far as the recent flow of words of command is concerned; yet not completely speechless—would that they were—for the unexpected shock has rendered both vocal and visible the uncleanness which sullies their strength, as the first spasm of a volcano brings to the surface a gurgling roach of mud from its uneasy bowels. As we have repeatedly recalled in these articles, in obedience to the loud mandate of the loudest voices on earth we may take no side in this question. And fortunate for us that it is so, for we are thereby absolved from taking side with what would otherwise be our home team, the Christian Chancelleries of Europe. And we frankly confess that we should do so with the abhorrence felt by any honourable footballer, for instance, who found himself in the field with a gang whom he knew to be not "playing the game." We can take side neither with "The Powers," nor with the Balkan League, nor with Turkey, and we are grateful for the disability. But we can and must take side with honour, with love of country and stoutness of heart, find these where we may; and if they be not in the mighty rushing wind of the earthquake and fire of Western blatantcy, we may yet hear them in the small voices of a despised Eastern people apparently stricken to the ground.

HOSTILITY AGAINST TURKEY.

Never within our memory or reading has a powerful majority been so grievously in the wrong as in the present crisis in the Near East. The unanimity of the Powers against Turkey, never concealed since Turkey began to lose, has now gathered to a head of hostility formidable indeed both for its anger and its might. So huge and indignant a voice as that which thunders against the Turk must surely be the voice of Right. But how well do we know that it is but that powerless fire and empty tempest which shook Horeb. There is no divinity in it, nay, very much the reverse, for it is merely a chorus of fear, and its utterances are incitements to a crime.

Let us clear our minds of cant. Does anyone suppose that the Concert of Europe clamours for peace for love of peace? Let the simpleton who so imagines review for a moment its mighty preparations for war, the thousand dangerous aggrandisements which have only been checked by threats or by a fluke, the overt ambitions which loom like coffins in the sky, the presagers of a myriad deaths; the fears confessed and unconfessed which torment the nightly pillows of whole nations; the friable alliances and ententes, the indestructible rivalries and hatreds which laugh them to scorn as all realities laugh at all pretences. Let him consider the internal relations of these Babel-builders before he hears the voice of the Lord in their polyglot uproar. No, the lion had to be rotten before he put forth sweetness, and never will there be honey in Europe until she too has been "rent like a kid" at the hands of some gigantic destroyer.

SURRENDER BEFORE DEFEAT.

And what is it that so infuriates the Concert, what is it that Turkey is commanded to do, or not to do? She is commanded to do what was once unspeakable, what is still unspeakable to the "unspeakable Turk" alone of all men in Europe—namely, to yield before she is beaten, to acknowledge all lost because not all remains, to hand over her territory to an invader who shivers outside her unconquered cities, to lie down for ever because she has once or twice been felled, to tear her own flag from pinnacles which undaunted have flown, and still fly, her colours tattered by tempests of lead and of misfortune. Dangerous advice, my masters! It is safe, no doubt, to experiment on a worthless corpus, but apply the operation in imagination to your own fair flesh. Must Adrianople go? Adrianople, the baroque of a capital, the voucher for an old empire's integrity and independence, an untaken fortress, a fly in amber, no doubt, to a soldiery too triumphant not to be soon but another nuisance in Europe, another voice in the dissonance. That is the order, is it not? Well, we will not go far afield for argument. Let Spandau go if it will at the next word of command, let Cronstadt go, or Verdun, or Vienna itself for all we care, but is Gibraltar or Malta, or Portsmouth or Bombay or Sydney—these to change masters at the city of a Concert (and it will surely be heard some day) like sheep at a market auction when Britain shall be on her knees gaining breath for that last encounter which will decide her fate? I trow not!

AN IMPOTENT MOCKERY.

Yet the cases are precisely similar. Constantinople without her outwork is like Samson shorn of his locks, an impotent mockery, and we take shame on our country that she has joined in the caplery which would inveigle the victim into embracing his own infamy. But we are glad that the caplery is in vain. We should be equally glad if it were Bulgaria or Serbia which, matters having gone differently, now rebelled against handing over to Turkey what they had not lost, whether a town or their integrity or what not. Did they not rebel, as Turkey now rebels, what a horror and shame would be added to warfare, the horror and shame that honourable defeat is to be dishonoured and indomitable stoutness derided by craven treachery at the dictation of foreigners who, more ignoble than a flogging mob, have stood by impatient for the result mainly in order to insult the beaten.

There has been much talk of the arbitrament of arms. It has been laid down that a military situation must be taken as it stands as a fait accompli. So be it. Turkey's so-called, and vilely ill-called, "Revolution" is her acceptance of the dictum. It is her expression of the fact that she still possesses brave men and soldiers who refuse to concede that a well entrenched and fully supplied army of 220,000 men is to seek from its trenches at the shriek, however "Christian," of an alien and a covert foe, who refuse to open unforced gates and level unstormed parapets at the trumpets of hosts, however Semitic, who circumambulate the walls in the hopes of a safe miraculous and lucrative possession. Instead of with indignity, these men should be loaded with praise as the last receptacles of manhood in Europe. And so they will be if they win!—Daily Mail.

India and the War.

Position of Moslems

By HIS HIGHNESS THE AGA KHAN

"Ever since the outbreak of the Balkan War, coming as it did shortly after the Tripoli War, the practical absorption of Morocco by France, and the possibility that Persia might be gradually brought under European protection, the position and the sentiments of the Moslems of India have, with ever increasing rapidity, become extraordinarily difficult, sad and unfortunate. On the one hand they realise that their most cherished hope for the permanence of the chief Moslem State and the independence of the two remaining Moslem States is disappearing; and on the other hand daily they read and hear, and of course they must more or less realise from their own reading of the history of past wars, the terrible happenings in European Turkey. Under these circumstances every Moslem is not only depressed and sad, but he is anxious, most anxious to do something to aid his co-religionists. Yet this desire often carries him into an attitude of useless negation—an attitude of mere dislike of the European, suspicion of the Christians, and still inability to put the responsibility for his own misfortune on anybody else. This attitude can be gleaned by anyone who takes note not only of the private conversation of individual Moslems of all classes, but who reads between the lines of the various resolutions which have been passed, as well as by the general atmosphere of Moslem gatherings.

"Now I may claim that I have studied the Turkish question and the general position of the Mussulman for many years past carefully. I can also say that hardly an important sentence has been written in any of the leading European papers about the war that I have not read, in addition to numberless reports from the charitable organisations at the Front, from the Consuls, and from various Red Crescent doctors and others. Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to offer a few suggestions and ideas as to how the situation strikes one who can claim at least this much—that he has no other motive except the welfare of Islam.

SAVE LIFE.

"The point that at once strikes us, the immediate question, is, What can we do to help the Mussulmans of Turkey? First we must regard the situation from the point of view of the happiness of the Turks, so as to prevent as far as possible suffering and pain amongst the hundreds of thousands who have been rendered homeless and helpless by the war. This great is the first and foremost duty of every Mussulman. Second. What can be done to make Turkey, as reconstituted by the war, a powerful Asiatic State? The two questions, although interlaced, are in a way really distinct. The first is an immediate question, the second is one for the future. So strongly have I been convinced that our whole efforts should be concentrated on the prompt and effective relief of suffering in Turkey that, while I have been one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the University Movement, I felt it to be my duty entirely to leave that question in other and abler hands amongst the Mussulmans of India, and to devote all my thoughts and the time that I could give to public service to the relief of the sufferers by the war. For the condition of society induced by the war resembles a great famine, though it is infinitely worse. It is a question of life and death. Everything else in life can wait, but when life itself is face to face with hunger and want, there is nothing but immediate relief or death. It would indeed be a terrible thing for the Mussulmans of India, if, through any want of effort on their part, thousands of their brethren in Turkey died. On this point no Mussulman can have any doubt or hesitation: his duty is clear. He must send money—as much as he can—for the relief of the suffering and the wounded; and what is equally important, for the thousands of refugees who are now flocking into Asia Minor from European Turkey, and from Macedonia. These refugees want not only food but money to buy seed for the coming season, so as to give them a chance to re-establish themselves in Asia Minor. These are questions of humanity which are urgent and immediate. We can establish a school or a University twelve months hence; we cannot bring to life those who die to-day. Just as when a famine is raging in an Indian district it would be idle to concentrate on some philanthropic work of future utility in preference to the saving of lives, so our immediate effort must be concentrated on the saving of life. May the Mussulmans of India have the grace to realise this immediate need!

THE SULTAN'S DISCRETION.

"But whilst bending every effort to the relief of distress, surely it is equally incumbent upon us to eschew any policy which may increase and prolong, unnecessarily, the sufferings of our co-religionists in Turkey! The Sultan and his Ministers alone can judge of the wisdom of prolonging the war. They alone are in possession of the facts; they alone can accurately balance the obvious disadvantages of continuing the war with the possible advantages of concluding peace. It does seem to me a cruel addition to the burdens which Turkish statesmen have to bear, at this crisis in the affairs of their country, to be harassed by irresponsible advice from Indian Mussulmans who know nothing of the grim realities of the position, and upon whom none of the grievous burdens of the war actually fall. How easy it is to bid other fight for the honour of Islam when here we enjoy the serene comfort of peace and prosperity; how hard it must be for Turkish statesmen to decide, well knowing the consequences of their action, yet driven forward by the telegraphic appeals of Moslems abroad! His Imperial Majesty the Sultan is bidden to do this, or refrain from doing that or the honour of Islam is sold; what right have we to assume that the Padiashah is one whit less sensitive on the point of Moslem honour than the Moslems of Lucknow or Lahore, of Madras or Bombay? But he and his Ministers have both the knowledge and the responsibility, which none of us has a share; they are guided by the cries of the wounded and the wails of the fatherless. As on them lies sole responsibility with them lies sole discretion, we must be very careful not to interfere from abroad. Telegrams and Circulars, both suggested that it would be a good thing for the cause of peace if before a war broke out all the leading journalists were sent to the front—there would be no more Yellow Journalism hankering after war. Well, it would be a good thing if all these hundreds of thousands who are, from here, giving their advice, were forced to make all the sacrifices that the war entails on the people of Turkey themselves. There would be more calm and deliberate advice given. Our watchword is work and sacrifice: let that suffice.

THE PROPOSED LOAN.

"Now we come to the second point, namely, what can the Mussulmans of India do for the re-organisation of Turkey, as a great and independent power, after the present war is over? First of all Turkey requires, and must require, a large loan and nothing would show the sincerity of the Mussulmans of India in the interest of Turkey more than the advancement of four or five million pounds to Turkey. But let us at least be practical. The Mussulmans of India are not rich enough and are not in the position to spare the money. Every penny that Turkey receives she must receive in a way that will assure her life in the future.

"I am afraid the suggestion of a loan made by the Orient Bank in the form it is advanced is neither feasible nor practicable. Loans without interest are out of the question. If, on account of religious sentiment, no interest is to be touched, there should be a condition by which a loan of 100 would be assured at 75 and repaid at par after five years. The Orient Bank and the other Mussulmans who wish to carry out this scheme should proceed on these lines: Turkey should borrow for five years either at five per cent. issued at par or a 75 repayable at 100. These bonds should be sent by Turkey to India; and the various banks here, including the Orient Bank, might sell as brokers only, not as borrowers, while the security would be that of the Turkish Government and not that of the Bank, except of course in the interval between the receipt of the deposit and the delivery of the bonds to the purchasers, which would be very short. The banks naturally would charge their own commission. It is advisable that the loan should be so arranged that even half-sovereign bonds could be issued. Such a loan could be safely subscribed to and safely taken by the Mussulmans of India and while undoubtedly it would mean sacrifices, for if the same capital were embarked in trade, a greater return would be secured, yet the sacrifice would not be of such a nature as to ruin the millions of Indian without doing very much for Turkey. The credit of Turkey, especially if peace is soon concluded, is sufficient and there is no danger whatever as to the repayment of the capital in five years.

AFTER THE WAR.

"But now comes a still more important question, namely, What is to be the position of Turkey after peace? Whatever happens, whatever the result of the last stages of this war, Turkey must in the future be an Asiatic Power; she must concentrate on Asia. Then comes the greatest of her problems, a problem of life and death to her—whether any Mussulman State is to remain or not. Turkey as an Asiatic Power can live and thrive only if she has the goodwill, friendship and the support of England. England is the only country which has everything to gain and nothing to lose by a strong Turkey in Asia. As it is, the route to India has practically fallen all along the Mediterranean into the hands of foreign Powers, and should Asiatic Turkey, Syria, Mesopotamia and Anatolia become German, French, and Russian, it would indeed be a most ominous position for England. Apart from any question of sentiment it is to the interests of England that Turkey in Asia should become strong and prosperous.

"I have often heard it suggested that England should herself absorb Arabia and Southern Mesopotamia, but the dangers of such an exposed position, the want of the millions of soldiers to defend it, and the hundred and one other difficulties, are so great that it would impose an excessive tax even on the resources of the British Empire. Now here is a great opening for the Mussulmans of India, alike of serving England and Islam. Let them use all their influence—through their loyal efforts, through their good will—to bring England and Turkey together, and, in fact, to carry out in Asiatic Turkey the spirit of the Cyprus Convention and the policy of Lord Beaconsfield. The only important sect of Christians in Asiatic Turkey, the Armenians, would be happier under Turkey than under Russia, while the Syrian Christians would never be in any trouble such as the Macedonians had with Turkey. All that there is a possibility that the dream of many Mussulmans may come true, and that England and Turkey may become fast and firm friends. But this means an equally important responsibility for the Mussulmans of India. It means that they must say nothing, do nothing, and act in no way that can weaken English confidence in Islam; and in the loyalty of the Mussulmans of India. If England is to become the bulwark of Islam, then Islam also must ever be ready to play its part loyally in the welfare and strengthening and defence of the British Empire.

INDIA AND ISLAM.

"It is from me to suggest that the role of Islam in India is to be a tower of wood and dragons of water. We must be ready and the British people are greater injustices to say that Mussulmans care nothing for the ideal of self-government, within the Empire and under the Crown and Flag. To entertain that ideal is to show that Mussulmans appreciate the British spirit, and desire to pay it the most subtle of flatteries—imitation. But this is an ideal which can be reached only by generations of effort, by generations of self-sacrifice, and any step to precipitate the end by artificial means even by a generation or two would be to do England the greatest of all injustices—it would force the British people to confuse the only loyalty that is worth having, namely, the loyalty of high-minded, self-respecting subjects, working for the ideal that have been attained in England, with the madness and crime of disloyalty. The stronger our commonsense the more sincere will be our recognition of the fact that the Government of India cannot change its character until new generations, with changed characters and with changed local surroundings and customs, have arisen, alike among Hindus and Mussulmans.

MUSLEMS' DUTY.

"Surely if we look the facts of the situation resolutely in the face, the duty of Indian Moslems in these anxious days is clear. It is first to bend all our energies to the work which cannot wait, the relief of suffering, the care of the wounded, and the rehabilitation of the peasantry who have fled from Macedonia and Thrace to Asia Minor. For this money, and yet more money, is the crying need, not the bemusement of Turkish statesmen, terribly weighted by their responsibilities, by demands for vicarious sacrifices. Then when the war is over, efforts no less sustained will be demanded to help Turkey on her path as a great Asiatic Power. That path will not be easy: covetous eyes are cast toward the territories which must be the home and the strength of the future Turkish Empire. One Power, and one Power only can give Turkey disinterested advice and help in this great work, and that is England. She has no territorial ambitions in Asia Minor or Syria or Arabia or Mesopotamia; all her interest lies in the recreation of a strong and powerful Turkey based on these regions, in order to prevent rivals from being established on the flank of the road to India. What an opportunity lies before the Moslems of India here! By our present sacrifices we can establish an influence with the Turkish Government which will give weight to our sentiments and representations at Constantinople. In this way we can act as the cement which will unite these two Empires into an irresistible whole, preserving at once to Turkey the opportunity of working out her destiny in Asia, safeguarding the road to India and returning to the days of the Great Eltchi and Beaconsfield. If that be the outcome of this unhappy war, then we shall find full compensation for the loss of Tripoli and Macedonia in the assured future of a great Turkey in Asia, firmly united with England, and thus both securing her own destiny and averting from the Empire the danger of either a fresh menace or of fresh responsibilities at the very gates of India."—Times of India.

Horrors of the War.

"A Quarter of a Million Moslems Killed."

THE Berliner Tageblatt publishes a categorical contradiction from the Bulgarian Legation in Berlin of the report of massacres committed by the Bulgarians which the paper published the other day (see the Manchester Guardian of Thursday). The brief statement adds: "All the world is aware of the fact that the unarmed Turkish population was treated by the Bulgarians very well."

In the same issue, however, the Berliner Tageblatt prints a message from its Salonica correspondent which says: "The inquiry into the atrocities committed by the victors in Macedonia and Albania is proceeding everywhere with great zeal, and since the restoration of communications numerous reports have come in vying with one another in describing the massacres. Foreign consuls are engaged in carefully sifting and comparing them, and are, unfortunately, arriving at the conviction that a terrible slaughter has taken place under the eyes of Europe. The number of Moslems, Turks and Albanians, killed may be put at about a quarter of a million. Infinitely great is the number of villages destroyed, indescribable the misery caused by these methods of warfare. Though the Greeks, too, are in part responsible, it is nevertheless, true that they did not commit so many horrors as the Bulgars and the Servians."

Massacres in Albania.

The Reichspost has received from persons in Albania, whom it describes as absolutely trustworthy, detailed accounts of horrible atrocities committed both by Servian bands and regular troops in Albania, particularly at Prishtina, Prizrend, Ferishevitch, Kalkandelen, and Uskub. The total number of Albanians more or less wantonly killed in the vilayet of Kosovo numbers, it is asserted, about 25,000. The journal suggests the despatch of a European Commission to verify the accuracy of the reported horrors.

A Protest.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

Sir,—The reputation of The Times for independence emboldens me to beg you, of your charity, to let me call attention in your columns to the case of the Muhammadans of Macedonia. From information which has reached myself and others it seems certain that an organized and cruel slaughter of non-combatants, men, women, and children, has been going on for weeks past, and is still in progress, the object being nothing less than their extermination. The victims (including fugitives) are said already greatly to exceed the sum of half a million. In fact (if my information is correct, and I have every reason to believe it so) the most awful massacre of modern times is being perpetrated in the name of Christianity. I should be the last to expect humanity in Eastern warfare, but this thing is not warfare, it is butchery. The evident desire of our English Government to hush the matter up is causing bitter indignation as the tidings spread. To persons like myself, who had imagined the promotion of good feeling between Christian and Muhammadan to be a part of England's standing policy, it is inexplicable. Considering the fuss which has been made here over local massacres by Kurds or wild Albanians, our silence over this tremendous horror must seem very sinister to every Moslem.

What were the numbers of the Muhammadan population of the conquered territory two months ago, and what to-day? What are the tortures which have been inflicted upon wretched creatures, men and women, pitilessly hunted down? What is the military status of Bulgarian komitadjis; is it not the same as that of Turkish Bashi-Bozouks, about whose doings there has been such outcry in the past; and have the Bulgarian authorities hanged one of them? What has been the rôle of the Bulgarian and Serbian regulars? These and other questions (e.g., torture of the Jews) call aloud for international investigation. The honour of Christendom and civilization alike demand a full inquiry. Such an inquiry, and the reprehension of the States concerned if guilty, would do more than missionaries to relieve the darkness of the Moslem world.

Yours faithfully,

MARMADUNE PICKTHALL.

Protest by the London Moslem League.

The Secretary to the London All-India Moslem League issued a communiqué, drawing the attention of the Government to the "indignation that has been aroused in India at the reports of the treatment that has been meted out to the Mussalman population of Macedonia by the Balkan invaders."

"In spite of the secrecy in which the sufferings of the afflicted people have been enveloped in England," continues the communiqué, "the cumulative evidence which is pouring in from disinterested sources, and which the committee believe to be corroborated by the official reports received by the various Chancelleries of Europe, leaves no room for doubt that the Mussulmans of Macedonia have been subjected to a treatment for which there is no parallel in modern history."

"The Secretary of State will readily realise the anger the accounts of these barbarities, which even the general silence of the British Press could not prevent from leaking out in India, have aroused in that country, a feeling which pervades all classes and sections of society."

"The savageries committed on people allied to the Indian Moslems by religion, and in many cases by racial ties, by professed Christians making war in the name of and under the symbol of Christianity, have naturally caused intense and universal bitterness, mingled with disappointment. The Indian Mussulmans cannot understand why England, which is not a European Power only, nor a Christian Empire only, should join with other European States in pressing Turkey to surrender to adversaries who have proved their racial and religious hatred by terrible deeds of savagery, one of their holiest sanctuaries, which at the same time forms the key to Constantinople. As citizens of the British Empire, in whose greatness they glory, and in whose welfare they are interested, the committee respectfully submit that it is of vital importance that England should not appear to the Moslem world as a partisan or upholder of injustice and wrongs by shutting her eyes to cruel deeds."

The following resolutions were adopted by the committee of the League on the 11th January:—

1. That the committee of the London All-India Moslem League desire to draw the attention of the British public to the cumulative evidence from disinterested sources appearing in the Press of neutral countries bearing on the Macedonian barbaries, and to demand in the name of all that is true and honest in the life of a great nation, which owes a duty to its fellow subjects of other creeds, that the people of England should take such action in regard to the wholesale massacres and outrages that have been perpetrated by the Balkan invaders amongst the Mussalman population of Macedonia as would do credit to their collective conscience and their sense of justice and humanity.

2. That the committee of the London All-India Moslem League have no hesitation in declaring that, in the face of the evidence that is coming to light, which they believe is fully borne out by official communications received by the Chancelleries of Europe, silence will be regarded by the Eastern world as tantamount to connivance.

3. That if it be not the desire of the British people to permanently alienate the goodwill and sympathy of their Asiatic fellow-subjects, the committee venture to urge that the veil of secrecy that has been so long drawn over the atrocities in Macedonia should be lifted; and in the case of any philosophical or diplomatic doubt on the subject, they suggest that the constituted representatives of the nation should insist upon the appointment of an independent International Commission of Inquiry, and the stoppage of the further extermination of the Moslem population of Macedonia.

4. That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and to the Press.

Balkan War Fund.

A LETTER, signed by members of the committee of Lady Lowther's Fund, of the Balkan War Relief Fund, and of the Macedonian Relief Fund, and dated from the Mansion House, has been published by the Times. Referring to the necessity for further funds, it says:—

The situation is one of altogether exceptional emergency. The whole country has been devastated. Houses and villages are destroyed. The heads of families and the young men have been serving in war, and many of them killed or wounded. There are thus thousands of helpless and innocent people—Moslems and Christians alike, old men, women and children—who are left utterly homeless and destitute. Unless they can receive some prompt relief to tide them through the winter months they must inevitably die of exposure and starvation. Many, indeed, are already dying.

The organisations connected with the Lord Mayor's Fund are now fully established. Agents have been carefully selected and appointed to take charge of the various districts. Flour and blankets are being distributed, and H. M. Consul at Philippopolis is himself giving valuable aid in supervising the relief. At Constantinople Lady Lowther's Fund, working through committee of the British residents, is taking charge of large numbers of refugees, especially women and children, and is fully organised for more extended operations if only money is available.

But our resources are now practically exhausted. It is estimated that £50,000 more at least is wanted to deal even with the most pressing needs. If help is sent at once not only will life be saved, but recovery of these regions from the ravages of war will be immeasurably promoted.

King Nicholas's Dithyrambs.

THE special correspondent of the Times in St. Petersburg, having telegraphed to King Nicholas of Montenegro inquiring what truth there was in the rumour crediting him with the intention of ceding Mount Lovtchen, the peak which dominates Cetinje on the west, to Austria, the post-King replied as follows:—"Mount Lovtchen is the Serb Olympus, a monument reared by the Divine hand to liberty and her defenders. It is the cradle of our glorious dynasty. It is also the pedestal of the mausoleum where the ashes of Peter Petrovitch Njegos rest. Lovtchen resisted even when the Asiatic invader had arrived under the walls of Vienna. It will still resist in the future. With its sublime peaks, Lovtchen, the well-beloved, is dear to us and more precious than if its entire body were one colossal diamond. Lovtchen is inalienable."

Ismail Kemal Bey.

ISMAIL KEMAL BEY, the present chief of the provisional Albanian Government, is now 68 years old. He claims descent from the famous Ali Pasha of Janina, who a hundred years ago nearly succeeded in establishing an independent Albanian State, and belongs to one of the foremost Albanian families, the Vlora, which counts among its other members the ex-Grand Vizier Ferid Pasha. In his younger days he was Turkish Governor at Constantinople, but when the Russo-Turkish War, which resulted in the cession of the Dobruja to Roumania, Ismail Kemal became a member of the Sultan's army, and afterwards Veli of Tripoli. At the same time he secretly joined the first Albanian League society at Constantinople, in which also Ferid Pasha, Turkish Pasha (the present Turkish Ambassador at St. Petersburg), and many other prominent Albanians belonged, and when the society was suppressed in 1880 he fell into disgrace and had to flee abroad for his life. He then travelled a good deal all over Europe, residing at Rome, Paris, Naples, Barcelona, and London.

While in Paris he joined the Young Turkish movement and became an adherent of Prince Sabah ed-Din, who advocated provincial decentralisation. After the revolution of 1908 he returned to Constantinople, and on being elected deputy for the Sandjak of Berat led the twenty or so members of the Albanian group in the Chamber. He did not at that time advocate Albanian autonomy, but insisted on administrative reform, the construction of roads, afforestation, and so forth. His antagonism, however, to the centralist tendencies of the Young Turks led him gradually to the formation, towards the end of 1911, of the Liberal Union (the Party of Liberty and Concord), which had for its avowed aim the overthrow of the Government, by peaceful means if possible, by force, if necessary. It was this indifference to the means which made a rapprochement between him, the Old Turks, and the Hamidian school possible, and, as the Young Turks were afterwards able to prove by documents from the archives of Yildiz Kiosk, he was in close relation with his former enemy, Abdul Hamid.

Ismail Kemal was one of the organisers of the counter-revolutionary stroke of April 18, 1909. For this, on the victory of Mahmud Shevket's troop, he had once more to flee the country and to resume his wanderings from one capital to another. His efforts, however, were now longer directed against his old enemies, but against the Young Turks. He was in close touch now with the Austrian and then Montenegrin Governments, who were assisting the Albanian revolts, and he attended in the course of 1911 and 1912 numerous Albanian congresses in the mountains, at which various national claims were formulated.

In May last he sent out a memorandum to the representatives of the Great Powers demanding complete Albanian autonomy under an Albanian Governor-General and a European guarantee, and in July he visited London, where he has a number of friends of old standing. All this time he was still the legal representative of Berat (which includes Valona), but at the last election he lost his seat, a relative of his, Sureya Bey Vlora, having been returned in his place. It was only after the fall of the Young Turkish regime that he was able to return to Constantinople on the express invitation of the Sultan, but at the beginning of November he was once more in Budapest and Vienna, where he concluded an agreement with Count Berchtold on the subject of Albanian autonomy. He then left for Durazzo by way of Trieste in a special steamer of the Austrian Lloyd, accompanied by a number of Albanian notables, and hoisted the Albanian flag in Valona, constituting himself at the same time the head of the provisional Government—The Manchester Guardian.

A New Republic.

By a decision of the Conference of the Ambassadors a new Republic, perhaps the most remarkable in the world, has, it is said, been called into being. This is the monastic republic on the Athos peninsula of Chalcidice. Strictly speaking, this is not a new creation. The "republic" has been in existence all through the thousand years of the Byzantine Empire and through the five hundred years of Turkish rule. But it was a republic in inverted commas, a republic on sufferance and in practice more than by right. It will now become a real and legal republican enclave in what may presumably be regarded as the new extension of the kingdom of Greece, under the special protection of Greek-Orthodox Powers.

The name of the peninsula and the republic is derived from the mountain Athos, whither, according to the Greek legend, the devil took Christ in order to show him the extent of his kingdom. From the top, too, a huge bonfire announced to the Greeks the capture of Troy, and it was at the foot of Mount Athos that wild storms destroyed the Persian fleet under Mardonius. In more recent times, it was on the top of Athos that a halo was seen one night in 1820 by an old Greek monk, announcing the forthcoming liberation of the Greek Orons from the Islamic Crescent, and though the immediate following revolt of the Greeks of Chalcidice was ruthlessly suppressed by the Pasha of Salonica, it is from that miraculous sign that the Greeks date the beginning of their national struggle.

Sacred Athos is a holy place for the Hellenic nation, but it is also holy for the entire Greek-Orthodox world. To this wild mountain the first Christian anchorites fled from Egypt to save themselves from the persecution, and there were founded some of the first monasteries of Christendom. The settlements grew, attracting saints and pilgrims from all over the Christian world, and were in course of time fully endorsed by the Emperors of Byzantium, who placed at their disposal the peninsula. Then the Turks came, under Mahomet I., overthrowing everything that stood in their way. The Athos community, however, far from the delivery of Salonica, was left in the possession of its rights and privileges, and these rights and privileges were confirmed to them by Sultan Mahomet II. after the monks had voluntarily surrendered to him their farms at Lemnos and the Anatolian coast. Since then the community has never been disturbed. Time and tide have been of no consequence to it. It has lived and is still living the same life as over a thousand years ago, amidst everlasting beauty of scenery and the everlasting joy of prayer and fast.

The community entirely consists of monks, with a small sprinkling of "lay brethren," and with only one Turk, the official representative of the Sultan, residing at Karias. No woman has ever entered the holy precincts of the Athos territory, even the Turk having, on his appointment, to leave his harem behind. For a long time it was even believed that no animals of the female sex, not even a hen, were permitted to enter the country, but that was shown to be a mere legend. The solitary Turk has nothing to do in the community except receive, on an appointed day, the sum of 37,000 francs as tribute to the Porte. In all the rest the community is completely independent, having its own Government, its own laws, and even its own police of fifty brethren. Its population amounts to between six and seven thousand men, chiefly monks, who either live in the monasteries, of which ten are situated on the northern and ten on the southern coast of the peninsula, or in separate settlements, to the number of eleven, scattered all over the peninsula, or else in solitary cells on the holy Mount itself. Each of the monasteries has a representative at Karias who, together with four evasoutive men (Epistatai) taken from the various monasteries in turn, form under the presidency of Primate of Athos, also elected in turn, the governing Synod. The Synod meets from time to time for the transaction of business common to the entire monastic community at an ancient church at Karias, where there is also a small bazaar, a school for young monks, and some houses for the lay brethren.

The life of the community passes in devotion and prayer. One-half of the monasteries are conducted on "zeuobitic" principles—that is, on the principle of common meals. Their inmates are provided with all the necessities by the monasteries, and they have their meals in common and all of the same kind. No meat is allowed in their case; they may only have bread, water, and vegetables. They fast often and long, and they spend from six to twelve hours daily in prayer. They elect their own chief, the "Hegoumenos," for life, and they owe him unconditional obedience. The other half of the monasteries are conducted on "idiorhythmic" principles, which allow the inmates a certain latitude in their mode of life. Each has a right to eat and to dress as he likes, and receives from his monastery bread, wine, and a little money to satisfy his further needs. This class of monks elects its chiefs every two or three years.

The great majority of these monasteries have been founded by Greek monks, but there is also a Russian, a Serbian, a Roumanian, and a Bulgarian monastery. Every year tens of thousands of pious pilgrims, mostly coming on foot, visit the sacred community from parts of the Orthodox world as widely separated as Greece and Siberia. A pilgrim who has been to Athos is like a Hadji who has been to Mecca. The community has not been free from internal strife caused by national jealousies, the Russian monks especially being the subject of suspicion on the part of the Greeks, who saw in them agents of the Russian Government. At one time it was seriously believed that a whole arsenal had been secretly formed at the Russian monastery of St. Panteleimon, with a view to turning Athos into a Russian "Gibraltar."

The Financial Situation.

BARTON'S Agency reports the arrival in London of M. Theodoroff, the Bulgarian Minister of Finance. It is stated that M. Theodoroff's visit is in no way directly connected with the peace negotiations; he is said to have come with the sole purpose of taking a preliminary survey of the Money market and of making himself familiar at first hand with the conditions under which loan operations might possibly be undertaken after the conclusion of peace. Whatever be M. Theodoroff's immediate object, it is evident that his advent must be regarded as another confirmation of the imminence of a truce of peace.

In German commercial circles there is noticeable a strong movement of protest against any settlement in the Balkans which might give Austria-Hungary preferential trade conditions. There seems to exist a certain degree of apprehension that Austria-Hungary is seeking such exceptional conditions and that the German Government is in danger of complying too easily with the wishes of her ally. To outdare the idea of such compliance, to the detriment of German trade, seems impossible. Not so, however, to the Düsseldorf Chamber of Commerce, which has memorialised the Ministry of Commerce and Industry to draw attention to the danger, and to pray that all necessary measures may be taken to parry it. Germans must be feeling bitterly the grossness of Austrian ingratitude, and are doubtless promising a less ready display of the "shining armour" in future.

Continental opinion is not at all convinced that the conclusion of peace and the promised resumption of payments will enable merchants to cash moneys due to them by Balkan debtors. Germany is pessimistic above all others in this matter. A certain wise reserve in the granting of credits, so often reproached to English traders, is, it appears, not a bad thing after all.

That Russia intends taking an active interest in future development of the aggrandised Slav States appears evident from an article published this week in the Nova Vremya, which advocates the foundation of a great institution having for its purpose the encouragement of industrial and agricultural enterprise in Bulgaria. It is hoped in St. Petersburg that Russian capital will be able to carry out this new project alone; but it seems more probable that it will ultimately be merged in the Franco-Bulgarian scheme, of which the preparation is well advanced.

I ventured the opinion some time ago that, among other conditions, the financial straits of the Balkan Allies and Turkey would conspire against recommencement of hostilities. So far, in spite of mutual threatenings, the antagonists have not taken to the field. The utter barrenness of all the exchequers concerned becomes more and more evident, in spite of all expedients employed to mask the fact from the world. The governor of the National Bank of Greece has been making a most worthy effort in this direction. In a communication published in the Times he states that the resources of Greece in men and money are not exhausted; yet, almost in the same breath, he says that "it is only within the last few weeks that financial assistance became necessary." The extent and nature of this assistance are not indicated, nor, indeed, whether it has actually been received. Having admitted this much, M. Valaoritis goes on to give a sketch of the economic development of his country and of the brilliant future which everyone hopes is still in store for her. I am forcibly reminded of the direct "preliminary puff" which is the forerunner of every well-prepared prospectus. We shall see.—COMMENTATOR in the Near East.

DEAR SIRS,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied is now giving splendid work. I purchased the for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who and dumb, some such occupation as would be once interesting and profitable. I am glad to he learnt the use of the Machine in two days after working it leisurely for about a month. I now acquired sufficient skill to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and a half by a fair day's work. I have always approved his work and on one occasion to refuse him his work for he had not have recommended your Machine with confidence to any of my friends who consider it a most valuable machine. I am, in several instances, subjective to speak in the favour of your Machine. Thank you for your courtesy and attention.

The Week.

Persia.

At question time, Sir Edward Grey said that good progress was being made with the arrangements for the advance to Persia for her immediate requirements. There was every reason to hope that the matter would shortly be concluded. The question of obtaining a substantial loan from financiers would then be considered.

A Toheran message states that it is understood that Britain and Russia are prepared jointly to advance Persia £400,000. The terms have not yet been settled.

Lord Lamington put a series of questions in the Lords with regard to Persia. He suggested that a considerable section of Persians did not regard M. Mornard with great favour and recommended the establishment of a treasury board consisting of a Russian, a British and Persian or neutral representative and the augmentation of the Gendarmerie with the co-operation of Indian officers.

Lord Morley paid a tribute to the Swedish officers and also to Captain Bokford, whose murder was a terrible incident in the great road problem in which we were more interested than anyone. He emphasised the objections to a punitive expedition and said that we had abstained from such a proceeding with a view to giving the Persian Government the best chance they could have. The co-operation of Indian officers with the Gendarmerie would be most risky, and those best able to judge warned Government that friction and jealousy between Swedish and Indian officers and the Persian Government would be likely to follow. With regard to money Lord Morley said that it was proposed to raise another £400,000 half in Russia and half in Britain and also £100,000 contributed by England for the special use of the Toheran Government. Security for the money would be found in a loan of four, five or six millions in regard to which negotiations were now proceeding between the Persian Government and the Société D'Etudes. The substitution of a treasury board for M. Mornard would impair the authority and independence of the Persian Government. The Imperial Government did not doubt M. Mornard's capacity and goodwill.

The Arnold Case.

Mr Channing Arnold was released before six o'clock on the morning of the 19th instant from the Rangoon Jail.

Quite an ovation was given to Mr Channing Arnold at Fytche Square Gardens, which was thronged with members of every community. As Mr. Arnold entered the square there were rounds of applause and vociferous cheering, which continued until he mounted the temporary platform erected for the occasion. Having been then garlanded, presented with bouquets, and pelted with rose petals, he addressed the assembly in a loud and distinct tone, calling upon them to be always loyal to the British Raj. It was not possible to get a more humane government in any part of the world, even if they looked back to ancient or modern history. Though he had been incarcerated for crime when he had tried his level best to prevent exposure, he was compelled as a last resort to throw his cards on the table and show the authorities where certain faults lay which needed remedying. His one object was justice, of which the British nation might rightly be proud. He would gladly undergo similar imprisonment if he thought it was for the welfare of the country. He spoke in terms of praise of the treatment meted out to him by the jail authorities, and concluded by asking the crowd assembled to give three cheers for the King-Emperor. This having been done, three more were accorded to Mr. Arnold.

When the news of the release of Mr. Arnold was received from Rangoon the Privy Council was sitting to hear the application for appeal. Sir Robert Finlay asked for an adjournment for a few days on the ground that important matters had been raised. The Lord Chancellor agreed and fixed the hearing for the 24th instant.

The All-India Medical Mission.

Constantinople, Jan. 27.

On the 20th of January I wrote to you just before my departure to Omerli. I arrived there with Dr. Fysee, Dr. Abdul Rahman, Mr. Khaliquzzaman and Mr. Hussain Raza Bey, Abdul Waheed and Haji Abdullah, our dragomen, having arrived there the day before. The first thing we did was to make a little bridge over the little stream between the railway line and the valley where our tents were to be pitched, some of the soldiers stationed in Omerli helping us in this work. We then started pitching the first tent. As none of us had any experience in tent pitching, it took us quite a long time, with a great deal of discussion, to put up this tent. By the end of the evening we succeeded only in pitching up one double-tent and a bill tent. Next day we succeeded in putting up three double-tents, one single tent, the operation tent and the remaining two bill tents; a mixed shower of rain and sleet prevented us from putting up the last tent. It would have done your heart a lot of good if you had seen the members of your Mission working in the teeth of a most bitterly cold wind and the mud almost knee deep. Here at least there was no distinction between the doctor and the druggist, everyone hammering the pegs, fixing the poles or spreading the canvas and doing the work like real enthusiasts. The next morning there was a heavy downpour of rain, and, although one hundred soldiers arrived from Hademkon for our aid, we could not avail ourselves of their services owing to the wretched weather. I left the next day for Constantinople in order to send all our equipment to Omerli and proceed there with the utmost despatch possible in this country.

I must mention that bitter experience has taught me never to rely in matters of provision on anybody but ourselves. My men and myself having been driven to eating nothing but cheese and bread for three days, owing to the box containing our provision having been stolen by someone on the line. I have now arranged for a bi-weekly supply of stores from Constantinople, at least one of my men always accompanying the stores.

[Here we have omitted Dr. Ansari's account of the coup d'état which we published in the last issue—Ed., Comrade]

I have been waiting ever since my return from Omerli to make enquiries regarding the issue of the Turkish Treasury Bonds. I visited Talaat Bey who promised to make enquiries about it. But not being satisfied with this indefinite promise I went and saw the Minister of Interior who understood English, made notes of all I had told him and promised to give me definite information this afternoon. He could not fulfil his promise owing to an important meeting of the Cabinet. To-morrow I am going to visit the Grand Vizier with the Drafts you have sent for him and a translation of both your letters in Turkish. I am hoping to get information about the Treasury Bonds, which I intend cabling to you at once. I am sure a loan of three or four million Turkish pounds would be of immense help to Turkey. To write to you for hastening this matter on my part is obviously superfluous, as you are already too keen on the matter, and besides it would be impossible for you to hurry up the matter without the receipt of Treasury Bonds from Turkey.

I must end my letter with a brief account of the Mission. I have sent out two wagons full of the baggage, mostly those things which had arrived from London. Half of another wagon has also been loaded and the other half will be loaded to-morrow. This wagon contains a portion of the articles which have been bought for us here in Constantinople. These things are mostly for kitchen and other general stores, a complete list of which is being prepared for your perusal. These articles have not been paid for as yet, as the Croissant Rouge have not sent the bill yet. I may mention that this list was carefully prepared on comparing our invoice with the authorized list of articles supplied to the Field Hospitals worked under the auspices of the Ottoman Croissant Rouge. I will send you the bill as soon as it is presented after I have carefully scrutinized the same.

There is one thing which is notably inadequate for our equipment and that is, the tents. They have sent us four double tents, 30 by 18, and two single tents, 30 by 16. These tents would hold with utmost difficulty not more than 16 beds each, that is, altogether 96 beds for patients. Besides these there is one tent for operations and three bill tents, which are very small and would not hold more than three attendants. You would see that we have no tents for the doctors and druggists, nor any tent for dispensary kitchen, store or the office. We have been fortunate in being able to borrow two tents from the Bombay Mission, but we still require at least four to six tents more. It is impossible to get tents in Constantinople for love or money, and I am afraid we will have to rely on the kindness of the Bombay Mission for tents. Obviously it is impracticable to cable for tents to England or India, as it would take a month before we got them.

Omerli, Near Tschataldja Lines, Feb. 2.

I have sent you a cable after getting the answer from the Minister of Interior, but I wish I had not done so, as two days after during my interview with Rifat Bey, the Minister of Finance proved that the Minister of Interior had given me absolutely wrong information on the subject of the Bonds. I explained to Rifat Bey who was naturally very grateful to you for all that you are doing to raise money in India by the sale of the Turkish Treasury Bonds, but after explaining to me all the details of the manner of issuing the Bonds, he expressed his utter inability to issue these Bonds in less than three months time. He was very sorry at this delay, but he suggested that I should cable to you to arrange with the Banks if it was possible to receive money from the people for these Treasury Bonds and give them receipts for their money to be charged for the Bonds when they were ready. He would like to know if such an arrangement was possible, and also the names of the Banks, and the conditions on which they were willing to sell the Bonds. I had been waiting for your reply to my first telegram before cabling to you the above instructions received from the Minister of Finance.

I went to Bab-i-'Ali on the 30th of January with your first letter to the Grand Vizier, enclosing a cheque of hundred and twenty odd pounds, and your second letter, enclosing two cheques of thousand pounds each. I had your letters translated in Turkish, as previous experience had taught me that this was the best way in order to facilitate matters. I also took your telegram along with two others, one from Rangoon and the other from Bombay, with their Turkish translations. I found Sheikh Abdul Aziz Shawish also waiting in Bab-i-'Ali, and as we were both called in together he acted as my interpreter. Mahmoud Sherkat Pasha received me most courteously, and shook hands with me in a most cordial manner. I explained to him the feelings of the Mussulmans of India at the great crisis which Turkey was going through and the hopes they now centred in him and his Cabinet for saving Turkey and the whole Islamic world from disgrace and utter loss of prestige. He was very brief in his reply, but his words were pregnant and sincere. He said, among other things, that the Mussulmans of India had been very generous in their help towards the relief of the wounded and the sick, and that the Turks would never forget their kindness and help at such a time. After reading the Turkish translations of your letters and cable he was very pleased, and made enquiries about you and all that you have done in organising the All-India Medical Mission and the Red Crescent Fund for the relief of the wounded soldiers and the refugees. He promised to send your telegram to His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, and said that I will have the receipt sent to me in due course of time for the three drafts I had given him from you. I asked him about the war to which he replied that they were ready for it, but he was not sure of the Balkan Confederacy. As regards Adrianople, he said that the garrison had enough provision for two months. In the end, he promised a private presentation of all the Members of the All-India Medical Mission to His Majesty the Sultan, and expressed a desire to see them himself.

I had sent all the Members of the Mission previously to Omerli, where they had all the tents ready. Our stores, provisions and equipments had all reached Omerli also and were being stored in one of the tents which we were compelled to use exclusively for this purpose. This tent is single and very dilapidated. The snow and sometimes rain gets through upside it and hence it could not be used for wards for which it had been designed. I regret to say that in the choice of the tents both the quality and number have put us to a lot of trouble and expenditure. I have been compelled to buy tents from a local English firm, luckily at a very moderate cost. I have already bought ten small double-tents for the staff and the office at thirteen pounds (£13) each, each tent accommodates three persons. I have also ordered three large tents at £20 each for holding 8 patients in each. It is absolutely necessary to have these tents double, as the winter here is terribly severe, and living in single tents would be absolutely impossible. The British Red Crescent Mission has been compelled for the same reason to give up its tents and erect wooden barracks at a cost of more than twice the price of a tent.

We have all been working terribly hard and have got our camp ready to receive soldiers from Tschataldja day after to-morrow, as the war is going to begin to-morrow, Monday, at 7 P. M. I may tell you that our field-hospital, if not the best, is second to none in Turkey. Not only are our wards, dispensary, operating theatre and general provision most excellent, but every member of the Mission has got the zeal and energy of ten persons, and a most excellent esprit de corps exists among them, of which I feel naturally very proud.

Dr. Barry has been invalided due to rheumatism and would soon be returning home.

Hussein Raza Bey has also got some lung trouble, and I am thinking of sending him back to India. I have secured the services of Dr. Fund at £8 per mensem. He will act both as a doctor and interpreter.

P. S.—I am afraid Uncle cables would not be allowed. They even censored my last cable to you about the revolution. Five names and several words were removed from the cablegram. But rest assured I will keep you posted with all important news.

MUSTAFA ANSARI, ANSARI.

TETE À TETE

SHAIKH ABDUL AZIZ SHAWISH has sent to us the following cablegram, dated Constantinople, 22nd January, 4 p. m.—“Serbs Montenegrins lost 10,000 at ‘Scutari’ Adrianople captured Bulgarians’ ‘aeroplane’ Money absolutely necessary.”

The Latest War News.

Awaiting Indian Princes’ answer concerning Bonds While the Turks are fighting with such heroism and holding their own with splendid courage, it would be a matter of bitter humiliation and shame for the Mussalmans of India if they failed to supply the soldiers of Islam with their sinews of war. The vital question now is that of money, and Turkey is waiting to see the nature of the response that Moslem India makes to her appeal for help. We hope the “answer of the Moslem princes in India concerning the Turkish Bonds” will be worthy of their dignity, their love of Islam and the urgency of the cause. We trust their brethren in Turkey will not have long to wait for the answer.

According to a resolution of the Bombay Legislative Council, the Government of India was requested to consider the advisability of opening the ports of Calcutta, Chittagong and Madras for the convenience of the Hedjas pilgrims.

The Hedjas Pilgrim Traffic.

The Hon. Sir Ibrahim Itahimtoola, who was the author of the proposal in the Bombay Council, put a question on the subject in the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council and asked for information as to the steps the Government of India had taken in the matter. The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler, in reply, said that the proposal had been carefully considered by the Government of India, in consultation with the Governments of Madras and Bengal, but that it had not been found possible to accept it. Detailing the reasons, he said that, as regarded Madras, neither that nor any west coast port in the Madras Presidency was so situated as to attract many pilgrims from the Presidency. “The latter who formed only a very small percentage of the total number of pilgrims from India, would naturally prefer the cheaper and quicker route via Bombay.” Past experience had shown that Chittagong could not compete with Bombay in the matter of the pilgrim traffic, and difficulty was always experienced in obtaining ships of pilgrims or a full cargo of pilgrims for ships. The extent of the pilgrim traffic in the port of Calcutta, before it was closed in 1897, had always been extremely small, and it was extremely unlikely that such as there was in the past would return should the port be re-opened in view of the greater convenience of Bombay. “In these circumstances,” concluded the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler, “the Government of India have, in concurrence with the Governments of Madras and Bengal, come to the conclusion that the opening or re-opening, as the case may be, of the three ports above-mentioned, while entailing considerable expenditure, will have no appreciable effect.” Now, the main arguments underlying the decision of the Government of India are that pilgrims themselves prefer the route via Bombay on account of its cheapness and convenience, and that it would consequently entail considerable amount of needless expenditure to open the ports of Calcutta, Chittagong and Madras to pilgrim traffic. Be this as it may, the decision leaves matters where they were and the problem of dealing with the enormous congestion caused by the influx of pilgrims in Bombay remains in all its acuteness. The opening of the port of Karachi will afford relief only in so far as the north-western part of the country is concerned. We think it is desirable that the Government should invite the opinions of all district and provincial engineers and associations of merchants throughout the country and frame its decision in the light of such opinions. The unsatisfactory conditions of the pilgrim traffic in Bombay clearly demand some comprehensive measure of relief, and we hope the Government of India will be found willing to devise it as early as possible.

THE HON. SECRETARY of the London Moslem League sent a letter on behalf of the Committee of the League to the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the 14th January, respectfully drawing “the attention of His Majesty’s Government to the indignation that has been aroused in India at the reports of the treatment that has been meted out to the Mussalman population of Macedonia by the Balkan invaders.” The letter proceeds to say that, in spite of the secrecy in which the sufferings of the afflicted people have been enveloped in England, the cumulative evidence which is pouring in from disinterested sources, and which the Committee believe to be corroborated by the official reports received by the various Chancelleries of Europe, leaves no room for doubt that the Mussalmans of Macedonia have been subjected to a treatment for which there is no parallel in modern history. “The wholesale violation of women and girls combined with mutilation, the slaughter of children, the extermination of men, the shooting down of people running out of houses deliberately set on fire, the blowing up of prisoners, the destruction of Moslem villages and the indiscriminate massacre of their inhabitants, are acts which the most extreme racial or religious fanaticism can not justify.” After referring to the anger that the accounts of these barbarities have aroused in India, the letter concludes by respectfully submitting “that it is of vital importance that England should not appear to the Moslem world as a partisan or upholder of injustice and wrongs by shutting her eyes to cruel deeds.” We are not aware if the Secretary of the League has received any reply to this important communication. Judging, however, by the attitude of Sir Edward Grey, as recently defined in the House of Commons on the subject, we doubt if the appeal of the Committee has had a desired effect. Sir Edward Grey regards the atrocities as if they were wild rumours lacking adequate confirmation, and, in any case, he does not think a neutral Government is justified to take any definite action, especially when he remembers that tales of Turkish atrocities in Macedonia, not very long ago, used to reach him. As regards the Moslem feeling in India, he considers it is likely to be incited by questions in the House of Commons. Well, all we need say is that the Foreign Minister of Great Britain should have so lightly disposed of the state of Moslem feeling and should deprecate all reference to it in Parliament. That terrible atrocities have been committed in Macedonia no honest Chancellery in Europe can have the cynicism to deny. To condone them as if they were awful measures of retribution and take shelter behind fond professions of neutrality is to declare the moral bankruptcy of a civilised State. Neutrality does not surely mean that a great people and their Government should not utter a word of protest in face of unutterable horrors. The so-called “Armenian Atrocities” shook liberal England to its depths, and it was merely an accident of international politics that the whole weight of British diplomacy and British arms was not used to avenge “the victims of Turkish misrule.” It is difficult to avoid the lesson that the conscience of a modern State in Europe is very often a slave of an opportunist diplomacy and of the interests that it is designed to serve. Lord Lamington deserves the thanks of the Indian Mussalmans in particular for his frank exposure of the fallacy with which Sir Edward Grey had sought to muzzle the House of Commons. Lord Morley calls Sir Edward Grey’s attitude “admirable.” We do not know if this apologia can relieve Sir Edward Grey and the British Government of their responsibility as custodians of great and noble traditions of humanity and justice which are the proud heritage of the British race. All that has happened in Macedonia may have been inevitable, but it can not on that account cease to be wicked, vile and horrible. After all, the doctrine, “all what is is right,” reduces all human will and purpose to absurdity, and great ideals and aspirations seem but a futile juggling with words. It is rather sad to think that of all persons Lord Morley should have told us that the horrors of this war need not deserve a moral censure of Great Britain because they were inevitable.

SEVERAL causes have combined to render the question of cattle preservation as one of great economic importance to this country. Now that growing attention is being paid to the study of the vast agricultural problems, and efforts are being made to solve them in the light of modern agricultural science, and with reference to new needs and new possibilities, the preservation and breeding of agricultural livestock cannot be left at the mercy of chance and accidents. The duty of the Indian Government in this connection is obvious. Apart from the fact that the lives and prosperity of millions in this country depend upon agriculture, the State derives the bulk of its revenues from this staple industry, and it cannot, therefore, in view of its own great interests, refuse to create all needful facilities for the development of The Preservation of Cattle.

Indian agriculture. A cattle survey of the whole of India was, some time ago, promised by the Government; but, as would appear from the Hon. Sir Robert Carlyle's reply to the question asked by the Hon. Sir G. M. Chitnavis in the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, the proposed survey has not yet been undertaken. The Government of India advised Local Governments that the preparation of technical surveys should be preceded by the collection of general information, somewhat on the lines of the report on cattle and dairying in the Punjab issued by Mr. Stow. "It is understood that reports on these lines are under preparation, but it is not known when they will be ready for publication." We trust the Department of Revenue and Agriculture is alive to its responsibilities and will speed up an inquiry the importance of which can hardly be exaggerated. Spontaneous efforts organised by the people themselves will, above all, prove of immense practical value. It may be worth mentioning in this connection that we recently received a copy of a draft prospectus "on behalf of an influential body of representative Hindu gentlemen, who have formed themselves into a Committee to bring forward a scheme for an All-India Cattle Preservation Society." The scheme, as put forward, is an ambitious one. It is designed to take the shape of a joint-stock company "with a capital of 50 crores of rupees in 10 crores of shares of Rs. 5 only." It is proposed to have "one cow shed in each 5 villages, accommodating 50 cattle, one in each town, accommodating 500 cattle, and one in each district (city), accommodating 1,000 cattle, all over India." It is claimed that, if the scheme is completely worked out, "we shall be able to save 71,68,000 cattle in the first attempt and engage 28,00,000 of our countrymen in service. Besides a dividend of about 10 per cent. or thereabouts in the first year, a liberal supply of pure milk and ghee will be within easy reach of all India." The prospects, herein set forth, are truly glorious, only if we were sure that sustained energy and efforts would be put forth to realise them in practice.

AN UNKNOWN fate had saddled Turkey, in the hour of her supreme trial, with a politician who, to say the least, had long been rendered obsolete. Kiamil had none of the courage, boldness and decision of character that were needed in the great crisis in the fortunes of his country. By his timid and fatuous dependence on others and utter political imbecility he has ridden Turkey to disaster. How such a man could rise to supreme power in these days is a rather interesting story. Reviewing the position of Kiamil Pasha before his fall, the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung said that "an act of courtesy on the part of the English Royal couple had unwittingly a considerable effect on the domestic situation in the Ottoman Empire." While in Egypt on their Dardanelles journey the King and Queen invited old Kiamil, who was then in exile, to dinner, and caused the whole company to be photographed. Copies of that photograph, representing Kiamil Pasha sitting near the Queen, with King George standing behind, were circulated all over Constantinople, including the Sultan's palace, and had a tremendous effect on the imagination of the Turks, who concluded, therefore, that if Kiamil Pasha were ever to come back to power England would place herself by the side of Turkey and protect her against all enemies. It is this idea, generated by a simple photograph, which was largely responsible for the overthrow of the Young Turkish régime and the installation of Kiamil at the head of affairs. This was fatal, for not only had all those fantastic hopes in England since then been disappointed, with the result that Kiamil Pasha had been abandoned by all his former adherents, but the fall of the Young Turks also largely contributed to the disastrous war. "Should the history of the Balkan War ever come to be written by a really competent pen," says the Frankfurter's correspondent, "it will surely be found that the psychological moment created by the internecine strife among the Turkish officers had, if not a decisive, at least a considerable effect on the decision of the Allies to declare war. The Young Turks now assume that if they had remained in power war would have been avoided. It would, of course, be difficult now to adduce facts to prove this. It is, however, true that they well understood how to maintain very good relations with Bulgaria and Serbia."

WHILE the Greeks are loud in their pretensions about the Ægean islands and have recently gone into raptures over a leading article which the Times wrote in enthusiastic support of their claims, the Great Powers by no means agree amongst themselves as to the final solution of the question. Roughly speaking, the Powers of the Triple Alliance favour the retention of the islands by Turkey. The Italian Government has, in particular, expressed itself decidedly against their cession to Greece. M. Jean Carrère, the Roum correspondent of the Temps, discusses in a message to his paper the Italian attitude in respect of the Ægean islands. The islands are still in the occupation of the Italian troops, since, though the last Turkish troops have just left Tripoli, many officers and a large number of soldiers under the command of Aziz Bey are still lagging behind in Cyrenaica, where the Italian troops are in consequence still in the same positions which they occupied during the war. In vain has the Italian Government appealed more than once to the Porte urging it to recall the remaining troops without delay, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Lausanne. The Porte, however, keeps on promising and delaying, on the plea that the evacuation must be effected gradually and, so to speak, clandestinely, for fear of a massacre by the disappointed Arabs. In view of this and in virtue of the terms of the treaty, the Italian Government finds it impossible to withdraw from the islands, which must be held as a pledge for the ultimate withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Cyrenaica and as a precaution against a renewal of hostilities by Aziz Bey. The Italian Government, the writer says, is aware that the Turks may use this opportunity and may purposely remain in Cyrenaica in order to force Italy to remain in the islands, to keep off the Greeks. But Italy, on the other hand, is not at all inclined simply to hand over the islands to Greece—particularly those adjoining the coast of Asia Minor. On this she is at one with her two Allies, who are anxious to preserve and even to consolidate Turkey in Asia. The ultimate fate of the islands will be decided by the Powers. We may, however, be sure that the Turkish standpoint, however reasonable and just, will weigh little with the Powers unless it happens to coincide with their own interests.

THE Collective Note of the Powers to Turkey, advising her to yield to the demands of the Allies, will for ever live as a remarkable monument to the cynicism of modern diplomacy. The frank injustice and brutality of the whole proceeding have placed in its true perspective the attitude of the European Chancelleries in their dealings with the Turks. With very few exceptions the European press welcomed the Note, as if its presentation were the most natural and proper thing for the Powers to undertake. The essential iniquity of the thing has impressed but a few clear-sighted observers whose sense of justice has not been obsessed by the shady game of international politics. One such German observer has recently expressed his views with refreshing candour and laid bare the hidden springs of devious policy and intrigue that led to the production of the Note. While most of the organs of the German press, which frequently get their inspiration from official quarters, were very sparing in their comments on the Collective Note, the more independent journals, especially the Liberal papers, did not conceal their displeasure at the object and tone of that document. Herr Theodor Wolff, for instance, wrote in the Herbster Tageblatt:—"Should anyone in Germany have read the Collective Note of the Great Powers without a feeling of disgust it only means that either his interest in matters political is weak or that his stomach is very strong. Prince Lichnowsky, who has signed the paper in London, and Baron von Wangenheim, who has taken part in the duty of handing it in at Constantinople, are two men of good reputation, and it is with sincere sympathy that one sees their honourable names being mixed up with this business. For though this Collective Note, which after so many assurances of protection and guarantees is trying under various threats to compel the Turks to surrender Adrianople, is alleged to have been drawn up by statesmen of the European Great Powers, its draft nevertheless seems to have emanated from one of those interesting cafés which are frequented by specialists in letter writing of this kind. How could Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg have prevailed upon himself to engage Germany in a policy which is so much opposed to the German sense of propriety and, what is still more important, to German interests?" Two considerations have apparently weighed with the decision of this statesman, continues Herr Theodor Wolff. The Bulgarians refuse to satisfy Roumania's claims unless they are assisted in obtaining Adrianople and for this reason the Austro-Hungarian Government, which is anxious to satisfy Roumania, has been urging this painful step in Berlin. On the other hand Russia and France have, in order to secure their influence in Bulgaria, promised the Bulgarians to obtain for them Adrianople, and for this reason they have frightened the hesitating Berliners by the delicate suggestion that the Russians might otherwise march into Armenia. "In fact the shining lights of European diplomacy threaten the Turks, should Adrianople not be finally surrendered, with the withdrawal of their 'moral and material support.' As for moral support, its value must be fully obvious to Turkey at the present moment, and with regard to the usurer's threat not to lend any more money, it must sound somewhat comical to anyone who knows Europe's hunger for profits and commissions. That Note, however, goes further and announces that in case of the Porte's resistance the hostilities may be perhaps spread to the Asiatic provinces of the Empire. The natural question is by whom would they be extended if not by the Powers themselves?" Herr Theodor Wolff then outlines the nature of the reply which German diplomacy ought to have given to such suggestions.

a reply based on Germany's sense of morality and fairness as well as on her interest in the preservation of Asiatic Turkey intact,—and expresses the opinion that "in such a case Sir Edward Grey would perhaps have found co-operation with the colleagues of the other cordial members of the Entente less convenient."

Moslem India is to-day more united than it ever was before; and, whatever H. H. the Aga Khan may think, Indian Mussalmans would solidly vote for Turkey's fighting to the bitter end rather than yield to the Balkan Allies or their more powerful Allies in European Chancelleries. We trust no one will accuse Moslem youth in this matter, for this is the work of another and a more effective agency—Moslem Manhood. We have received a private communication from an honoured contributor of the Comrade who has spent a life-time in quiet, unostentatious work and is too much of a scholar to be accused of soldierly militancy. By instincts liberal, but in politics a most thoughtful conservative, he is one who commands as much confidence in official circles on account of his political views as personal affection among his own people for his patent sincerity and all the qualities of heart and head that go to make a cultured gentleman in the best sense of that hackneyed epithet. He writes to us: "I was hoping from the first that the Turks would in the end refuse Peace with Dishonour and resume war. It is better to fight and die I am not a soldier, but I would love to be in the ranks. I hope God will grant them victory against these scoundrels who are not even fit to clean their shoes. My little grandson . . . who is only six years old, prays every day for the Turks and Persians, and his mother, my only daughter, actually cries her eyes out when she reads of Turkish reverses. Whatever their treacherous Christian enemies may say, they have brought these misfortunes on themselves by too much toleration. This is the truth, not a paradox, or, in other words, what seems paradoxical is really true." We hope this will convince every sceptic about the true feelings of all Moslems to-day and warn Sir Edward Grey in time. Will not some honourable member of H. E. the Viceroy's Legislative Council ask a question whether Government is aware of feelings which are secret to none except Sir Edward Grey? The six year old thinks like grey-haired sixty and grey-haired sixty feels like the little mite of six. Shall we still delude ourselves by thinking that all that is needed to "improve" the Nation is to supply old heads for young?

The Ottoman Treasury Bonds.

As would appear from the latest letter of Dr. Anzari published elsewhere, Rifaat Bey, Minister of Finance of the Ottoman Empire, in an interview with Dr. Anzari, "expressed his utter inability to issue the Bonds in less than three months time." The delay may be unavoidable, but the intending purchasers need not wait till the Bonds are issued, as we have already arranged with the Alliance Bank of India and the Bank of Bengal to receive deposits from the people and give receipts for the amount of money received. The Bonds will be duly issued to the purchasers later on as soon as they are received by the Banks from the Ottoman Treasury. The essential consideration is that the whole amount of five million pounds sterling, for which the Bonds are to be issued, should be subscribed for without delay. We may state here in this connection that we had requested several other Banks in India to inform us if they were prepared, like the Alliance Bank of India, to receive deposits and effect purchases of the Bonds for intending purchasers for an inclusive charge of 2 annas per cent., with a maximum of two annas for each transaction. And we are glad to say that we have received letters from the Benares Bank, "Limited," the Karachi Bank, "Limited," the Standard Bank, "Limited," the People's Bank of India, "Limited," the Punjab Banking Company, "Limited," the Delhi and London Bank, "Limited," and the Bank of Upper India, "Limited," expressing their willingness to receive deposits for the purchase of the Ottoman Treasury Bonds on the terms specified by the Alliance Bank. The Bank of Bombay is also willing to receive deposits and effect purchases of the Bonds, but on the same terms and conditions as the Bank of Bengal, i. e., for an inclusive charge of 2 annas per cent., with one rupee as a maximum commission for each transaction. We trust the intending purchasers will thus have ample facilities placed within their reach to deposit money for the number of Bonds they wish to purchase.

We trust in all cases they would authorise the Banks to forward the money by telegraphic remittance to Turkey every day and not wait for the receipt of the Bonds. We have already authorised the Alliance Bank to cable our mite of £75 to Rifaat Bey for 150 Bonds.

The Comrade.

Education in India.

THE Government of India have issued an important resolution reviewing the existing state of Indian education and laying down certain broad lines for its future development. The document covers a wide ground. It enunciates the educational policy and principles that the Government have in view, examines the scope for future efforts and defines in general outline the manner in which the vast problem of evolving a comprehensive system of education in India may be solved. Obviously, it is difficult, in view of the complex character and vast dimensions of the problem, to do more at present than set forth in a brief summary the Government standpoint and see its bearing on the actual educational needs of the country.

The Resolution begins by recalling a passage from the speech of His Imperial Majesty the King-Emperor, delivered in reply to the address of the Calcutta University on the 6th January, 1912. The passage has been truly described as the educational charter of India, and as the Government have obviously sought in that passage the bases of its educational policy it would be worth while reproducing it in full.

It is my wish that there may be spread over the land a network of schools and colleges, from which will go forth loyal and manly and useful citizens able to hold their own in industries and agriculture and all the vocations in life, and it is my wish, too, that the homes of my Indian subjects may be brightened and their labour sweetened by the spread of knowledge with all that follows in its train, a higher level of thought, of comfort and of health. It is through education that my wish will be fulfilled and the cause of education in India will ever be very close to my heart.

The ideals that these memorable words enshrine are noble and comprehensive, and no better programme could be devised for the guidance of India's rulers than the one that would result in brightening the homes of His Majesty's Indian subjects and in sweetening their labour by the spread of knowledge with all that follows in its train. The Government of India are evidently alive to the solemn nature of the task that His Majesty's gracious message has imposed upon them, and indications are not wanting that they would strive to discharge their great obligations in no grudging spirit. To have to guide the intellectual energy of vast and historic communities in the travail of new birth, and evoke from them a robust patriotism based on common culture and common aspirations, is at once a great privilege and a great responsibility. We believe that the responsibility has been accepted most willingly and in full.

It is gratifying to learn that the Government of India have decided, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to assist Local Governments by means of large grants from Imperial revenues, as funds become available, to extend comprehensive systems of education in several provinces. They further recognise that each province has its own educational system which has grown up under local conditions, and that in view of the diversity of conditions in India there can not be one set of regulations and one rate of progress for the whole of India even within provinces. But, while avoiding all attempts at centralising provincial systems or introducing superficial uniformity, the Government of India regard it as important at intervals to review educational policy in India as a whole. This policy is based on certain principles which were discussed at three important conferences of experts and representative non-officials held within the last two years.

In the forefront of their policy the Government of India desire to place the formation of the character of the scholars and under-graduates under tuition. The need is unquestionably urgent, and it would, indeed, have been a matter of surprise if the Government had failed to recognise its supreme importance. The question that has yet to find a satisfactory solution is one of ways and means. Now, it would readily be conceded that in the formation of character, the influence of the home and the personality of the teacher play a large part. The general unrest of the Indian society has invaded the Indian home, and it would be long before an atmosphere of doubts and uncertainties will cease to infect the intellectual and moral fibres of the growing generations. We hope with the Government of India that increased educational facilities under better educational conditions will accelerate social reform, spread female education and secure better teachers. Much attention is being given in the meantime to religious and moral education, comprising direct religious and moral instruction and indirect agencies such as monitorial or similar systems, social life, traditions, discipline, the betterment environment, hygiene and physical culture and organised recreation.

One may, however, reasonably doubt if the utter lack of spirituality that characterises the public education organised by the State can be cured by such palliatives. The root cause of the evil lies in the atmosphere of a public school or a college. Those who have studied the spirit of the atmosphere know that it is intensely secular and awakens none of the finer instincts of the scholars. The young mind acquires its sense of the relative value of things by the visible emphasis of its environment. It is no fault of Government nor of the teachers that the State-managed institutions in this country breathe a spirit of bargain. Their loudest note is commercialism. And how could it well be otherwise? A Government possessing an entirely new culture and new standards of life imposes a brand new system of education on the people of India, with a view to their ultimate benefit. The only value that the popular mind is able to recognise in the new training is that it is some mysterious sort of "open sesame" to positions of public authority and power. This attitude fixes the essential relation of the new teacher to the social life of the country. The parent sends his boy to school as he would send him to a workshop. The boy goes to school with the feelings of a convict entering his prison cell. He enters an environment where the value of everything depends on idiosyncrasy and accident. He faces a régime of discipline which he can not understand and which he mentally regards as an inexplicable irrelevance. He is put through queer exercises of the brain and receives vague impressions of facts, events, persons and various other things that his own orbit of life and experience does not contain. He is afraid of his teacher as he would be of a taskmaster solely bent on putting him through a grind of lessons. And when at last, after years of thankless toil, heartburnings and rebellions, he is ready to receive the hall-mark of the university and the time comes for him to leave the school, he feels a tremendous relief, the dead-weight of suppressed energy and thwarted desires lifts off his soul a little, and he plunges into the world around him with evident greed to live his own life, untroubled by gratuitous suggestions and advice.

The picture may appear to be overdrawn, but in essential features it is unmistakable. To state the whole matter plainly, the education imparted in Indian schools and colleges is not the organised experience accumulated by the people themselves in the course of their history. It represents the experience of different races under a different environment. Unless it takes root in the soil and becomes part of the social life, energy, thought and feeling, the whole process will remain an artificial one, and will consequently be attended with many risks and diverse limitations. Either the education of the younger generations of Indians should reflect the ethos of the Indian people or the people themselves should be brought up to the level of the teaching. Assuming that the Western sciences and arts embody the best and most useful knowledge available at this stage of the world's progress, it is manifest that the Indian society should be reconstructed in the light of this knowledge. The only method to hasten this consummation is to allow the people to teach themselves. Only thus will a complete system of national education be evolved in harmony with the environment and adapted to the needs of the people. The problem of character building and of rearing strong, self-reliant and virile personalities will in the process find a natural solution. The essential thing is the control of educational policy and principle. As long as the people's voice is not predominant in the shaping of the educational policy in India and in the consideration of the principles no amount of official activity and expenditure will succeed in rendering Indian education an integral part of the people's life, related to the social purpose and responsive to social needs. The most important duty of Government is, therefore, to gradually prepare the way for the complete assumption by the Indian people themselves of the control and direction of Indian education.

Apart from this fundamental consideration of policy there are various other problems of vital importance relating to the manner of developing the Indian educational systems. The Government of India have no sympathy with the federal universities that control Indian education. "The day is probably far distant," says the resolution, "when India will be able to dispense altogether with the affiliating university. But it is necessary to restrict the area over which the affiliating Universities have control, securing in the first instance a separate University for each of the leading provinces in India and secondly to create new local teaching and residential universities within each of the provinces in harmony with the best modern opinion as to the right road to educational efficiency." In pursuance of this policy the Government of India have decided to found a teaching and residential University at Dacca, and they are prepared "to sanction under certain conditions the establishment of similar Universities at Aligarh and Benares and elsewhere as occasion may demand." With the same object in view the establishment of Universities at Rangoon, Patna and Nagpur is also contemplated. In the opinion of the Government it may be possible hereafter to sanction the conversion into local teaching universities, with powers to confer degrees upon their own students, of those colleges which have shown the capacity to attract students from a distance and have attained the requisite standard of efficiency. "Only by experiment will it be found out what type or types of universities are best suited to the different parts of India." It is wise to recognise that the educational systems in India are yet in the stage of experiment, but it is doubtful wisdom to limit the scope of the experiment. The needs of the various sections of the people should form the essential basis of educational policy. Again, while no one can under-rate the importance of the teaching university as a real factor in the growth of knowledge and thought, one can not forget that the federal university plays a great and necessary part in the education of a people still in the initial stage of intellectual development. And in any educational experiment the views and aspirations of the people can not be ignored, for they are, in the most intimate sense, the expressions of the people's needs. If the Mussalmans, for instance, insist on an affiliating University at Aligarh, it is because they desire to evolve the type of education suited to their requirements and make that type accessible to the youths of their community in every part of the country. The time for differentiation and specialisation would come after a certain level of culture has been reached. Principles are not immutable verities, but represent merely the recognition of uniform needs in relation to place, time and circumstance.

As we have already observed, the resolution traverses every important aspect of the educational problem in India. It discusses the subject of primary education in some detail and lays down certain broad lines for its diffusion and extension. It reviews the present state of female education and develops certain views of general application for its growth. It takes into account the condition of secondary and higher education and refers to the need of making provisions for higher studies and research. It traces the progress made all over India in the matter of industrial and technical education and puts forward schemes for the proper organisation of medical education. Every one of these questions demands a vast amount of study and examination, and we hope to be able to deal with some of them at an early date.

Gaekwar-Baiting.

WITH the departure of Mr. Cobb from Baroda we had hoped, not without reason, that the cobwebs of imaginary sedition in, and very real prejudices against, the State would be brushed aside, and the most enlightened prince of India would be left free from worries of this kind to devote himself, as he has always done, to the task of carrying on his State one step further towards his ideals of perfection. But it is apparent that a few individuals are determined to let the Gaekwar have no peace. When a schoolboy who was pelting a toad with stones was asked by another why he was hurting a harmless toad, he had answered, "I'll turn it to be a toad." Those Anglo-Indians who will not rest satisfied with what they have already done to cause distress to His Highness the Gaekwar, simply because he shared with them the virtue of a manly independence, seem determined in the spirit of that schoolboy "to turn" the Gaekwar to be manly and self-respecting.

We do not know who contributed the article to the Pail Mail Gazette towards the end of last October to explain the Durbar Incident over the nom-de-plume of "One Who Knows." But whoever the writer, his was certainly a belated contribution, unless he believed that the wrath of a section of Anglo-India had sufficiently subdued for him to attempt to remove the prejudices created in the minds of the British public by stories of an incident exaggerated out of all proportion. But this belated contribution, however well-intentioned, has provided an outlet for a good deal of concentrated venom from one who signs himself "One Who Knows Better," and presumes to share the divine privilege of knowing what is in the hearts of people, which humanity has hitherto reserved for One who knows best. This, however, is not the rebuffing of an uncontrolled temper at the belated defence of the Gaekwar, but a deliberate attempt made after three months, during which the venom has been allowed to become still more poisonous in its potency.

But let us come to grips with the so-called facts of the Durbar Incident. It is wholly untrue to say that "when he (the Gaekwar) arrived at Delhi he wrote a letter to Headquarters which were deliberately at variance with the facts presented for Ruling Princes desiring an interview with the Viceroy." To the best of our knowledge no such correspondence took place between the Gaekwar and the "Headquarters," although there was some official correspondence before His Highness's departure for Delhi. But the writer in Pall Mall admits that somehow offence had been taken at "Headquarters" before the Durbar Incident, and, whether His Highness the Gaekwar was guilty or not of giving such offence, when he came to the Durbar Amphitheatre it is clear that he was being watched through the glasses of prejudice which, like concave and convex mirrors, reflect only in a distorted form.

In the second place, it is absurd to say that His Highness "disregarded official injunctions with which he had been explicitly acquainted" concerning the Durbar. As a matter of fact, His Highness did not at all know of these injunctions, and was even wondering in his mind why they had not been communicated to him. He received no copy of any of such injunctions, and was, therefore, not in the least "explicitly acquainted" with them.

Much is made of the Gaekwar's costume on the occasion of the Durbar, and we are inclined to think that the writer has missed his vocation by not contributing weekly articles to some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries on "Women's Interests" and vying with "Butterfly" in her descriptions of modes and millinery. Now, whatever one's views about dress, one is bound to observe the conventional decencies of the world, and, in the case of official ceremonies, everyone who chooses to go there to attend them has to put on a costume that is de rigueur for the occasion. We do not know whether any costume was prescribed for Indian Princes as it had been in the case of the Indian people. But if it had been, we may be sure that the Resident of Baroda would have seen to it that the Maharajah conformed to the official requirements to a button. We may, therefore, take it that it was not so prescribed, and no one offended against the rules of the Government of India's sartorial department if he did not decorate himself like a bride. As regards the Gaekwar himself, it is no secret that His Highness wears the simplest of all dresses, and in this respect conforms to "the note of good breeding" not only in England but also in India, where men who are in their forties do not wear gaudy silks and satins unless they have ambition to appear as "lady-killers." We do not know what qualifications the Gaekwar's critic possesses for presuming to call himself "One Who Knows Better." But we know this much that we have known His Highness in a humble way for the last 10 years, and during all this time could never find an occasion when we could suspect that he often "affects" a chaste simplicity when he is "to attend any public ceremonial at which exalted British personages are present." Is it only a mere love of the picturesque, or the desire to be different from others, that leads so many Westerners to admire the "picturesque" costume of Orientals? We suspect it is the latter, for the brilliant sun of India presents excellent opportunities to Englishmen in this country to cease insulting God's light by "affecting" a sombre hue in their customary suits of solemn black. Far from trying to apologise for the hideous costume of his own people, the Pall Mall writer accuses the Gaekwar of purposely appearing in a costume unworthy of the occasion in order to insult His Majesty, and this merely because it was white and made of cotton. Had the Gaekwar harboured any such motives he would certainly not have elected to appear in the Durbar of Lord Curzon, with whom he was not exactly on terms of close friendship, in a "white satin robe edged with gold." But if His Highness did not in the last Durbar appear in gold and satin it is also a mischievous misstatement of facts to say that "he elected to do homage to the King-Emperor in cheap white cotton such as the clerks in his public offices wear." We fear, in spite of being great admirers of the Gaekwar, we cannot credit him with being too generous to his clerks in the way of high salaries, and if they can wear the costume he was wearing on the occasion of the last Durbar, we would strongly urge the appointment of a Commission to enquire into the corrupt practices of the clerical establishments of his offices. We presume the Pall Mall writer can still buy in Bond Street and Regent Street linen and lace worth more than some of the gaudy rubbish that passes under the name of silk and satin in the mercer's shops in Native States. Now, the Gaekwar was wearing a fairly expensive garment with an exquisite border of Indian lacework, and, although His Highness is simple enough in his dress, we are afraid he is in anything but an expensive and keeps several laceworkers from Kashmir and other places busy with embroidering his angrakhas. That a writer presuming to call himself "One Who Knows Better," and who from internal evidence appears to be one who ought to know better, should describe such a costume as cheap and within the means of office clerks is an indication of his honesty in dealing with the whole Durbar Incident and his reflections on the administration of the Baroda State. But the matter of dress does not end here. The writer asserts that "in his own State on occasions he (the Gaekwar) is wont to appear in much braver array," and points to "a portrait of the Gaekwar as he is accustomed to present himself at times to his own people," which appeared in the Sketch of the 27th December, 1911. This is supposed to depict the Gaekwar "in the full uniform of his 'army,' a uniform which is neither very simple nor very chaste." Now during our personal experience of Baroda, which is unquestionably more intimate and of a longer duration than that of any European, we never saw His Highness in anything braver than a cowardly linen, and the army to which the Gaekwar's critic refers in inverted commas—typographical signs which have been imposed on it by the rigours of British policy—has never been such a favourite service of His Highness as to induce him to appear, even once during all the time that we could gain experience of Baroda, in this military uniform.

We are not artists ourselves, but we do not think we will be far wrong in stating that these good people, do not love specially when they come to the East in search of colour and bright sunshine, to paint an India potentate in white linen. But to suggest that the portrait published by the Sketch depicted the Gaekwar in a costume that he often wears even on ceremonial occasions is as much at variance with facts as, for instance, would be a remark that His Highness appears with a dupatta, or scarf, only because he allowed himself to be painted with one as a concession to Giron the French artist, whose portrait of the Gaekwar can be seen any day in the Makarpura Palace. Incidentally the Pall Mall writer mentions that in the uniform of the Sketch portrait His Highness wears the aiguillettes of an aide-de-camp to the King-Emperor, an honour he does not possess. If that is so, His Highness has erred in the company of the European tailors who were commanded to prepare a military uniform for His Highness on the distinct understanding that it was not an imitation of any uniform elsewhere. We hope the question of the Gaekwar's dress, at any rate, is now settled once for all, not because of what we have said, but because of the unbending logic—unbending even to reason—of the Gaekwar's sartorial critic who thinks that a reference to the note of good breeding in the matter of dress is tantamount to a criticism of His Majesty the King-Emperor because on the occasion of the Durbar at Delhi he wore his crown. We do not know what His Majesty thinks of all this, but to us it appears the height of insolence to use the person of His Majesty as a stalking horse for every vile insinuation aimed at the Gaekwar and the safe satisfaction of every personal revenge.

Another "fact" to which the Pall Mall critic refers relates to the wearing of the jewels. Evidently the Pall Mall has discovered a Tavernier to describe the jewels worn by the Gaekwar on public occasions. At the Durbar of 1903 the Gaekwar is stated to have worn a "breast-plate" of diamonds which this connoisseur of jewels appraised at a quarter of a million sterling. At the State Ball in 1903 he is said to have worn a chain of diamonds. We suppose all this was done to do homage in a fitting manner to the Lord of Kiddleston for the love the Gaekwar bore him. But what passes our understanding is the logic of this connoisseur of robes and jewellery when he says, "the one thing that damns the apology of 'One who Knows' is that the Gaekwar actually arrived at the King-Emperor's Durbar wearing jewels." But does this not damn the criticism of the critic himself? If the Gaekwar did arrive at the Durbar wearing his jewels, such, presumably, as the clerks in his public offices would not wear, he would not have come to the Durbar in a white cotton dress out of malice forethought. Evidently, therefore, whatever designs the Gaekwar had of insulting His Majesty were foisted in the Durbar itself. The Pall Mall writer says that, "for reasons best known to himself, before the King-Emperor arrived His Highness took them off. There were many who were present who could verify this statement. Was it nerves which prompted him to strip his cotton robe of jewels?" When he confesses that the reasons for such an action are best known to the Gaekwar himself, would it not have been more charitable to insinuate nothing by asking whether this was due to the Gaekwar's nervousness? At any rate, if there are many who were present who can verify his statement, we trust they will also have honesty enough to verify that a beautiful pearl necklace which His Highness was wearing on the occasion was handed by His Highness to his son when he discovered that the latter had, possibly through some oversight, not been given, or from personal disinclination had not himself asked for, any State jewels to wear on such an occasion. But it seems that the demands of loyalty are so exacting that, in order to be a respectful ally, an Indian prince must cease to be a fond parent.

Next comes another "fact" in which it is His Excellency the Viceroy who is used as a cover for darting another poisoned arrow at the Gaekwar. The writer says that "the programme laid down that everybody was to rise when His Excellency drove into the arena and to remain standing until he had taken his place beneath the Imperial canopy." Now, as a matter of fact, no such programme had been given to His Highness, and neither the Resident, nor any of the Ministers in attendance upon His Highness, explained it to him. It was certainly not explained to His Highness that when the Viceroy was sitting in his carriage His Highness was to stand. When the Resident drew his attention to the fact that "everybody duly rose except one man," and, if we are not mistaken, tried to impress upon him that "in all that vast assemblage one man remained defiantly seated," and that "that one man was the Gaekwar of Baroda," His Highness at once stood up. If the Gaekwar "jumped up as if he had been shot," we should like to know what the remarks of the Resident had been who was observed to bend down and say something to His Highness. Were they as courteous as the Resident wished the Gaekwar to be to the Viceroy? But we know this much that it would be perfectly incorrect and a perversion of facts to say that His Highness resumed his seat while all the people, including the greatest princes in India, were standing at that moment.

These were incidents and side issues to which the public had not, we believe, been treated before this in any discussion of the Durbar Incident, and we, therefore, went into details to leave no chance of further mischief. But when we come to the so-called insult to the King-Emperor, it would be enough if we left the version of the crime on one side, and stated the facts as they took place, and not as they have been manufactured since then. His Highness made obeisance once to the King-Emperor, as he had been asked by the Resident to do. He was not given to understand that a second obeisance to the Queen-Empress was required of him, and it is utterly false to say that His Highness turned his back on Their Majesties. On account of our personal relationship, we watched the homage done by the Gaekwar as well as one who thinks he knows better, and, unless we are assured that he presumes not only to know but also to see better, we are prepared to adhere to the testimony of our own eyes. What the Gaekwar actually did was to step back and turn aside a little in some confusion, and he appeared to ask a European officer on duty the way he was to go back. When that was pointed out to him, he turned at an angle and went by that way. If it was anything it was a little gaucherie, such as that of which a thousand titled ladies and gentlemen in England in Levées, Courts and Drawing-rooms are guilty on the testimony of His Excellency the Viceroy's own brother, who was in attendance on His Majesty as an aide-de-camp at the time of the incident, and who has not kept his view of the whole incident a secret. But what a dowager of seventy with impunity may do is unpardonable in an "admittedly rather nervous man," because he "has been a Ruling Prince for over 80 years."

We are also told by the Pall Mall critic that "one of his little affectations is to carry a stick." We wonder whether in the list of his "affectations" his critic includes the Gaekwar's habit of walking fast, or for the matter of that walking forwards and not backwards, or even breathing. But this "affectation" and the fact that the Gaekwar carried a stick when he did homage to His Majesty, gives his critic an excellent opportunity of discouraging like a Gold Stick in European Courts on the enormity of carrying sticks at such functions. Where, however, he has overlooked the mark is the statement that "every one in India knows what the late Nizam would have done if his heir had been audacious enough to appear before him in open Durbar armed with his stick." Now, we have no desire to involve His Highness the Nizam in any odium in connection with the Durbar, but it would appear that the heir of the late Nizam did carry a stick when he went to pay his homage to his august ally, and, if we are not mistaken, the Maharajah of Mysore and several other princes similarly carried sticks in their hands. As regards going away twirling his stick, we fear His Highness the Gaekwar was guilty of this gaucherie in the Durbar of 1908 also; but we are almost sure that so unconscious is His Highness of following this well-known habit of his that if he had been asked even a minute after the incident he would not have exactly remembered whether he did or did not twirl his stick on his way back after having somewhat awkwardly turned away from the place where he had done homage.

As the Pall Mall critic says, thousands saw the act, hundreds of thousands have seen it reproduced on the cinematograph, and the facts are not disputed even by the Gaekwar himself. But we should like to know who saw what the cinematograph did not reproduce—the anger of wrathful princes. We should indeed be obliged for the name of even one of "the proud and the loyal and chivalrous Rajputs" who "told him in fierce terms what they thought of his conduct." This is a pure fiction like others invented by the writer. Not a single prince is known to have talked to the Gaekwar about this incident, and no prince is known to have come to him. It was merely a friend among the gentlemen present on the occasion who came over and informed His Highness that the European community had greatly misunderstood and misinterpreted the incident. His Highness, who would be the last to wound anyone, at once, and of his own accord, wrote a letter explaining that no discourtesy was meant.

As we have said before, a section of Anglo-Indians is not willing to spare the august person of the Sovereign nor the Viceroy in search of cover for a venomous attack on one who represented Indian manliness, and the best proof of this is that, while the accusation related only to the Gaekwar's "aggressive lack of respect alone," the punishment pleaded for was to deal with "a series of acts of turbulent defiance extending over many years." The writer shrieks for the Gaekwar's blood as the Sansculottes did for the blood of those of a better social position than their own, although he does it with less reason. "He was saved by the gracious clemency" of His Majesty, but "I venture respectfully to think he was saved unwisely." "All India expected his deposition!" This gentleman may or may not have any right to represent European opinion in India, but when he talks so foolishly and wildly in the name of "all India," we have every right to cry "Halt!" and request him to show his credentials. Had the Gaekwar been dealt with as the writer suggests, we have reason to believe that His Majesty's noble mission of cementing India with Great Britain in loyal friendliness and mutual goodwill would have to a large extent failed. But it was a wise Providence that had placed on the British throne one who knew how to win the heart of all India, and not "One Who Knows Better."

Even after having squirted so much venom from the garret into the gutter, the Gaekwar's critic is not satisfied. Like a Pharisee he thanks heaven he does not discuss a case relating to the private life of the Gaekwar as was done by "One Who Knows." But the reason is obvious. The case which was brought into the English court of law with such calculating cruelty just on the eve of the Durbar, and wired by Renter to India with such subtle effectiveness, would have explained the nervousness of a prince who has always been a prey to nerves, and whose private life is believed, even by this determined enemy of his, to be "above reproach." But he makes up for this self-complacent and extremely useful reticence by referring to obvious "domestic influences," and to "the adulations of Swiss hotel managers who are his chief delight and the folly of English peeresses who are stupid enough and ignorant enough to greet him with curtesys." We may or may not commiserate with the managers of Swiss hotels where His Highness's insomnia carries him in search of nature's soft nurse, but we heartily sympathise with this merciless exposé of the follies of English peeresses. As for the New York drawing-rooms and the "incomes," they offer Indian ruling chiefs, it will go hard with the peers of England if this critic of the peeresses closed for them their happy hunting grounds also, where something more substantial than incense is offered. If we mistake not, it was the drawing-rooms of California that asked for some incense from the Gaekwar for its youth and beauty.

Verse.

TO-DAY, TO-MORROW, AND YESTERDAY.

What is the life of a man, you say?

Only a shout that is borne away,—

Only a song 'midst toil and play,—

To-day, to-morrow, and yesterday.

What is a woman's love, you say?

Only a star above the way,—

Only a kiss in the month of May,—

To-day, to-morrow, and yesterday.

What is the heart of a child, you say?

Why, there's a joy that is ours away,—

A priceless pearl for which we pray,—

To-day, to-morrow, and yesterday.

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUP.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

--As You Like It.

After an interval of three weeks the Council assembled again to have a short and sweet saturnalia of questions, presentations of Select Committee Reports and references to Select Committees. Hon. Members came rushing from all parts of the Continent to sit for an hour on the green benches and realize the satisfaction of being Honourable--with a capital H--for a dreamwhile. In the absence of H. E. Sir Guy in the chair. Four Hon. Members came to pledge their allegiance, and foremost among them was the Lion of Banganapalle, a veritable King of the Forest with massive features and very broad shoulders. He roared out his loyalty that he did any man's heart good to hear; he roared that he almost made Sir Guy say: "Let him roar again, let him roar again," and were it not that should he have done it too terribly he would have frightened the sheaths and the picture-hats in the gallery above, he would have shaken his loyalty, and that were enough to hang us all as uproarious loyalists. Next came Oh, My! of Burma, followed by the Bombay Duck. Thanks to the Government, he bobbed up his head once more above the water to act as a pilot boat for the ancient craft known as Waqf-ala-l-Aulad, which had to voyage through the Scylla of English Equity and the Charybdis of gratuitous Indian obstruction. The rear was brought up by the Second Ranji ominously associated in his very first innings with the Duck.

The landlord of Madras who owns a libraryfull of names, hereafter to be called, for brevity's sake, Ranghiranga, asked the first question about agricultural education to which Boudlair Sahib replied at some length. Encouraged by this courteous attention, Ranghiranga put in the briefest of all questions, just asking what special attempts, if any, had been made to remove the general illiteracy of the peasant population in the country. Considering that the peasant population in the country numbers more than 200 millions, and practically the entire branch devoted to primary education employed in teaching Ram Dabsh the three R's, and, considering that the Mild Hindu had been at it hammer and tongs for a full triennium, 'twas simply delicious to see an Hon. Member of the Council rising from his lordly bed, rubbing his eyes and yawning leisurely, to know what attempts, if any Boudlair Sahib and his Department had made to enlighten his ryots. What would not Burly Rajah have given to dispossess this wiseacre of all his acres for the sin of being anxious to remove the general illiteracy of the peasant population? Boudlair Sahib in no mood to stand up in Council and recite, for the Hon. Member's edification, huge Imperial tones that would shame the Encyclopædia Britannica, manufactured by his Department for the edification of his office Duffry who stacks them in the Secretariat library as soon as the Secretariat Press can turn them out. So to this brief question was given a brief answer in two words. "Read reports!" As if this not enough, the Rip Van Winkle of Madras landlordism turns his attention from one set of dumb driven cattle to another and asks whether Government had even a remote intention of opening such things as veterinary dispensaries in rural parts for the protection of agricultural cattle. The New Sage, disturbed from his sagacious slumbers by one who had himself been roused from his sleep a moment before, was terribly sarcastic. "No, Government had had no such intention till Hon. colleague taught them their duty. The 358 veterinary dispensaries in India were only make-believes and had no real existence. At any rate, what had they to do with rural parts? They were all for Presidency Towns, and far from being for the protection of agricultural cattle, were concerned only with the rinderpest of agitation and the foot and mouth disease of peripatetic orators!" To another question addressed in the direction of Sir Guy a reply was given by proxy that the High Prices Enquiry Report was likely to be submitted shortly, meaning thereby that it will be received when still higher prices ruled in the country. After this it was once more the turn of the Sage and his sarcasm. "Are any steps taken by the Departments of Agriculture in different Provinces to popularise new ideas about agriculture?" The Sage bowed politely, and handed over to the questioner the third report on the introduction of improvements into agriculture by the work of the Agriculture Department, and asked whether Ranghiranga was not satisfied with Agricultural Associations, Local Demonstrations, Vernacular Agricultural Journals, Leaflets and Circulars, Agricultural Shows and Exhibitions, Itinerant Assistants, Seed Farms and Seed Depôts the utilization of individual expert cultivators for the introduction of improved methods, Vernacular short courses, training sons of cultivators, assistance in marketing and connection with the Co-operative Movement.

When all the five chambers of Ranghiranga's revolver had been emptied into the serried ranks of Government, Cheery Chitnis rose to ask what replies, if any, had been received from Local Governments, during the short interval of three years, to his question of 10th February, 1910, regarding official tours and the proposals of the Decentralisation Commission, and whether any measures had been proposed to add to the comforts and conveniences of the villagers who have to act as the Commissariat Department for touring officials. Sandow III looked a world of reproaches at Chitnis, and took all the cheerfulness out of him by a glance which spelled "Et tu, Brute!" in letters of fire. The answer was a curt reference to one vouchsafed a year ago to Gurguri, and clearly indicated that, as in the case of the Turks in the Balkan War, the weakest joint in the armour of Government was the casal that greatest of all trials of Generals and Tehsildars. An army is said to march on its stomach, and, although the Sahib has a sting of polo ponies and now sports even motor cars, the Tehsildar would prefer to walk on his head if it saved the Kalattar from his reptility. After this question Chitnis turned his attention from those who marched on their stomachs to those who did it on four legs, and enquired about his cattle survey question of three years ago and the opinion of the Inspector-General of the Veta. The Sage replied that no reply had been received from the Inspector-General, and presumably because he had nothing else to do, and even then failed to reply in two years to Chetry Chitnis's question, the Sage announced that the Inspector-General's office was abolished last year. Well done, General De Vet! If it took Kitchener two years to suppress your namesake, it did not take less for the namesake of the Silent Sage of Chelsea to discover in you a dangerous rival in silence and abolish your office, amalgamating it with his own.

Bahim-too-la-Karim-daga put a few questions about the opening up of other ports for the embarkation of the pilgrims for Mecca, to which Bontair Sahib replied that out of consideration for the pilgrims themselves Government were anxious to open as few doors for the cagebirds as possible. Madras Hajees were too few and embarkation from the port would not pay. Chittagong Hajees were too many and some excellent bandobast always provided ships when there were no pilgrims, while Providence gave pilgrims when Companies provided no ships. The gateway of Bombay was, however, wide open, and a new wicket had been opened at Karachi, with a set-off in the shape of a British company to replace the Moghals, and acquire, by the grace of Government, a monopoly.

Rajah Mir Kadam asked about the architecture of new Delhi to make sure there would be no P.W. D. corner in artistic building, and was assured that the Battle of the Styles was still raging.

Rangbiranga came in for a second innings the same day. He did not attempt another score of five figures, but bitterly complained that, all landlords having been decoyed to Madras for public functions when the one public function to which he had invited them was connected with voting for the Imperial Legislature, only 79 recorded their votes out of 123. But Sandow thought this was good enough for vested interests, and refused to trust even landlords with a vote given anywhere else except under the eyes of the Collector.

The Second Pundit, not satisfied with a new Council, asked for a new constituency of graduates, and was told that the question was as old as the hills, and the reply that could be given him was as mildewed as the mountains.

Chetry Chitnis once more rose to ask a question, this time about the silver linings to the coats of the India Council, and wanted to know if an official of Indian financial experience and a non-official Indian from the commercial community could be included in the latest Royal Commission? Would the Government also lay on the table any official paper or papers which may be available on the subject for the information of the Indian public? Noble Woodburn Ghiani stood up aghast and reproachfully asked Chetry Chitnis: "How could you?" Did not Chitnis know already that in discussions about the purchase of silver and the Gold Standard Reserve the Secretary of State had refused to dole out even a little speech which was silver, and had instead chosen to exercise a golden reserve? "Papers? What papers? We have no papers," said Ghiani in the bitterness of his heart, for the Secretary of State had not trusted the Government of India with the least record of the famous fight between the Capulets and Montagus of India Office finance.

When the questions were over, Sandow III presented the report of the Select Committee on Extradition Bill. Who says Fazoool-bhai now? Has he not saved the third cousin seven times removed of Indian Princes from being packed back to the Native States whence they had bolted away for dear life, with the hope of saving themselves from the fitful wrath of an irate Prince, beloved of the Politicians by reason of a lavish investment in Polo Cups and loyalty? Incidentally, Fazoool-bhai has placed between the Rao of Cutch and the merchant princes of Bombay something like twenty Rains of Cutch, in the shape of that recording angel, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, who shall in all cases record the statement of persons accused by Native Princes and arrested on the warrant of Politicians, and may exercise the privilege of putting another desert of Sahara between the accuser and the accused in the shape of a Local Government!

The Moslem Dowager presented the Council with twins—the Official Trustee and the Administrator-General—and then the Bombay Duck came to the surface and thanking H. E., reserved his remarks for the sitting in camera in the Select Committee, and ducked his head again in the water. Not so reserved the Gheznevide who, imitating the sun in the two poles, which whirled during a day of six months to make up for the night of half a year, is now regretting the last triennium's virtue of silence as a lost opportunity in the way of speech, but with every effort to make up for lost time. He began an assault on the Medes and the Persians of Bombay, U.P. and bifurcated

Bengal, and brought to his aid as auxiliaries the Government of the late-lamented Ebasam and the now-to-be lamented Government of the North-West Frontier which, along with Madras and the Punjab, accorded him their unstinted support. Learnedly talked all the Moslem Law of Endowments like a Madrasa Mad Mulla, praised the Dacca Nawab as a recognised and veteran leader and mourned the disruption and the ruin of ancient Moslem families. But who says of the East and the West that never the twain shall meet? The Gheznevide, not satisfied with His Holiness the Mulla, became for the nonce the Solicitor-General of feudal England and rattled off "Coke upon Lyttleton" and Blackstone's Commentaries and all about primogeniture and entail. How could Their Lordships of the Privy Council defend Equity and the Keepership of the King's Conscience? Even in England they had those excellent institutions, the younger son cut off with a shilling and thrown upon his own resources—and bridge—which acted "as a great incentive to his building up a fortune," and the first-born of England who succeeded to his father's broad acres and gout and was thrown upon the resources of his ancestors and his tenants, and incidentally into the arms of the latest Gaiety favourite and Mr. Lloyd George. The Gheznevide would have gone up at a break-neck speed over the ditches and the hurdles had not his progress been arrested by that great progressive, Jabbar-Qahhar, the only Moslem left in the 20th century like a veritable Robinson Crusoe on the deserted island. But the Gheznevide proved himself to be the best of horsemen, and keeping a firm grip and a steady hand over the reins, dug the spurs of religion into the flanks of his gee-gee and cleared this five-barred gate with the remark that a good Mussalman holds nothing so dear as religion, and that he would never have approved of this bill if he had had the least doubt that it was only a burning brand stolen by a latter-day Prometheus from Gehenna. "Nothing like religion in these days," whispered the cynic, "to win the applause of the masses and put the fear of God into Governments." As a concession, however, to the 20th century, the Gheznevide talked a little of women's rights and not of men's and British Ministers' wrongs, and seemed willing to enfranchise women instead of the ancient pastime of chastising them. After supporting the main principles of the bill he turned his attention to some necessary pruning and cutting down of the section which engrafted modern innovations on the ancient law of his co-religionists.

Now clearly this was the day of the lawyers and not of landlords or lancers. But Free-Lance, now converted into a True Believer, so anxious to be delivered of his fatwas. He had envied for long the despotism of despatch boxes which stared him in the face every day as they serenely reposed in front of the eight serenely reposing Members of the Government of India and their Secretaries. The gallant Tiwana, forced on the last Council day to recognise the might of the pen, had brought a despatch box with him to-day to match those of the other boxers, and when it was his turn to speak, deliberately turned the key in the box, opened it and drew out an elaborately prepared speech. The whole world was on the tiptoe of expectation, but its hopes were doomed to disappointment. The Free-Lance contented himself with saying that although he had gone through the entire correspondence on the bill and was able to deal with it as it deserved, he reserved his opinion till he had ascertained the wishes of those who had done themselves the honour of accepting him as their representative. But who could that be? It was not the landlords, who returned a Hindu this time, and surely it could not have been the Mussalmans? How could a backward community have had the sense to make such an excellent choice? Is it possible that Free-Lance represents in the Council the good sense and the honesty of Government, while the Khan Bahadur represents—outside it—the benign Government's reward of the lovers of nominations?

The Dowager was truly Moslem to-day and discoursed sweetly on Moslem Law. Not content with quoting Moslem judges and pleaders, divines and Doctor of Law of to-day—not to mention the Moslem League—the Dowager sought inspiration in original authorities of the law of his faith. He proved that not in vain had he sat at the feet of the Mullas to go through the entire labyrinth of the Nizamigga when, as he may well confess, they tried their level worst to make him a good Moslem.

After another short speech from the Bombay Duck, the Dowager was up again, in order to defeat perpetuity once more and settle the endowment of the Moslem Baronet of Bombay in perpetuity. In graceful terms referred to the presence of his amiable colleague, Fazoool-bhai, worthy son of a worthy father, and himself a brilliant young pioneer of industry who followed well in the footsteps of his father. High as was the compliment paid by the Dowager to his revered father, all acknowledged that 'twas no exaggeration. Long may he live to enjoy his Sovereign's recognition of his merit as an earner and his wantonness as a giver!

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Feb. 15.

A Constantinople message says that heavy fighting took place at Bulair on the 18th instant. Both sides suffered considerable losses.

The Constantinople authorities have decided to expel all Hellenic subjects from the Dardanelles and its environs. Fifty persons thus expelled have arrived at Athens. They report that two thousand Greeks have already been arrested.

The conference of Ambassadors yesterday discussed the Turkish proposal in favour of intervention by the Powers. The conference also discussed the difficulty between Rumania and Bulgaria, and agreed to give counsels of moderation at Sofia and Bukharest.

In spite of the friendly statements and articles published at Vienna the anti-Austrian feeling in St. Petersburg is becoming increasingly bitter. There is reason to believe that the Austrian ideas with regard to Albania far exceed those of Russia and will certainly excite the resentment of the Balkan Allies.

A Canea telegram states that H. M. S. Yarmouth landed a detachment of bluejackets and hauled down the flags of the protecting powers and the Turkish flag, rendering military honours, and thereafter hoisted the Greek flag. The Cretans made an enthusiastic demonstration in favour of Greece and the protecting Powers.

London, Feb. 17.

A Constantinople message states that the Turkish ironclad "Assari Tewfik," which went ashore near Midia, has been abandoned. The crew have arrived at Constantinople. The Bulgarians state that she struck a Bulgarian mine and that the Bulgarians mining detachment subsequently destroyed her.

Uncensored despatches from Constantinople estimate the Turkish losses at Bulair on the 12th instant at five thousand killed and over ten thousand wounded and taken prisoners. The Turks also had three thousand wounded in the fighting at Kurudagh on the 7th February.

It is believed that the Greeks intend landing troops at Kabatepeh on the west side of the Gallipoli Peninsula to attack Gallipoli and Bulair from the rear.

The Turkish are hampered not only by penury, but by insufficiency of officers and shortness of supplies. The men to-day in office are gradually becoming entangled in the same confusion and disorganisation which attended the Turkish collapse early in the war. Political differences between officers are also a serious factor.

A Sofia telegram states that the Turkish transport taking part in the landing at Charkeni on the 12th instant was sunk with the crew.

There are increasing indications that the Turkish Government, in view of the growing confusion and discontent in the Army and financial chaos, is showing greater disposition to abandon its uncompromising attitude and face the inevitable.

A telegram to the Daily Mail from Constantinople states that the Grand Vizier has been converted to his predecessor's view that the greatest need of Turkey is to end the war, and it is reported that he has suggested to the Embassies the possibility of surrendering Adrianople.

Hakki Pasha, who bears further proposals to the Ambassadors in connection with peace in the Balkans, has arrived in London.

A Sofia message states that the Government has decided that foreign consuls and subjects desiring to leave Adrianople shall be granted facilities to do so immediately.

A Constantinople telegram states that a belated Turkish account of the fierce battle at Szentari on the 4th February, in which the Montenegrins have already admitted they suffered heavy loss, says that the army of sixteen thousand besiegers was completely defeated leaving three thousand dead and wounded on the field with six guns and quantities of ammunition.

The Turkish warship Hazudiyeh left Malta at one o'clock this morning.

Uncensored telegrams from Constantinople indicate that the army of sixty thousand men, commanded by Enver Bey, has been a complete failure. Nothing has since been heard of the column. It is alleged that it landed at Eregli, but as the fleet subsequently made vain attempts to effect landings at other points the story of the expedition's success is doubted. The most costly of the fleet's efforts was the landing at Charkeni where of four thousand men who disembarked only half escaped.

The armada eventually made for Gallipoli where a portion of the troops were landed to assist in the defence of Bulair lines, whence according to refugees over three thousand wounded were brought to Gallipoli. The armada comprised forty-five vessels, but many of them were small, even Bosphorus steam ferries being commandeered for the purpose.

London, Feb. 18.

It is officially stated in Constantinople that the situation is unchanged at Bulair and Adrianople where the bombardment was resumed yesterday. The Bulgarians at Tchataldja advanced in the direction of Belgrade Forest and bombarded Osmanlikui.

All available accommodation at Cetinje has been requisitioned for the wounded at Scutari whose numbers are heavier than was at first believed. It is officially intimated that the attack on Scutari will not be resumed at present.

Reuter learns that diplomatic circles do not attach much importance to the alarming view expressed elsewhere of the relations between Austria and Russia. The matter will be considered at the next conference of Ambassadors. In the meantime the Russian counter-proposals have reached Vienna. Austria has now intimated that she is willing to agree to the exclusion from Albania of the plains of Scutari, Ipek, and Prizend, but she maintains her view that Scutari itself, Djakova, Dibra, and Jannina must form part of autonomous Albania.

A Vienna telegram states that at a prolonged council of members of the joint ministry on Sunday and yesterday according to the papers Count von Berchtold made a speech in which he declared that the letters exchanged between Emperor Francis Joseph and the Tsar had justified the best hopes of the friends of peace. He said that in the event of complications either side would uphold peace.

London, Feb. 19.

Reuter learns that the Powers are contemplating mediation between Rumania and Bulgaria, which have been fruitlessly discussing various compromises. The matter has now been referred back to Bukharest.

Rumania offered to renounce Solistria if she received a further extension from the Black Sea to Kaliakra, but Bulgaria refuses to assent to this because forts erected there would command Varna.

A Bukharest telegram states that an official statement declares that the latest concessions by Bulgaria are unsatisfactory. The sole hope is that the Powers will initiate mediation. In spite of public agitation the Rumanian Government is preserving its sans froid conscious of its strength. It points out that British diplomacy has played a considerable part in the effort to effect a peaceful solution.

London, Feb. 20.

The Turkish Government has obtained an advance of half a million sterling from the Belgian group on security of various barracks and the parade ground in Constantinople.

A Sofia telegram states that the representatives of the Powers with the exception of the Russian have been instructed to propose to Bulgaria to submit her differences with Rumania to the decision of the Powers.

A Constantinople message says that snowstorms and bitter cold have checked hostilities for the last week. In consequence there have been no serious developments. It is stated that the Bulgarians are experiencing difficulties in the matter of supplies.

It appears that a suggestion is being discussed in the chancelleries of Europe that Italy and Russia should arbitrate in the dispute between Bulgaria and Rumania. It is semi-officially announced at Rome that Italy is prepared to participate in such arbitration though she would prefer mediation by all the Powers.

In the House of Lords last evening Lord Lamington raised the question of the atrocities alleged to have been committed by the Balkan Allies on Muhammadans in Macedonia, and the effect which the stories were having on Muhammadans in India. He protested against Sir Edward Grey's statement in the Commons that the feeling in India was stimulated by questions in the Commons. These questions, said his Lordship, had done public service to the Empire and had shown the Muhammadans in India that they had friends in England.

Lord Morley recalled that England was committed to neutrality and it was not easy to judge how far the rumours were well-founded. It was impossible to suppose that in a war between races divided by centuries of antagonism hateful atrocities would not be committed, but though the rumours might justify an enquiry they did not justify such action as Lord Lamington seemed to demand. It was impossible for a foreign Government to go to the field of war and investigate. With regard to the statement that the Muhammadan population in India were concerned and that Government was indifferent to that concern Lord Morley said the Government knew perfectly well, and certainly did not complain of it, that the Mussalmans in India were watching affairs in Tripoli, Morocco, and the Balkans with the greatest concern, but Lord Lamington had not shown any connection between the feeling in India and any failure to take action on the part of Government. Lord Morley added that he thought that Sir Edward Grey's attitude in his statement in the Commons on 18th instant was admirable.

* London, Feb. 21.

It is authoritatively stated in St. Petersburg that Rumania and Bulgaria have accepted the mediation of the Powers.

The Montenegrin delegate, M. Popovitch, yesterday visited the Foreign Office. He said that he had been instructed to intimate that Montenegro would rather risk annihilation than accept a compromise depriving her of Scutari.

An Athens telegram states that the artillery duel continues at Bizani to the south of Janina. The Turks are supported by hordes of irregulars. They yesterday attacked the Greek camp at Davrentza, but were repulsed with heavy loss.

M. Venizelos, the Premier, yesterday paid a flying visit to the front and conferred with the Crown Prince.

A Sofia telegram states that the Bulgarians on Monday notified the commandant of Adrianople that foreigners would be permitted to leave. The commandant did not reply.

A Constantinople message says that the French Embassy has been informed that the commandant of Adrianople is willing to agree to the assignment of Karagatch quarter as a sanctuary for Europeans. This is taken to mean that the commandant is unwilling that foreigners should leave, fearing that they will disclose information which may be detrimental to the garrison.

The Late Nazim Pasha.

HUSSEIN NAZIM PASHA, the details of whose death are reported on page 8, was born in Constantinople in 1848. He began his military studies in Turkey and completed them at Saint-Cyr. During the Russo-Turkish War he attracted the notice of Redjeb Pasha, and became chief of his staff. In those days he was a friend of Abdul Hamid's, but, suspected of taking an interest in politics, he was denounced, arrested by night, publicly degraded, and sentenced to five years' solitary confinement in a fortress at Erzinghan. As soon as he was allowed the use of books he devoted himself to studying the literature of his profession, and thus accumulated a store of modern military knowledge which was afterwards to stand him in good stead. At the end of the five years he remained for two years in Erzinghan under strict surveillance. He had developed diabetes while in confinement, and was supposed to be incurable. He presently succeeded in escaping, and worked on the roads as a navvy for some months. Freedom or hard work cured him of diabetes, and he made his way to Batum, arriving there in time to hear of the outbreak of the Young Turkish Revolution of 1908. From Batum he worked his way as a stoker to Constantinople, where he arrived penniless and unknown. His first act was to borrow £78 from Sir Adam Black, wherewith to buy a general's uniform. On appearing in this he was received with open arms by the Committee of Union and Progress, and on the proclamation of the Constitution was appointed to command the 2nd Army Corps at Adrianople. Before taking over this post he insisted that his former public degradation should be wiped out by public reinstatement. At Adrianople he set to work with extraordinary energy and was largely responsible for the completeness of the fortifications. He surrounded himself with a staff of officers mostly trained in Germany, but his professional reading had inspired him with a great belief in British military methods, and he frequently sought the advice of the British Consul, who happened to be an ex-officer of the British Army.

In February, 1909, Kiamil Pasha, then Grand Vizier, appointed Nazim Minister of War in the place of Ali Riza. This led to a struggle between the Committee and the Grand Vizier, which resulted in the latter's overthrow. Hilmi Pasha's Cabinet, which followed, was overthrown by the "counter-revolution," and during the exciting time which elapsed before the "counter-revolution" was suppressed by Mahmud Sherket, at the head of the 3rd Army Corps, it was largely owing to Nazim's influence that order was maintained in Constantinople, and the entry of Mahmud's troops into the capital was effected with so little bloodshed. From this time till the beginning of the disastrous war with Italy the Young Turks were supreme. Nazim was sent as Vali to Baghdad.

In Baghdad, with his customary energy, Nazim set on foot a reorganization scheme, the success of which much disappointed those in Constantinople, who had hoped, by sending him away, to obscure his popularity. Armed with practically unlimited powers and with the help of some officers whom he took out with him, he restored order in the most vigorous fashion, and inaugurated many useful works of public utility. But the Jackson barrage contract, which he was instrumental in bringing about, was not ratified in Constantinople, and Nazim was recalled, in spite of the collective resignation of 125 of his officers, the protests of all Baghdad, and the offer by the Sheikhs of Mesopotamia to put their armed forces at his disposal.

On his return to Constantinople in May, 1911, the Committee, realizing their mistake, made him president of the Army Council, and in July, 1912, he became Minister of War in the Cabinet of Ghazi Mukhtar Pasha. On the outbreak of the present war he appointed Abdullah Pasha to the chief command in Thrace, mainly because Marshal von der Goltz Pasha had a high opinion of him, but after the defeat of Lule Burgas he decided to command the field army in Thrace in person. It was he, therefore, who resolved on the retirement to the lines of Tchataldja, where he had his headquarters in a railway carriage at Hademkeui. A man of great mental and physical activity, he showed inexhaustible energy in supervising the defence. He was not a brilliant soldier though von der Goltz is said to have described him as "the first general of the Empire," but he was a charming gentleman and an honest man, and the whole Army believed in him.—The Times.

The Coup D'etat.

An Uncensored Despatch.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Jan. 26.

In consequence of the activity of the censorship, which is doing its utmost to prevent Europe from learning that Thursday's coup d'etat was not a national uprising against the conclusion of a dishonourable peace, and that the death of Nazim Pasha was not an accident but a very foul murder, my telegrams have suffered no little mutilation of late, and therefore, at the risk of repeating myself, I am sending the following account, based on personal observation and on the accounts of credible eye-witnesses, of what took place at the Porte on Thursday.

There can be no doubt that the Government had been repeatedly warned of the possibility of a proclamation on the part of a group of officers who were anxious for a renewal of the war at all costs, and of politicians belonging to the Committee of Union and Progress. Kiamil Pasha was serenely indifferent to what were to plain men obvious risks, and his confidence in Nazim Pasha prevented the Government from taking any special precautions. The officer in charge of the guard at the Porte seems to have been absent from his post at the critical moment, and the troops received neither warnings nor special orders what to do in case of necessity. The outbreak, therefore, found the Government unprepared. It was an affair in which minutes counted. The first warning of danger was the appearance of Djemal Bey, Vali of Adana, on horseback, accompanied by five mounted officers. As they rode into the Porte a group composed of about a dozen persons darted out of a café, unfurled a red and white flag embroidered with texts from the Koran, and rushed up the steps. Parties of men armed with revolvers appeared from round every corner. A few were officers, others belonged to the fedai element of the Committee, others were roughs of the class employed by the Committee in demonstrations against the Balkan Legations. The number did not exceed 50 all told. They rushed up the steps with cries of "Down with the Government," "We will hold Adrianople," and demanded to enter the Porte. At this moment Enver Bey and his uncle, Halil Bey, rode up, and entering the Porte asked to see the Grand Vizier.

DEMONSTRATION BEFORE THE PORTE.

I myself arrived at the Porte about an hour later, and had a good view of what was taking place. A group of about 100 persons with a banner was standing on the steps. Among them were a number of well-known Committee men and several fedais, who were intoning "La illahi illa Allah." Whenever a pause took place in these pious exercises orators denounced the Government and made patriotic speeches. The guard at the Porte stood at ease watching the proceedings with vacant smiles of complete indifference. About 100 more sympathizers were outside the gates cheering and handing round copies of a manifesto. The part of the crowd assembled there appeared to be spectators. There were many officers among them. Some appeared pleased, some angry, the majority indifferent. Within two streets of the disturbance no one seemed to know or care what was happening at the Porte. The fall of Kiamil Pasha, and the installation of a new Grand Vizier were greeted without enthusiasm, save by a few partisans.

NAZIM PASHA'S DEATH.

As for the death of Nazim Pasha, although official communiqués have been issued proving that all was an accident, the confessions of falais drunk with triumph and the evidence of persons, eye-witnesses of the events, are too strong to be resisted. As Enver, Halil, and Djemel Beys, followed by Talaat, Omar, Nadjî, and Midhat Beys, together with other leaders of the Committee, burst in, Nazim Pasha came out of the Council Chamber and cried, on seeing Enver Bey:—"What is this importunence?" "The importunence is yours," replied an ex-officer, Mustafa Nedjib, and fired on the Commander-in-Chief. Three Bullets struck Nazim Pasha, who fell dying. His Aide-de-Camp, Tewfik Bey, dropped, shot through the head. Nazif Bey, Aide-de-Camp to the Grand Vizier, shot down Nazim's assassin, and then fell himself, according to some accounts by a fedai's revolver, according to others shot by an officer.

Outside, the guard, hearing shots, wavered. A soldier levelled his rifle at Enver Bey, but the order to fire was not given. The Commandant's guard came up too late, and was literally bluffed into silence by a cool-headed officer among the conspirators.

NEGLECT OF WARNINGS.

As already remarked, the Government did not fall for lack of warnings. That very morning Talaat Bey had called upon Kiamil Pasha and informed him that there would be bloodshed unless the Porte refused to comply with the Note of the Powers. The Commandant of Constantinople, Memdukh Pasha, is said to have assisted the conspirators, but the story appears to be untrue. Memdukh Pasha arrived too late and tried to collect a body of men from the nearest battalion. He found that it had been tampered with. He rode to another barracks, but found that the officers were absent and that the men were unwilling to interfere in officers' quarrels. Thereupon he abandoned the attempt. The rank and file played a more passive part throughout the day. But if the conspirators were neither numerous nor supported by the public, they made up by promptitude for what they lacked in numbers. The telephone and telegraph wires between the Porte, the Palace, and the War Office were cut. A posse of gendarmes and secret policemen, led by Samuel Effendi, a Jew, of Serez, head of the Secret Police under the Committee régime, prevented anyone from leaving or entering the newspaper offices where a strict censorship was applied. The members of the Government were made prisoners. M. Huguenin, director of the Anatolia Railway, Herr Weber, First Dragoman at the German Embassy, and an Englishman, Mr. Kingham, manager of the National Bank, were also arrested and remained prisoners until about 5-30 P. M. The first Minister to be released was Gabriel Nouradunghian Effendi, whose reluctance as a Christian to sign a peace involving territorial losses and thus to incur the charge of treason was partly responsible for the delays which enabled the conspirators to prepare their scheme of attack. He protested against the murder of Nazim Pasha, was, by his own account, insulted and hustled and finally summoned to the presence of Talaat Bey, who had installed himself at the Ministry of the Interior, and begged to join the new Cabinet as Minister of Public Works. This offer, to his credit, he refused. The other Ministers, who were courtiously treated, were released at 3 o'clock this morning, with the exception of Abder Rahman Pasha, Minister of Finance, and Rashid Bey, Minister of the Interior, who have not yet been released as their lives, for reasons hereinafter given, are believed to be in danger.

CAUSES OF THE MOVEMENT.

Now for the causes of the movement. There has been much of Austrian, Jewish, and German intrigue. In circles favourable to the last Cabinet large quantities of money are said to have been distributed. The affair is even connected with the German delay in subscribing to the joint Note. It is impossible to say how much truth there is in such reports. That Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, whose absence from the Grand Council should have been a warning, and Ismail Hakki Pasha, ex-Vah of Van and a leading supporter of the Committee, have been regular visitors at night at the German and Austrian Embassies is notorious, but proves nothing. The local Jewish Press has lately shown an interesting parallelism with the Nouvelles Presse and other organs which, despite temporary infidelities, have never quite abandoned their love for the Committee of Union and Progress. The theory is abroad that the Jews of Central Europe and of Salonica, who never concealed their longing for a consolation prize, have given more than a platonic support to the movement based on the demand for the retention of Adrianople, which, if granted or won on the battlefield, would force the Bulgarians, towards Salonica, and thus save the Jews of that city from annexation by their redoubtable commercial rivals the Hellenes.

As for the alleged demand of the nation for a continuance of the war, the public certainly seemed rather relieved on Wednesday at the prospect of peace, and information from well-informed sources depicts the large proportion of the rank and file of the army as heartily sick of the campaign. The discontent of the officers was the base upon which the Committee and its foreign helpers worked. The Committee of Union and Progress on November 4 persuaded the Sultan to agree to the nomination of Mahmoud Shevket Pasha as Commander-in-Chief. The Cabinet stopped this, and tacitly allowed the arrest of a number of members of the Committee by martial courts on evidence which proved to be insufficient or false. The arrested persons, who were released by order of the ex-Grand Vizier, had not to complain as had the Committee's victims, who had been arrested on equally flimsy evidence, of ill-treatment in prison, but the imprisonment nevertheless rankled.

It may be asked why the Committee did not wait for the conclusion of peace to carry out the coup, when they could have represented the Government as having betrayed the country. There were several reasons for this. In the first place, the Committee of Union and Progress desired to regain control of the electoral system which has passed out of its hands. Secondly, there had been signs during the last few days that its influence, very strong after the release of its leaders, was on the wane. This decline was due to the fact that an official inquiry established the fact that the appointment of Hussein Djavid Bey, a director of the National Bank of Turkey, and editor of the Tanin, as a delegate of the Ottoman bondholders in the Turkish Public Debt Administration was the result of political pressure applied to the Greek and Armenian bondholders by the Committee. The bulk of the bondholders agreed that the appointment should be declared null and void. Public interest, too, had been aroused by the reopening of the Zeki Bey murder trial on an order of the Court of Cassation on the ground that the verdict did not specify which of the two members of the Serez branch of the Committee actually committed the crime. The first hearing of the case, although long drawn out, aroused great interest, as proving that the members of the Committee at Serez, most of whom have since perished at the hand of Bulgarian bands, were a law unto themselves and were guilty of violence and extortion on a large scale. Although the prosecution failed directly to connect either Djavid or Talaat Beys with the murder, the prospect of the reopening of the trial, in which the ex-Minister of Finance, Abder Rahman Bey, and the Deputy for Gumuldjina, Ismail Hakki Bey, played a great part, was highly displeasing. No organization could stand having its dirty linen washed twice in public. It is very significant, too, that Abder Rahman Bey remains in prison, while Ismail Hakki Bey was arrested last evening without any reason being assigned, and his friends apprehend his execution.

COMMITTEE METHODS.

For the present the Committee seems disposed to adopt a terroristic policy. Many arrests have been made. The Press has been frightened into line. The hanging of certain obnoxious persons is being openly discussed, and attempts are being made to work up religious fanaticism. It would seem, however, that a counter-revolution is apprehended by some of the leaders; Hadji Adil's circular to the Vahs is not that of a man sure of his ground. As for the opinion of the man in the street, if he has any, he keeps it to himself.

It remains to be seen whether the new Government will be able to keep up its present militant attitude with regard to the war. The Powers have already received their answer, if not actually, in words, but with pay a month in arrears, with a Russian ultimatum looming in the background, with Adrianople at its last grasp, can it fulfil its bellicose promises? It also remains to be seen how the army at Tchataldja will take the change. Foreign opinion here is mainly expressed in the quotation "Quem Deus vult perdere," &c. The one thing certain is that this hapless country seems, since it ceased to be Asiatic, to have become Central American rather than European, and to be rapidly elevating the pronunciamento to the dignity of a political institution.

Foreign Press and the Revolution.

COMMENTING on the Young Turkish coup d'état, the Temps makes the following statements:—"It is doubtful if the Sultan, with his customary constitutional correctness, lent a hand to the movement. Enver Bey, it is true, is married to an Imperial princes, and the heir to the throne, as we have stated before, is in sympathy with the new rulers. But Enver Bey and his friends probably acted by themselves, while Mahomet V. in accepting the resignation of Kiamil Pasha and placing the seals of office in the hands of Mahmud Shevket Pasha merely endorsed the accomplished fact. On the other hand, the popular voice was this time represented by a certain number of adherents of the Party of Union and Progress, the organisation of which had effaced itself, but had not been dissolved. What lends to the movement a national character is the intervention of several hundred soltas (theological students), who since the revolution had not co-operated with the leaders of the Young Turks. Their alliance with the military chief is one of the characteristic facts of the events of Thursday."

This is an unexpectedly lenient view of the coup d'état. The German Liberal press, though profoundly anxious as to the possible international results of the new situation, nevertheless judges its authors with still greater sympathy. The Frankfurter Zeitung says:—"This revolution at Constantinople may prove a blessing or a curse to the Ottoman Empire. It may have for the whole of Europe the most calamitous consequences, but this consideration must not prevent us from making this admission, that what we have now witnessed was a heroic act, and that after all the wretched display of Turkish generalship and diplomacy it is a joy to see that there are still some men left in this nation."

Commenting on the coup d'état the semi-official Fremdenblatt remarks:—

"It was undoubtedly the highest form of love for his fatherland in Enver Bey which lent wings to his thoughts and force and determination to his actions, to which human sympathy can certainly not be denied. This warm-hearted feeling for the person himself, however, cannot influence the judgment on his action. The coup d'état which occurred in the middle of a serious foreign crisis and which brought fresh complications in its train will be most severely condemned in every political quarter in Europe, and it will be impossible not to have the impression that this is a passing episode and an ephemeral success, for the iron hand of necessity is stronger than the strongest personality in history."

The article proceeds to say that heroic songs may be written by a future generation about Enver Bey, extolling him as the national hero of the Ottoman people, but the Europe of to-day which appraises his action at its proper value, will only pass her severest censure on him for having braved the necessities of the aims and the wishes of Europe. The advice of Europe was intended to smooth the path of the sorely tried Turkish Empire towards a return to peace, and whoever wishes to disturb this work, brings with him new germs of disease and fresh crises.

"Europe has expressed herself unanimously in favour of peace. In view of the new turn affairs have taken in Constantinople and the results which may possibly ensue, we wish to express the definite hope that Europe, setting aside all special advantages and side issues, will agree to take steps which should be unanimous both as regards their means and ends in order to avert a danger which political thoughtlessness might possibly conjure up."

The New Turkish Cabinet.

MAHMUD SHEVKET PASHA, Grand Vizier and Minister of War,
Said Pasha, President of the Council of State;
Hadji Adil, Minister of the Interior;
Prince Said Halim, Minister of Foreign Affairs;
General Tehuruk Sula Mahmud, Minister of Marine;
Ibrahim Pasha, Minister of Justice;
Rifat Bey, Minister of Finance;
Batazian Effendi, Minister of Public Works;
Hairi Bey, Minister of Evkaf (Pious Foundations);
Djölal Bey, Minister of Agriculture,
Oskian Effendi, Minister of Posts;
Shukri Bey, Minister of Public Instruction.

Mahmoud Shevket Interviewed.

THE Daily Telegraph's special correspondent at Constantinople telegraphed on the 28th January an interview which he has had with the new Turkish Grand Vizier.

Mahmoud Shevket said: We have come to power in order to act. Foreign collaboration is precious to us and indispensable for the methodical reform and regular administration of the country. We shall take foreign advisers for all the Ministries. Moreover, my former experience as a Governor General has convinced me that the key to reforms of the civil administration is serious inspection. We shall divide the Empire into great administrative zones, and for each zone we shall engage a foreign inspector. I also know that foreign capitalists, with whose assistance we cannot dispense, complain the timidity of the Government or the length and sterility of Parliamentary discussions have hitherto prevented the promulgation of necessary laws and hindered the conclusion of some eminently useful affairs. Without waiting for the summoning of Parliament under the form of provisional laws promulgated simply by Imperial irade for which I shall assume full responsibility, a law will be enacted permitting the working of land banks, instituting freedom of contract, and liberty to establish joint-stock companies. Without any wearisome formalities we shall conclude the requisite agreements for the construction of railways and carrying out all necessary public works. Moreover, in the broadest possible spirit we shall study all the proper measures for the restoring of the Ottoman credit, which has been so severely shaken by the calamities through which we have passed.

That, your Highness (I observed), is an admirable outline of intentions.

It is not an outline of intentions (the Grand Vizier replied); it is a list of resolutions.

And the question of peace or war, your Highness? After all that is the fact of such grave moment that you must speak of it at last.

Well, it is peace (Marshal Mahmud Shevket said) on condition that Europe makes peace possible for us. We have not come to power in order to defy Europe and reply to her advice by bluster. You may rest assured that we have come to power in order to speak to Europe with the deference and gravity that are dictated by the situation, and to make an appeal to her conscience so that—I repeat—she may render possible that peace which we desire so ardently, as much from reasons of humanity as from the knowledge of our duty as a European State. We do not want to draw the sword, and we shall only draw it if we are faced by the alternative of choosing war or the reprobation not only of Ottoman opinion but of Mussulman opinion throughout the world.

The Porte's Reply.

(REUTERS'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Jan. 30.

THE Foreign Minister has just handed to the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador the Porte's Note in reply to the Note of the Powers. The text is as follows:—

"The undersigned, the Sultan's Minister of Foreign Affairs, has taken note of the Collective Note which the Ambassadors of Austria-Hungary, Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, and Italy were good enough to transmit to his predecessor, dated January 17. The Ottoman Government does not hesitate to recognise that the conclusion of peace corresponds with the hopes and interests of all, and that it is desirable to put an end as soon as possible to a struggle which it in no way provoked.

"In their communication the Great Powers thought fit to advise the Imperial Government to consent to the cession of the town of Adrianople to the Balkan Allies and to allow them (the Powers) to determine the fate of the Ægean Islands. The Imperial Government thinks it right to point out that it has already given undeniable proofs of a conciliatory spirit by consenting to immense sacrifices. Adrianople being an essentially Mussulman town and the second capital of Turkey, and being therefore indisputably bound up with the Empire, the mere rumour of its cession provoked a sentiment of reprobation throughout the country and such excitement as brought about the resignation of the last Cabinet. Nevertheless, in order to give a final proof of its pacific disposition the Imperial Government is prepared to place itself in the hands of the Powers as regards the part of the town of Adrianople which is situated on the right bank of the river Maritsa, while keeping the part situated on the left bank. The Mussulman mosques and other historic and religious buildings being in the part of the town situated on the left bank of the Maritsa, the retention of this part of the town under the direct sovereignty of Turkey is for the Imperial Government a necessity of which it cannot fail to take account without exposing the country to a commotion which might bring about the gravest consequences.

"As for the Ægean Islands, the Imperial Government takes the liberty of observing that while some of these islands are by reason of their immediate neighbourhood to the Dardanelles indispensable to the defence of the capital, others which form an integral part of the Asiatic possessions of the Empire are in is indispensable to the security of Asia Minor. Any solution which should tend to diminish the authority of the Imperial Government in these islands would result in transforming them into so many centres of agitation which would extend their action to the adjoining shores. The consequence would be the creation of a state of unrest similar to that which existed in Macedonia, and which threatened and still threatens the tranquillity of Europe. Independently of the deplorable effect which it would produce on Ottoman public opinion, such a solution would run counter to the aims of the Powers themselves which have at heart the establishment of a durable peace and the consolidation as well as the prosperity of the Empire. Therefore the Sublime Porte would be willing to abide by the decision of the Six Great Powers regarding the status of the islands occupied by the Balkan Allies so long as they take account of the considerations set forth above and of the care that ought to be given to the integrity of the Dardanelles, which the Sublime Porte holds to be a question of the highest European interest.

The Imperial Government is convinced that the Great Powers, in a spirit of justice and equity, will be ready to recognise the extent of the sacrifices to which Turkey has already consented and will agree that the Sublime Porte would be right in rejecting any further demands or claims which might be raised by the Balkan Allies. The Sublime Porte takes note with real satisfaction of the benevolent dispositions and promises of the Great Powers regarding their moral and material support with a view to repairing the ravages of war and developing the natural resources of the Empire. To this end it is indispensable that the Powers should recognise now and henceforth the right of Turkey to proceed unfettered with the adoption of an autonomous Customs tariff, the conclusion of treaties of commerce on the bases and principles of modern law, and the application to their subjects of Ottoman fiscal laws to which Ottoman subjects are or may in the future be subject, and that the Powers should consent meanwhile to an increase of 4 per cent in the Customs duties. The Porte believes that it is only less indispensable to abolish the foreign post offices existing in Turkey on conditions, which it would be easy to determine, that would offer commerce all the necessary guarantees of celerity and security in postal matters. The Sublime Porte also thinks that a declaration by the Powers of their desire to put an end to the capitulations system in the Ottoman Empire and the opening after the conclusion of the peace negotiations of joint consideration of means to realise this end will form, with the economic matters enumerated above, an ensemble of measures which will make possible the realisation of the promises of the Powers set forth in the above-mentioned Note."

At the Tchataldja Lines.

(BY AN ENGLISHMAN AT THE FRONT.)

For two months on Red Cross duty with the Turkish forces, I was stationed since the early part of November a few miles behind the Tchataldja lines, and thus had an exceptional opportunity of watching events and obtaining first hand information concerning the situation. Most of the Turkish officers spoke French more or less perfectly, and always seemed pleased to chat with an Englishman. Their courtesy was unflinching. My first impressions of the Turkish "Tommy" were distinctly unfavourable—that is, until I learnt that the tattered, woe-begone men I met slouching along were mostly redifs, the old reservists; indeed, was assured that at that time the army was composed of two-fifths redifs and one fifth recruits, two-fifths only being regulars.

THE ARMISTICE.

Towards the end of November, however, the character of the troops changed greatly, and all through December trailload after trailload of fine, well set-up soldiers were rushed through day and night to railroad at Hademkeny. This was the real army, mobilised for business some two months after the outbreak of war, and hailing from Asia Minor. The Turks made good use of the armistice, for by the end of December they had put a new army into the Tchataldja lines with thousands of tons of supplies, rifles, and some eighty new guns of modern pattern. By the end of December the Tchataldja lines had been rendered impregnable. It is, however, improbable that the Allies could at any time have got through, except at a terrible cost of life. When it is realised that in their so-called reconnaissance against the Turkish left flank on November 20 the Bulgars, who had against them a starving army, decimated with cholera and dysentery, lost some ten thousand men in four hours, it can be seen how hopeless was their chance of planting the Cross on St. Sophia a month later. Moreover, the strain of the campaign was beginning to tell badly on the Allies troops: they were suffering from cholera and dysentery just as badly as the Turks; they had no reserves to bring up, because every fighting man they had was already in the field, while their supply base was many miles away and their transport dependant on bullock wagons, the latter serviceable as long as the weather kept fine and the ground hard. But with the beginning of the New Year came rain and snow, turning the wagon tracks—they cannot be called roads—into veritable quagmires.

YOUNG TURK STRATEGY.

This, then, was the position at the end of December, and the feeling in the army was that, the armistice having done its work, it was time to get down to business and relieve Adrianople. Time after time I was told by both officers and men that their Government would never dare abandon the besieged city to its fate, but that if such a course were seriously considered the army would mutiny, the commander-in-chief would be shot, and the Ministers massacred. In the middle of December, while the peace negotiations were proceeding, the Young Turk leaders evidently learnt that the Government were prepared to give up Adrianople if the Powers would guarantee a forty-million loan. A few days afterwards thousands of boxes of sweetmeats were sent to the soldiers in the lines, ostensibly as a patriotic gift, but each box contained a warning that the army was being sold by Nazim and the Cabinet, and if they wanted to go on fighting they must back the Young Turk Party. As a result, two of the Young Turk leaders had to fly from Constantinople, and got safely away on the French steamer Frigu. Naturally, the soldiers, many of whom had not seen any fighting and were tired of the monotony of inaction, supported the Young Turk scheme. Thus, if the new Government really mean to defend Adrianople, Shevket Pasha will have a willing army with him.

There is, of course, the possibility that the Young Turks have merely used the Adrianople question as a pretext for regaining power, and that the bait of the offered loan will prove too strong for them, but if so I am confident that, with the army in its present temper, the kaleidoscope will soon be given another turn.

TURKISH BRAVERY.

At the present moment the Turkish army is comparatively in a better position to advance than was the British Army when Lord Roberts started out from Bloemfontein for Pretoria. The British troops knew nothing of the country they were operating in, the railway was very badly cut up, and the enemy fresh and mobile; to-day the Turks have a tired army to tackle, a familiar terrain, and a easily wended railroad.

Needless to say, sympathies are entirely with the Turks. They have fought bravely, under the most horrible lack of organisation, both as regards commissariat, arms, and hospitals. In spite of all this, they are eager to retrieve some of their old fighting prestige.

CHOLERA AND DYSENTERY.

The stoicism of the Turk is astonishing. I saw many wounded brought in from the battle of Kirk Kilisso ten days afterwards—horrible wounds, undressed, and covered with mud, which had entered the wounds when the men had fallen; yet whilst lying on the stretchers waiting to be attended to, they would be quite happy with a cigarette. Cholera, of course, was rampant for a time, both in the Turkish and Bulgarian armies, but the Turks rarely distinguish between cholera and dysentery, and of the 20,000 so-called cholera cases more than half were dysentery. With the cold, frosty nights in December cholera soon vanished and the troops got remarkably fit.

REFUGEES

At the time the most serious problem facing the Turkish authorities is the disposal of the refugee families who have fled from the theatre of operations. These unfortunate people are being transported across the Bosphorus in thousands and dumped down in huge camps, but many of them have lost their clothes and all their possessions, and their state is pitiable. Lady Lowther has a fund for their assistance, and now that the severe weather has started, clothes and money are most urgently needed for these unhappy sufferers from the war. Thousands of the women have not only lost their goods but husbands and sons as well, and any gift one can make in mitigation of their suffering will be all the more welcome because it is from the Iugilesa.—The Near East.

Bulgarian Outrages in Macedonia.

THE Salonica correspondent of the Kölnische Zeitung gives the following details of atrocities stated to have been committed in Macedonia by various Bulgarian bands. In the districts of Kratovo and Kotelchana the bands at work were those of Kumanovo, Spiro Dikov, of Uskub, Alexandroff, of Ishtip, Tcheinopoleff, and others. In nine villages in the Kratovo district 182 Christian and 200 Moslem houses were burned down, the village of Gradets, with 500 dwelling and other houses, was first destroyed by artillery, and then the entire Moslem population, including children, was massacred. The same fate befell the villages of Pishitas, Podluk, and Doloni, near Ishtip and Ishtibani. In five Christian, five Moslem, and one mixed village in the district of Kotohana 188 Christian and 595 Moslem houses were burned down, and 48 Christian and 264 Moslem houses were burned down in 40 villages in the district of Ishtip. In the Kumanovo district 44 Christian and 302 Moslem houses were burned down. The destruction was in all cases accompanied or followed by the plundering and slaughter of the population, and by outrages on women, in which the local Christian population took no active part. The Kumanovo mosque was blown up, and 31 Albanian villages in the neighbourhood were razed to the ground.

The Serbian march on Koprulu was preceded by an invasion of their bands, which plundered and massacred the population. In the district of Kafadar, which numbered 98 villages, 91 were almost completely destroyed, and all the Turkish landowners who had not fled, including those who had made an agreement with the Bulgarian bands, were massacred by the Serbian bands. The same fate befell the Moslems of Drenovo, and on the road to Palekura fresh graves were observed with the heads of Turks sticking out, these having been buried in the ground up to the neck.

The district between the Struma and the Mesta (or Kara Sa) was the scene of exploits of the Bulgarian bands of Dedo Doncheff, Tane Nikoloff, Karomphiloff, and Mikhailoff, which massacred one-half of the entire Pomak (Moslem Bulgar) population. Many of the latter were also forced to embrace Christianity. Demir Hisar was completely plundered. At Shugovo the entire Moslem population was massacred, at Vetrin 20, at Meshell all, and in the mosque of Metchnishti 25 Moslems were killed. At Seres (presumably by order of Sandausky) all the Greek and Bulgarian prisoners were released; they went to the village of Ornelu, consisting of 200 houses, and plundered and killed the entire Moslem population. In Visoka, consisting of 400 houses, about 500 Moslems, including boys of 13, were massacred by Dumbalokoff's band, and the women were outraged. Dumbalokoff and his associates appeared afterwards with their plunder at Salonica and made purchases in the finest shops.

At Kilish a Turkish doctor consented to embrace Christianity. He was baptised, named Nicholas, and then killed, while his wife was carried off by a Bulgarian officer. At Kurkutovo all Moslems, men, women and children, were killed, only 20 young girls were spared in order that they might be baptised. As they refused to comply with this order, they, too, were killed. At Eshekue all the 60 houses were plundered and burned down. The males were killed, and 19 young girls were outraged, thrown into a grave alive, then covered with sand. Tane Nikoloff was arrested for this outrage, but afterwards released. At Hogdonitza 60 Moslems were shut up in a mosque and massacred. Near Monastir most of the outrages were committed by Tchakalaroff's band. Round Krupishta all the Moslem villages and their male population have been destroyed. In the Moglena district not a village was left standing. At Petrovo, near Demir Hisar, a woman could no longer witness the spectacle of her daughter being outraged by the soldiers. She seized a gun and fired at the Bulgars. A general massacre ensued, all women and girls being shut up in a house and burned.

All these atrocities, the correspondent adds, have been the subject of long consular reports, and he gives credit to the Greeks for having been more humane than the others—The Manchester Guardian.

French Interests in Syria.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, Jan. 23.

M. CAMILLE FIDEL, Secretary General of the Société des Etudes Coloniales et Maritimes, writes to me with regard to my despatch under the above heading in The Times of January 23, and says that the aspirations which on the authority of the Journal des Débats I attributed to Mgr. Zouin, were not expressed by that "Maronite prelate" at the meeting held on the 16th inst. under the auspices of the Société des Etudes Coloniales et Maritimes, but were embodied in a motion passed by the council of that society on November 30. M. Fidel sends me the text of his council's motion, which is as follows:—

"The council of the Société des Etudes Coloniales et Maritimes, considering that it is desirable that the principle of the territorial disinterestedness of the Great Powers should be affirmed as regards Turkey in Asia, in conformity with the recent declarations of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of France and Great Britain, and considering that certain Egyptian ambitions which have Syria for their object might become a menace to the territorial integrity of Turkey in Asia and to the special rights acknowledged as appertaining to France by the Treaty of Berlin, protests against these ambitions and expresses its confidence in the Government's care for the defence of our influence and of the interests which that influence has enabled to be created; and expresses the wish that, in the undesirable eventuality of Syria's ceasing to be a part of the Ottoman Empire, the French Government shall affirm its fixed determination not to permit any sovereignty or protectorate other than those of France to be substituted in that province for the Ottoman sovereignty. As a subsidiary wish, the council desires that a French naval force should permanently be maintained at Beirut so long as the political situation does not seem to be sufficiently settled to secure the safety of our nationals and the maintenance of our influence."

M. Fidel further challenges the accuracy of information which reached me to the effect that some of the Syrians present at the meeting of January 15 protested in the strongest terms against the hypothetical speculations of the lecturer and declared the determination of their countrymen to allow themselves in no circumstances to come under the authority of any European Power. M. Fidel writes:—

"It is possible that certain persons who were present did not absolutely share all the views which were expressed by the speakers, but what I can affirm without fear of contradiction is that, Vice-Admiral Besson having asked if anyone had any remarks to make, a single Syrian asked leave to address the meeting, and expressed himself in the same sense as the speakers. For the rest the almost unanimous applause with which the speeches were received clearly showed that the speakers had correctly interpreted the opinions of the audience."

The Turco-Greek Naval Engagement.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—As I happen to be one of the few privileged persons who witnessed the naval engagement off Tenedos between the Greeks and Turks, which took place on the 18th inst., it might interest your readers to hear the details.

On the 14th inst., the Greek New Year's Day, the Hamudiye, Medidiye, and four Turkish torpedo-boats left the Dardanelles for the Aegean. These ships, however, went as far as Sedul-Bahr, at the entrance to these Straits, and remained there till the evening. After the sun had set, the Medidiye, accompanied by the four torpedo-boats, returned to the Dardanelles, but the Hamudiye, captained by Raouf Bey, who is one of the most intrepid sailors of the Turkish fleet, a regular "Deli Hasan" (mad squib) in fact, did not put in an appearance, and the Greeks here at once jumped to the conclusion that the Hamudiye had been captured by their fleet. Others declared that Raouf Bey had gone against the orders of the admiral, and, out of spite, had gone to meet the Greek fleet and surrender his ship. Other versions were that the Hamudiye was anchored at Kavaulik Liman, a point above Koum Kalé, or had been sent to Constantinople overnight with an object. All these surmises were destined to prove without foundation, for it appears that the much-talked-of Hamudiye left Koum Kalé very early the next morning, when it was still quite dark, and made a dash across to Syria. Raouf Bey succeeded in evading the Greek fleet, whose crews were evidently still singing "Aghion Bassilia" (the song usually sung on New Year's Eve), and went direct to Syria, where he called upon the transport Macedonia which had been converted into a cruiser, to surrender. The captain of the Macedonia refused, and Raouf Bey sank her in the port. Shortly after the Hamudiye disappeared in the distance like a bad dream.

To come back to the Dardanelles, the Turkish fleet received a wireless message from the Hamudiye giving details of what she had done at Syria, and thinking that the Azeroff, the best ship in the Greek navy, would be sent after her, decided to make a sortie and attack the remaining units of the Greek fleet, with every chance of finishing them off.

On Saturday, therefore, the 18th inst., the whole of the Turkish fleet made for the Aegean, and with it your humble servant departed for a village on the coast called Renkeny, which perched on the top of high hills, from the summits of which one can have a very good view as far as Tenedos, Imbros, and, on clear days, Samothrace and Lemnos. The weather was perfect, and on arriving at my destination I was informed that the Turkish fleet had made a bee-line for Lemnos, but was long since out of sight. I scanned the horizon with my telescope, but nothing could be seen, so I decided to wait. It was then 11-15 A.M. At 11-50 A.M. I suddenly heard a tremendous cannonade, coming, as I thought, from the direction of Lemnos. My glass was up in a second, but I could see nothing. The cannon kept on thundering in the distance for over half an hour, and the vibration and reverberation seemed to reach my very bones. As I was pondering over the fate of the poor Turks, someone shouted "Look at that little cloud of smoke south-west of Tenedos." I looked, and presently saw several columns of water rising in the distance, but not a ship could I distinguish.

Bit by bit the Turkish fleet backed towards Sedul-Bahr, passing outside Tenedos, and I could then plainly discern the four big Turkish battleships lined up before their smaller vessels and fighting like fury with (to me) an invisible foe. Shells were falling round them, but there were no signs of the enemy for some time. As I looked the Barbarossa or Torgut Reis—which of the two I could not tell, as they are sister ships—was suddenly lost to sight in a cloud of smoke, which seemed to envelop her from stem to stern for over twenty minutes, and I naturally thought she was sinking. To my surprise, however, the smoke cleared off, and her guns were once more brought into action. Shortly after the Azeroff, which was hidden behind Tenedos with seven other Greek ships, was seen to emerge and steam at top speed across the bows of the four Turkish battleships in a bee-line for Imbros. Her object was apparently to steam past the foremost of the Turkish ships and then turn her flank, thus cutting off the retreat of the latter. The Turkish admiral was no fool, however, and ordered his four ships to run parallel to the Azeroff in single file and follow one another in whatever direction the Azeroff went.

That was the finest part of the battle, and the Turks simply went for their enemy tooth and nail. They, of course, understood that if the Azeroff succeeded in turning their flank they were done for, as the seven Greek ships which had remained behind the Azeroff would then come up and place them between two fires. It was a race between the Azeroff, which had started some distance behind the Barbarossa, the last of the Turkish ships, and the Mehmediyeh which was the foremost of the line.

The Azeroff gained rapidly on her opponents, and it seemed to me as if she was going to succeed. The admiral of the Turkish fleet, however, had a card up his sleeve, which he used to the best advantage. The order was given by him to the small ships of the Turkish fleet, accompanied by the four destroyers, which are said to travel over twenty-four knots, to move forward, and thus place the Azeroff between them and the four Turkish battleships which were slowly moving towards them. The Azeroff, seeing the splendid move of the Turkish admiral, was afraid to get between the fast destroyers and the battleships, and turned round sharply, running again across the latter, which now had their sterns turned towards her, and were firing shell after shell at their enemy. The Azeroff passed the Mehmediyeh, then the Mesudiyeh, then the Torgut Reis, and stopped before Barbarossa, now tackled exclusively. The Barbarossa, as previously stated, which she was bringing up the rear, and was evidently hard hit, for she travelled very slowly, and at one time her sister ship had to turn back and assist her in the fight. For two whole hours the duel between the Azeroff on the one hand, and the Barbarossa and Torgut Reis, on the other, lasted, but it is clear from start to finish that the Turkish ships were no match for the Azeroff, whose accurate fire played havoc with her opponents. The whole battle lasted three hours and ten minutes, after which the Turks, much battered and torn, retreated slowly but in excellent order towards the entrance to the Dardanelles. It was undoubtedly a victory for the Greeks, but the Turks behaved like men all through, and it is more than wonderful how they managed to come out of it without losing one ship. They fought to the bitter end, and stood their ground surprisingly well, returning here, I am told, with but two shells each, which they had kept in order to cover the retreat of their smaller ships.

The Turks fired the last shots as the Azeroff proudly went to join the other Greek ships between Tenedos and the Rabbit Islands.

GODFREY WHITALL.

The British Red Crescent Society.

We have received the following communication from the President of the Society:—

2, Cadogan Place, S. W., London, Jan. 29.

The President to the British Red Crescent Society begs to enclose herein copies of letters received from Sister Wheatley, one of the Society's nurses who, with two other members of the staff, is administering relief in the Broussa district.

Her account of the terrible distress among the refugees who have been driven from their homes by the Balkan invaders and are now in the utmost destitution will, he believes, appeal to all in the British Empire who have pity in their hearts for human suffering. The distress and destitution are so widespread that the funds at the disposal of the Society are wholly inadequate to cope with the demands of the situation. He, therefore, ventures again to appeal to the charity of both England and India to come to the Society's assistance. Funds are needed not only for supplying the immediate wants of the refugees, such as clothing, charcoal and food, but for housing them in the bitter winter months and starting them for a fresh existence in their new homes.

The number of the destitute amounts to nearly 200,000 souls in Asia Minor. From this the public will conceive the amount of help needed.

The Society will be grateful for any contribution that may be sent to help it in the prosecution of the work of mercy in which it is engaged.

The President begs to report, for the information of the public, that the Society has contributed so far: £1,800 for the relief in Salonica, £550 for Monastir, and £5,000 for the districts in Asia Minor where the refugees are congregated.

Colonel Surtees, the Director of the Society, has visited all the places and established local committees for the supervision of the relief work in conjunction with the British Vice-Consul, wherever such official is available, or the governor of the district. A Central Committee has been organised in Constantinople to work in conjunction with the Society in London. This Committee is composed of distinguished Turkish notables, viz., Damad Ferid Pasha as President, Nasir Sherif Pasha (Senator), Ferid Pasha (late Grand Vizier), General Vincombe Pasha, Sir Edwin Pears and Mr. Holmes as Secretary.

At Broussa the officials of the Society are assisted by Mr. Gilbertson, Vice-Consul, and Miss Gilbertson. At Konia by Mr. Dodds, an American Missionary to whom the Society is most grateful for assistance rendered.

The President takes the opportunity of conveying the Society's gratitude to His Majesty's Consul-General at Salonica and to Sister Augustine for their self-sacrificing devotion for the relief of the refugees.

Contributions may be forwarded either to the Bankers of the Society, Messrs. Coutts and Co., 440, Strand, London, W. O., or to the Honorary Treasurer, A. S. M. Anik, 2 Peachurch Avenue, E. C.

The Balkan Crisis.

A POLITICAL MASKED BALL.

Europe is still in the throes of the Near-Eastern crisis. Like the mirage on the wilderness, the cherished vision of a settlement is suspended between earth and heaven. Even optimists are growing sceptical of its reality, especially since the fall of the Kianul Cabinet. For few of the momentous problems which divided the Powers have received a solution, and not one of these solutions can boast of finality. All that has as yet been done is to hollow out on the sand of the beach some contours of the new Balkans. The resulting figures may be used as a mould for the molten metal or be washed away by the tide of war.

Into the complicated situation as it is to-day the most sagacious statesman strives in vain to gain adequate insight. Data are lacking for a probable forecast even of the near future. Indeed, a clear picture of what has happened during the last couple of months has not yet been drawn by anyone. And for a good reason: through the prevailing confusion it is hardly possible to discern what the various dramatis personae really feel and think and aim at. They resemble fancifully dressed figures at a masked ball. What seems, is not, and what is, wears a disguise. Motives are embellished by euphemisms, words hide thoughts, and feints dissemble aims. The fibres of certain great nations are closely intertwined with roots of little nationalities engendering results which—as the causes remain invisible—baffle or bewilder the observer.

All that can be said with certainty is that the issues still to be decided are momentous, that the nascent forces seem potent for good, and that their movement will ultimately culminate in a series of far-reaching changes deserving the name of revolution. I should add, however, that the Peace Treaty of 1913 will not abolish the Near Eastern question without leaving an undesirable residue. If I had to sum up the salient features of the present crisis in a single formula, I should say they are the result of the rapid crumbling of a political system which has for ages been firmly rooted in the thinking and feeling of Europe, and of the rivalry between the nations most deeply affected thereby which are decorously striving to sway the new synthesis, each one in the direction of its own particular interests.

Probably never before has Europe cut such a ridiculous figure as to-day. Intent on leaving the Balkans permanently peaceful and independent in political self-completion, she is toying with expedients and multiplying makelasts. She is fighting shadows and hitting herself. Aware that if only she has a genuine desire to keep the peace, it cannot possibly be broken—she conceives that desire, yet continues to fear the outbreak of war at every hand's turn. In other words, she wills peace but disbelieves the reality of her volition. It is quite certain that each one of the Powers would readily consent to a heavy sacrifice rather than drift into war, yet each one irrationally suspects the other of designs which cannot be realised without the shedding of blood. These baleful misgivings are visible in the demeanour of the Great Nations, in the barracks and at the Council Board. In Austria-Hungary and Russia the number of troops ready to respond to the war clarion exceeds considerably the normal peace contingent. Each Government is, of course, ready to explain this increase in a harmless way, but all the world is alive to the fact that its real motives are hidden out of sight. Austria-Hungary points to the occupation of Albania by Serbia as a sufficient justification, and lets it be understood that as soon as those troops have evacuated the territory, and she and Serbia have settled their differences, she will entertain the idea of disbanding her own extra soldiers.* And, in turn, she complains that Russia's army has been augmented by some 350,000 men, certain classes of the reserves having been kept under arms instead of being sent to their homes. The Russians retort that they were moved to take this step by Austria's partial mobilisation, and that they will retrace it as soon as the cause has ceased to be operative.

THE NERVOUS ABILITY OF SERBIAN POLITICIANS.

The Serbs, on the other hand, whose civil administration is taking root in Durazzo and other parts of Albania, defend their policy by arguments which undoubtedly prove their right to pursue it, but leave out of sight other equally forcible arguments which demonstrate the folly of exercising that right. "Why," for instance, it is asked, "should Serbia, who is at war with Turkey, be forbidden to occupy the territory of her enemy which she has conquered?" Why, indeed? Albania was part of the Ottoman Empire when the campaign began, and will continue to form part of that Empire until peace is formally concluded. In terms of international law those propositions are unanswerable. In occupying Albania, Serbia is well within her rights. But none the less she is playing a dangerous game, as her best friends have told her. If every individual nation stood upon its rights without abating a jot in favour of its neighbours, war and not peace would be the normal state of mankind. Serbia, however, has gone far beyond her rights if it be a fact—and there is strong evidence in support of the allegation—that she has introduced a civic Serbian administration there, established it on a footing of permanency, and allowed it to be understood that it has come to stay. It was equally impolitic to coax or compel simple-minded Albanians to sign petitions to the Powers asking them to allow their districts to be annexed to Serbia. Sometimes two or three such petitions, purporting to have originated spontaneously in places far distant from each other, are worded exactly the same way. This mode of procedure, deprecated by Serbia's real friends, enables one to understand the irritation of Austrian politicians, the increase of the Austrian army, and the insurgence of a fresh danger to European peace.

Serbian statesmen enjoy a reputation for cleverness, but they seem to labour under one grave defect which I feel tempted to call nervous ability.

But one cannot desire a truer measure of the actual condition of Europe than the work done and the work vainly attempted by the two bodies of European statesmen now in London—the Ambassadors' Meeting and the Peace Conference. The task of the latter is to conclude a Peace Treaty, while that of the former is to liquidate the Balkan war without provoking a European conflict. If we ask what results have been attained by these two assemblies, we learn that the Conference has made no progress, and has with difficulty been kept from landing the Balkans into war again. The Peace Delegates of the Allies, swayed by Dr. Daneff, who, in turn was moved by his Government, were twice on the point of taking precipitate action which would have provoked another campaign against Turkey, when they were laboriously reined back by the Ambassadors. On the other hand, the meeting of the Ambassadors has settled in principle two delicate questions turning on Albania and Serbia, but has temporarily laid aside all other issues of importance, because argument about them seemed hopeless.

ADRIANOPLE THE CRUX OF THE NEGOTIATIONS.

As I noted in a former article, it was obvious from the first that the crux of the peace negotiations would be the fierce struggle for Adrianople which began during the pourparlers at Tchataldja, and that upon this rock the efforts to come to an accord might be wrecked. And in effect on two occasions they were within an ace of being wrecked in consequence of the intemperate ambition or the maladroitness of Bulgaria. To have averted that catastrophe is one of the Ambassadors' main titles to recognition.

The grounds on which Turkey and Bulgaria claim Adrianople, each one for itself, are in the last analysis sentimental, and therefore beyond the reach of argument. To the Osmanli, this place is not merely the strategical key to Constantinople. It is, above all else, the sacred city round which cluster the most glorious memories of their gallant race.

Bulgaria's mainspring of action is likewise sentimental; with her it is a matter of amour-propre. She will not forego the fairest fruit of an undisputed victory, purchased at enormous cost in men and money. To waive her claim to Adrianople would be a humiliation, and a rising nation qualifying for the hegemony of the Balkans cannot submit to be humbled in the eyes of the world. To assert, as some Bulgars have done, that Adrianople is necessary as a safeguard against the onslaught of the Turks, is fantastic. Turkey is a peace factor in Europe to-day, not the redoubtable marplot she once was. Her rôle of invader is past. She eschews territorial aggrandisement. As a neighbour she is lamb-like, as a friend she would be helpful owing to the vast undeveloped resources of which she disposes, and as an ally she may yet become an important factor in the history of the Near East. Furthermore, it would always be possible to stipulate that the fortresses, if she held them, should be razed, and Adrianople rendered useless for defence as for attack. But the crucial point is not there. Bulgaria stands on her dignity and is resolved to stamp the mark of her dignity on all the transactions by which the war is being liquidated. If the Gueshoff Cabinet argued a treaty abandoning Adrianople to Turkey it could not face the Sobranje and live. Neither would peace in the Balkans be worth more than five years' purchase.

BULGARIA'S ORIGINAL MISTAKE AND JEALOUSY.

Under these conditions one is astonished at the short-sightedness of the Bulgarians, who at the time when Turkey was suing for peace, might have required the surrender of Adrianople as a condition of the armistice, but failed to insist. That, I venture to think, was a capital error, fertile in untoward consequences. It was M. Daneff, President of the Bulgarian Sobranje, who carried on those negotiations with the Turks at Tchataldja in the name of the League. Before tackling the business in hand he consulted his colleagues and learned that the Greeks insisted on the surrender of the three beleaguered towns as a condition sine qua non. M. Venizelos, the spokesman of the Hellenes, pointed out that the enemy was thoroughly demoralised, was suing for peace, and had undertaken in advance to assent to any concessions that might be demanded, and he urged that the Allies should present a united front and hold out for possession of the three towns.

"Let us demand," he said, "the cession of Janina, Adrianople, and Scutari." "We can get that now if only we insist on it. Unless we do this and make the surrender of the cities a condition on the acceptance of which depends the armistice, we may have to suffer enormously in the future. For it is probable the Turks will shortly recover their cold bloodedness and self-reliance, and will refuse to deliver up the strong places. What shall we do then? That is a danger that should not be lightly incurred. It will engender others and cost us time and money, and perhaps men as well. For so long as the fortified places hold out, the Porte will not, cannot, order their surrender."

On this point the Bulgarians, as the bones of the Cradition, dissented from the Greeks. They were not in a condition to hold out just then. Rumours of these differences reaching me, I suggested that what the Allies ought to aim at was not an armistice at all, but peace preliminaries. That, I explained, would supply a solid groundwork for the subsequent negotiations, would ensure a rough and ready settlement of essentials, and would enable the belligerents to conclude a treaty within two or three weeks after the termination of hostilities. Moreover, it would require no more time to bring about than would an armistice.

That was also the judgment of M. Venizelos, who pressed the point vigorously, but the Bulgarian statesmen, prompted by the resourceful King Ferdinand, demurred. He was in a hurry to conclude an armistice, averse to waiting until the Turks should give way on the subject of the beleaguered cities, and resolved not to be beholden to the Allies even for the slightest military success. That determination was the source of the present deadlock. As Goethe put it: "If you miss the first bullet-hole you will not succeed in buttoning your coat."

The Bulgarian army, weakened by its treacherous losses and jaded by forced marches and continued hardships, could not force the Turkish lines at Tchataldja. And on that account the Bulgarians were almost as eager for a rest as were the Turks, and were therefore unwilling to jeopardise the armistice by insisting on hard terms. Aware of this, the Greek and Serbian Premiers offered them the assistance of their respective troops, of whom over a hundred thousand could set out at once. These reinforcements would turn the scale and compel the enemy to consent to the surrender of the besieged cities. A land march on Gallipoli, followed by the capture of its heights, which dominate the hills of the opposite shore of the Dardanelles, would enable the Allies to keep open the Straits for the passage of the Hellenic fleet. And it might be taken for granted that before the Greek warships could anchor opposite Stamboul, the Porte would have assented to the Allies' terms, and a lasting peace would have been secured. But the Bulgarians, whose passionate desire for military glory unalloyed by foreign participation is intelligible, declined the offer. They did not, however, frankly refuse it; they simply left it without any response. That was the second time in the course of the campaign that the proposal was made to them by their Allies, and each time it was simply ignored. They were resolved to win all achievements in the field by their own unaided efforts, or else rely upon diplomacy to eke them out. The Bulgarian army would wrest what the nation needed from the Ottoman grasp. And as for Constantinople, it must either be taken by the artillery and infantry of the little Tsardom or not at all. In no case should Greece be permitted to capture it. In accordance with these principles Bulgaria turned a deaf ear to the proffered aid. Thereupon the Greeks refused to sign the armistice, and have continued to wage war ever since.

THE LATEST TURKISH REVOLUTION.

It was considerations of the same patriotic but somewhat narrow character that determined the quality of Bulgaria's statecraft throughout the negotiations and led to the deadlock, which has now been followed by the latest Revolution. The Kiamil Cabinet has been overthrown, and the Committee men under Mahmoud Shekret Pasha brought in. The new Ministers are, of course, as patriotic as their predecessors, but their policy is different. They are in favour, it is said, of fighting for Adrianople to the bitter end. If so, they are about to risk the very existence of the Ottoman Empire on a single throw of the dice. The only hope left is that once they have seized the reins of power, which was their main object, they may remain satisfied with that. Moreover, they may, on coming into office and assuming responsibility, find that it was Fate which uttered its immutable decree through the Grand Council which put the hopes of Turkey in the hands of the Powers. For although their army be excellent, the war-nerve, money, is absent. And without that no war is possible. One expedient may perhaps occur to them, to confiscate the sums belonging to the public debt. One hopes they will never humiliate their fatherland by shameless spoliation. And yet, that act of madness might perhaps save the Empire. For Europe would then be obliged to control the financial administration of Turkey, with admirable results. In a quarter of a century the population of Turkey would doubtless be one of the most prosperous in Europe. At present January 24th one is reduced to vague surmises respecting the future. The Powers and the Balkan States must await the reply to the Collective Note of the Powers, which will have to be despatched by the Government.

THE GREAT POWERS UPHOLD BULGARIA'S CLAIM

But to return to what went before. For the Powers, once sittings of the Peace Conference were "suspended," it was no easy matter to decide what to do. To mediate between the belligerents was not feasible, seeing that neither side was ready to abide by an adverse ruling. On the other hand, coercion was out of the question because neutral States cannot take sides. Moral pressure might, of course, be put upon one or other of the belligerents, but even that could with difficulty be reconciled with the spirit of neutrality, and in any case it might well prove ineffectual. A naval demonstration was advocated by many who seemed to think that if the end is good—as the maintenance of peace undoubtedly is—the means do not matter one jot. But respect for international law is at such a low ebb to-day that Europe will not willingly descend still further. A naval demonstration would have no real effects. Not only would it constitute a breach of neutrality, but it would also create a precedent for intervention. If Greece and Bulgaria were to quarrel later on about Salonica and hostilities between them were imminent, the Powers would be expected to intervene, whereas it is of the highest importance that Europe should henceforward leave Balkan disputes to be fought out by Balkan peoples. That is the logical and desirable conclusion of the present crisis.

The Powers decided to advise Turkey to allow Bulgaria to include the city of Adrianople within her frontiers. If this had not been done, and if peace had been concluded within two or three weeks of the armistice, Turkey might possibly have retained the holy city. The motives for this advice lie near the surface. To be satisfactory, the settlement of outstanding questions and the establishment of frontiers must be permanent. It would be bad policy to resort to short-lived expedients. To leave Adrianople under the sway of the Sultan would be a temporary makeshift; the Bulgarians would plot and plan incessantly until they annexed it. And this striving would keep the Balkan Peninsula in a state of ruinous unrest. Furthermore, there is this to be said. Adrianople is in a state of siege, and although the defenders are heroes, they are not workers of miracles. Consequently the town must fall, sooner or later, and as soon as it falls it ceases for ever to be Turkish. To vindicate it for the Sultan, therefore, would be lost time unless Europe were prepared to wage war against the Allies. That is why the Powers were desirous of seeing the Porte approach the question in a spirit of compromise. But as mere counsel volunteered to the Porte has little or no effect, the question waxed urgent, in what form should pressure be brought to bear on the Ottoman Cabinet.

STORY OF THE COLLECTIVE NOTE.

A Collective Note of admonition and advice was ultimately hit upon as the least objectionable way of influencing the Ottoman people. Imagining that the Ambassadors in the Turkish capital, who can feel the pulse of the nation and are familiar with the temper of Ottoman statesmen, would be best qualified to word such a communication, the Powers charged them with the task. These gentlemen accordingly drew up a document which was to bring before the minds of Ottoman Ministers with clearness and force the advisability, in the interests of their fatherland, of making a merit of necessity, sacrificing Adrianople to Bulgaria, and yielding up the islands to the Powers, who would dispose of them as they list. Now, it sometimes happens that precisely the people who are nearest to the stage miss certain effects which only distance enables the observer to appreciate. And something analogous occurred in this case. The Note drafted by the Ambassadors in Constantinople was submitted to the Ambassadors in London, who, looking at the elements of the problem in more correct perspective, found fault with certain redundancies of style in it, and took exception to certain things which had better be left unsaid. And with these critical remarks the draft was sent back to the Powers.

Soon after this the Governments set aside the amended draft Note and requested the Ambassadors' Meeting in London to indite a new one. The work was begun at once, and from that moment onward proceedings moved with extreme rapidity until some delay was occasioned by a certain legitimate objection raised by Germany to two phrases. The Collective Note in its unamended form was written and its wording approved unanimously. This document was despatched on Friday, the 10th, to the Cabinets for approval. Through this stage too the Note passed without delay. All the Foreign Offices endorsed it, Germany alone suggesting the verbal alteration alluded to. The modification called for was slight, turning upon two words only, and was admitted by all to be quite reasonable. In making this formal change, however, there was no time lost in the English capital, and the amended document was telegraphed back to the Government on the 13th. So far everything is clear. Thenceforward, however, our view is obstructed by fog. The Note which would, it was thought, be delivered on Wednesday, was not communicated to the Porte until Saturday. Why? Nobody appears able to answer this question.

Among the many conjectures yet published I have not seen any based on a supposition which commends itself to me as probable, viz., the temporary confusion in which things in the Wilhelmstrasse were doubtless thrown by the death of Kiderling-Waechter and the appointment of his successor. Her von Jagow had not yet had time to familiarise himself with the current business of his department, and it is on the cards that the delay of which the Balkan Allies bitterly complain may stand in causal nexus with that. Anyhow, the hypothesis is possible. Short impossible is the assumption that Germany is endeavouring to undo with one hand what she has done with the other hand. There can be no doubt that she is to the full as zealous in her efforts to safeguard peace as is France or Russia. Her hand and spirit may be traced distinctly in every part of the strenuous endeavour put forth by Europe to keep the Balkan conflagration from spreading. Setting her acts thus full against the light, one must perceive the absurdity of the accusations of double-dealing which have been wildly hurled against her Government. At last the historic document was read and presented to the Porte.

HISTORY OF THE LITTLE COLLECTIVE NOTE OF THE ALLIES. FATE OF ADRIANOPLE.

In the Collective Note the Powers advise the Porte to reconcile itself to the loss of the city of Adrianople, which must in any case pass to Bulgarian in virtue of the fortune of war. They also ask Turkey to allow the future of the Aegean Islands to be determined by the Powers, which will endeavour in return to safeguard Mussulman interests in Adrianople and will undertake that the solution given to the problem of the islands shall exclude all menace to the security of Turkey. On the other hand, the Governments of these States hold out a prospect of moral and material support to the Sublime Porte in the work of repairing the evils of war and developing the resources of the Ottoman Empire in Asia.

On January 22nd the news came that the Grand Council at Stamboul approved Kiamil's policy, and confided Turkey's destinies to the Powers. And that was a reasonable decision. Unfortunately, we now learn that a revolution has swept away the Kiamil Cabinet and pitchforked the Committee men into its place. What will happen next is mere matter of conjecture. As yet the reply has not been drafted, and it would be unwise to speculate upon the gist of it. All that one usefully can say is that Adrianople, the strategical key to the Turkish capital, is certain to become a Bulgarian town. Whether, as the Greeks hope, this acquisition will move the Bulgarians to cede Salonica to King George, is doubtful. Speaking personally for myself, I fancy it will not. As for the Aegean Islands, nobody, not even the Prime Ministers, can say what will become of them. Some are occupied by Greece, others would also have been seized by that State if they were not held by Italy, who is bound to deliver them up to Turkey as soon as Tripoli is evacuated. Turkey, therefore, in abandoning them to the Powers might choose to favour, even though it gave to Greece those "reserved" islands which, like Chios, are regarded, and have ever been treated, as strategically forming part of the coast of Asia Minor.

Before the Powers had drafted their Note, the Peace Delegates, or rather Dr. Daneff, who sometimes passes as their leader, put on record their judgment that a Collective Note by itself would not take effect on the Turks. This was done in a conversation which was carried on between this statesman and Sir Edward Grey at the Foreign Office, when the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was exhorting the Delegates of the Allies to meet the Turks in Conference once more and to discuss other proposals of Reshid Pasha's. Dr. Daneff volunteered the opinion that a Collective Note from the Powers would prove inefficient unless it were followed up with some more convincing proof of Europe's single mindedness and resolve to accomplish its object in spite of obstacles. Then the Bulgarian Delegate alluded to the naval demonstration which was being talked about, and expressed his belief that that might be a sufficient sanction. This was the opinion and denu prevalent in Sofia, whence the Bulgarian Delegation draws its inspiration. Europe was to be harnessed to the Balkan State chariot, and to draw that to the places in which the Allies desire to hoist their respective flags. The Great Powers therefore may violate their neutrality when it is a question of helping the Balkan realm to expand or consolidate, but they would be committing the inexpiable sin were they to meddle in the internal affairs of those nations. That is the ruling idea. Now the aim of the Greek Powers is divergent from this. They are eager to leave Balkan interests entirely to the Balkan States, and to let these settle their own disputes peacefully or otherwise as they may deem fit.

THE BULGARS AGAIN ENDEAVOUR TO EFFECT A RUPTURE.

The Bulgarians are an obstinate race who owe more to dogged perseverance than to dash or enterprise. And the statesmen in Sofia, learning that those schemes of theirs were not adopted by the Powers, resolved to substitute others tending to the same goal. And again M. Daneff was charged with their realisation. On Sunday, January 12th, a communication was made by the Bulgarian to the Greek Delegation, the principal members of which were then at Oxford. On the following day, Mr. Madjaroff called on the Greek Minister, M. Gennadius, and, in an off hand manner, informed him that the Sofia Cabinet had instructed M. Daneff to break off negotiations and to despatch a joint Note from the Allies to the Porte advising it of the fact. That was all. There was no explanation, no further data, nothing but a request that the announcement be made to M. Venizelos.

That communication, which was practically an order to the Delegates to allow the Sofia Cabinet to take fateful steps in their name, did not elicit a favourable response from the Greeks. They perceived no conclusive grounds for it; they deemed it impolitic to accept, and perhaps thwart, Europe's efforts to persuade the Porte, and they were unwilling to assume responsibility for it. It was finally decided that a meeting of the Allies should be convened at the Hyde Park Hotel. It was well attended. The Bulgarian Delegate, M. Madjaroff, who was in the chair, told the members present that the Bulgarian Government had telegraphic instructions on which it was proposed that action should now be taken. M. Madjaroff, plied by the others with questions as to motives, outlook, and ulterior action, answered vaguely, and alluded to Dr. Daneff, who, however, was absent. It had been arranged that the meeting should not be officially opened until M. Daneff arrived; accordingly, they waited for him long and patiently. At last, however, a message was received over the telephone to the effect that Dr. Daneff was about to have an important interview with a certain Ambassador and would, therefore, be unable to take the chair or appear at the meeting, which was soon afterwards dissolved. The evening papers were then authorised by the Delegates to publish a sensational item of news to the effect that the Allies had resolved to draw up a Collective Note to be presented to Turkey at the same time as the Collective Note of the Powers. Its object being to provide the drastic sanction which would otherwise be lacking, seeing that the naval demonstration would not take place, the Note would declare the peace negotiations a failure, denounce the armistice, and proceed to a renewal of hostilities unless the terms proposed by the Allies were accepted.

WHAT WOULD THEY FIGHT FOR NOW?

Astonished at this exhibition of political unwisdom, I sought out one of the leading Delegates and asked him whether the story was true. He said it was. He and his colleagues, he explained, were tired of waiting. I inquired why they would not wait for the fall of Adrianople, which, according to their own account, was imminent. The answer was evasive. Either the Great Powers, I was told, must intervene or hostilities must recommence. There was no third term. And the action of the Power was described as academic, and would, I was assured, be smiled at by Turkey, who only answers the whip. In order to reinforce that action the Allies would present their own sharp little Note, and if that failed to produce to the desired effect they must have recourse to arms again. In reply to my question what they would fight for, they answered, Adrianople. "But you will get Adrianople in any and every case without striking a blow," I objected. "Well, then, we might win the Midia Rodosto line of frontier." "Never," I answered, "for Europe will not allow Bulgaria to have a toehold on the Marmora seaboard." "Oh, well, we will simply fight to end the war." "But your campaign will put off the termination of hostilities in lieu of hastening it. If you can wait four or five weeks in comfort, why spend the time in shedding human blood to no purpose? If you want to work in that style, you would forfeit the sympathies of every civilised nation on the globe."

Meanwhile, the Ambassador whom M. Daneff was interviewing had read the Bulgarian Delegate a lecture on statecraft, the fitness of things in politics, and the folly of first enlisting the help of Europe and then baffling Europe's effort to give it. On the other hand, the Powers made emphatic representations at Sofia, and the baleful project was dropped. On all sides the Bulgarians were blamed for being over-anxious to leave nothing to chance.

In statecraft, as in love, too much is not enough.

The question of Adrianople is the only one that divides the Turks and the Allies by a bridgeless chasm. If the Powers had not taken sides, and if peace had been concluded within two, or three, or even four weeks after the cessation of hostilities, I believe that Turkey could have retained possession of the "sacred city." But once Europe officially recognised Bulgaria's claim to the sacred city of the Osmanli and peace negotiations were protracted endlessly, all hopes of keeping Adrianople vanished for the Turk.—Dr. Dutton in the Contemporary Review.

DEAR SIRS,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

Persia.

Lord Lamington put a series of questions in the House of Lords with regard to Persia. He suggested that a considerable section of the Persians did not regard M. Mornard with great favour, and recommended the establishment of a Treasury Board consisting of a Russian, a British and a Persian or a neutral representative and the augmentation of the Gendarmery with the co-operation of Indian officers.

Lord Morley paid a tribute to the Swedish officers and also to Captain Eckford, whose murder was a terrible incident in the great and problem in which we were more interested than any one. He emphasised the objections to a punitive expedition, and said we had abstained from such a proceeding with a view to giving the Persian Government the best chance they could have.

The co-operation of Indian officers with the Gendarmery, Lord Morley said, would be most risky, and those best able to judge wanted the Government that friction and jealousy between the British and the Indian officers and the Persian Government would be likely to follow.

With regard to money, Lord Morley said it was proposed to raise another £400,000, half in Russia and half in Britain, and the £150,000 contributed by England for the special use of the Persian Government.

The security for the money, Lord Morley stated, would be found in a loan of four, five or six millions in regard to which negotiations were now proceeding between the Persian Government and the Societe d'Etudes.

The substitution of a Treasury Board for M. Mornard would impair the authority and independence of the Persian Government. The Imperial Government did not doubt M. Mornard's capacity and goodwill. Lord Newton said he could imagine nothing more likely to cause a punitive expedition than the present situation.

Lord Morley's statement regarding the loan to Persia in the House of Lords on the 19th instant was misheard. His lordship said that the amount of £100,000 was for the special use of the Fars Government. Some portion would be used by the Governor-General of Fars, and the rest would be handed over in monthly payments of £8,000 to the commandant of the Gendarmerie.

An engineer named Green and a railway surveyor have been robbed and stripped while en route to Jask from Bushire. They have returned to Bunder Abbas. Dahaloo tribesmen have looted five hundred camels near Bunder Abbas.

The Arnold Case.

The application for leave to appeal has been granted in the Arnold case. The case was heard by Lord Haldane, Lord Robertson, Lord Shaw and Lord Moulton. Counsel for the petitioner were Sir Robert Finlay and Mr. Clarence Hamlyn. The arguments lasted for three and a half hours.

Sir Robert Finlay reviewed the circumstances and said that there was no doubt that Mr. Arnold took a strong view with regard to the proceedings before the magistrate and published articles making charges against Mr. Andrews. He had not only expressed strong opinions to the conduct of the case, but had also made charges of fact; but the defence was that the imputations were made in good faith and were intended for the public good. There was no suggestion that they were animated by personal malice. Mr. Arnold did not know either Mr. Andrews or Captain Finnie. No further investigation had yet been made of the charge against Mr. McCormack. Sir Robert Finlay contended that Sir Charles Fox was wrong in his construction of the law of rape and libel. Sir Charles had emphasised facts bearing against Arnold and had not given sufficient weight to the circumstances in his favour or to the medical evidence that might have been called.

Lord Haldane gave judgment saying that Their Lordships granted special leave to appeal. It seemed that a case had been made out of a denial of natural justice as laid down in the rulings of Privy Council.

Lord Haldane concluded by saying: "We think enough has been said to make it right that there should be further enquiry. You will understand that in saying this we express not the slightest opinion."

Mr. Donne, representing the Crown, said that he quite understood that in the circumstances it was his duty not to address Their Lordships.

TETE À TETE

THE brief letter that we have received from Dr. Ansari with this week's English Mail will, we are sure, be read with deep interest by our readers. The letter was sent from Constantinople on the 11th February and runs as follows.—

"I am afraid my weekly note is impossible this time. I have had to divide the Mission into two units: one remains in Omerli under Dr. Naim, and the other is going under me to an unknown destination with Enver Bey's attacking army. This news ought to immensely please you, as ours is the only Mission out of the seven which had applied which has been given this great honour and distinction of accompanying Enver Bey. The British Red Crescent and the Egyptian Missions were all refused on the score of insufficient equipment. I may also tell you that I have personally gained much favour with the Party of Union and Progress and the Croissant Rouge Ottomane. They consult me in all their affairs connected with Hospital organisation. As regards the Bonds, I have seen the Minister of Finance and have given him the fullest possible details about them. He promised to send the Bank of Bengal and the Alliance Bank of India and your official cables with full details. That is the reason I had not cabled to you myself with a view to economy. Yesterday I saw Talaat Bey, who promised to urge the party not to waste valuable time. He has also promised to send you news free through the Agence Ottomane. I have received the official receipt of the money you sent to the Grand Vizier through me, but as it is not with me just now I will send it next week. I have to buy a lot of things for the Mission. I spent £750 for tents, although the Bombay Mission had very generously given us six tents. I have to buy a lot of drugs and stores. These, by the way, can be had in Constantinople from an English firm at a slightly higher cost than in England, but one can save time and a lot of annoyance by buying here, and one can personally satisfy oneself about the articles. That is the reason why I have requested you to send me £2,000. We have also got to supply provisions for the Mission, which is the most costly item. The Ottoman army has driven the Bulgars all along the line so far. They are near Adrianople now, and the relief of the fortress is expected daily. I will cable all important news. Abdur Rahman will remain in future in Constantinople for keeping the accounts of the Mission and arranging for the food supply. He will in future send you the weekly letter, as I don't think I would be able to do so owing to our march with the advancing army." After learning that a unit of the All India Mission has gone with Enver Bey's attacking column we would all of us be naturally eager to hear from Dr. Ansari about his experiences. He says, however, that he would be unable to send his weekly letter. We are sure the Manager's letters will be equally interesting and will give us full information about the doings of both the units of the Mission. The landing of the expeditionary column of 60 thousands of all arms under the command of Enver Bey was reported by Reuter long ago, and later on the expedition was declared to have failed. We cannot, however, believe that a column of 60 thousands, after effecting a successful landing, would "fail" without fighting a battle and even encountering the enemy. The movements of Enver Bey have for some time past been shrouded in mystery but we are confident soon to hear of him and his column, and that in a way which may not perhaps be a pleasant theme for a "Reuter's Message."

WE PUBLISH elsewhere a most opportune and weighty article of H. H. the Aga Khan on the subject of the Ottoman Treasury Bonds. His Highness deals with the financial aspect of the question, and that to our mind is the most important aspect at the present moment. It divides itself into two parts: firstly, is the investment safe; and, secondly, is it profitable? If both these questions can be answered in the affirmative the opportunity which the issue of these Bonds presents to business men, is too good to be lost. Taking the second question first, the assured return of 5 per cent. per annum as interest, coupled with the assured return at par of the principal itself within 5 years, makes the Ottoman Treasury Bonds a more profitable investment than any we know of in India. It is true that merchants can make more than 5 per cent. on their outlay in commerce and industries; but all such concerns are not all equally safe, and besides, we are not all merchants. The University Fund, for instance, is not invested in Cotton or Jute mills, nor in the shares of Banks which give a 10 to 15 per cent. dividend every year. It is all in Government Paper bearing 3½ per cent. interest or in the safe deposit of the Bank of Bengal, which does not give more than 4 per cent. to the best of our knowledge. Many Mussalmans, and practically all prosperous Native States, hold large quantities of Government Paper bearing interest at 8½ per cent. only. But all this would appeal to merchant princes or Ruling Chiefs more than to the average Mussalman who is willing to accept a lesser rate of interest, if any at all, if he is assured of the safe return of the principal within 5 years. This then is the main question, and on this point H. H. the Aga Khan's contribution to our columns affords the best possible evidence. "Even at this moment of the darkest period in her history, the Turkish 4 per cent. Bonds are quoted at 84 throughout Europe." This, we believe, indicates a better credit than that of Japan, and His Highness is no more than just to Turkey when he writes: "With the fullest sense of responsibility of every word that I am saying I will say that if a poor widow came to me with her orphan child and asked my advice, I would honestly and strongly advise her to put every pie of her small fortune in Turkish Bonds." This is no idle saying, and, as a matter of fact, we could name a widowed relation of His Highness who has invested Rs. 25,000 at his suggestion in these very Bonds. As for himself, he writes that "personally I would not hesitate to get out of every investment that I possess and that does not bring me more than 5 per cent. and buy the 5 per cent. Turkish Bonds." As a matter of fact, His Highness has been better than his word, for we have ourselves cabled at his instructions to his London Bankers to purchase these Bonds for £6,000 or Rs. 90,000. But what of those of us who did not hesitate to protest against his Times of India article? Shall we still continue this purely negative and destructive attitude? Is this a time to preach a futile, and in certain respects mischievous, boycott of all European goods which would not provide powder for a single Krupp gun shot at Bulair and Adrianople, but may easily create a dangerous conflagration in this country? It must be remembered that all that is to be done to assist Turkey must be accomplished within a fortnight. Even half a million may prolong the struggle through March, when the Bulgarians must leave the battlefield and revert to their fields if a famine in Bulgaria is to be prevented. Later than this twenty millions may come too late.

آخر شب دید کی قابل تھی بسل کی ٹپ

We learn from the French Bank at Bombay, as from the Alliance Bank and others who have undertaken to do this business, that people come with five rupees and ten rupees and waste an hour or two each in asking silly questions, after which they stolidly return home—with their lives and tens. This is not the way of doing business. These Banks will not flood the newspapers with advertisements like our friend the Orient Bank, whose agents seem to be doing good business in spite of the Aga Khan's open disclaimer of the patronage of its scheme. But what they can do they have done. The French Bank—one of the most important Banks in Bombay—which goes under the official name of "Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris,"—has even agreed to purchase these Bonds without any commission, and in the last trip of Mr. Mohamed Ali to Bombay it has been arranged to secure the printed receipts of this Bank for Rs. 7-8-0 each for sale to the purchasers of these Bonds, so that money could immediately be remitted by wire to Turkey from day to day, and the receipts of the French Bank may be exchanged with the Bonds when they are received by the Bank. Could not prominent Mussalmans in each town and district send small sums like Rs. 500 or Rs. 1,000 to this Bank at Bombay and buy its receipts for selling them to the people of their towns and districts, and on the sale of these receipts send another like sum for the same purpose? If Turkey could afford to wait indefinitely for Moslem India's response to her appeal we would certainly organise a deputation. But in the first place, why should Indian Mussalmans repudiate their noble brethren's leadership and still wait for their lead? And, in the next place,

تا تریاق از حراتی آید که شود مار گزیده مرده شود

(By the time the antidote is brought from Mesopotamia, the snake-bitten will die.)

WE APPEAL for a careful perusal of H. H. the Aga Khan's article, and we trust that the procedure which we suggest will be followed. Let every Mussalman who can understand English obtain from us all the printed literature on the subject of these Bonds. Let our Urdu and other vernacular contemporaries translate our last two or three notes on the subject and reprint from the Hamdard bulletin the translation of H. H. the Aga Khan's article contributed to the Comrade. After that, let every prominent Moslem arrange to send every day to any of the Banks, that have undertaken to do this business, sums of money which intending purchasers of the Bonds are prepared to send to Turkey in anticipation of the Bonds merely on getting the Bank's receipts. Let him also purchase at his own risk the Bombay French Bank's receipts as substitutes for the Rs 7-8-0 Bonds and sell them to others in his town and district, and renew them with the purchase money thus obtained, so that through a personal investment of Rs. 500 or 1,000 ten or fifteen times the amount invested by him may be remitted to Turkey. In whatever form the investment is made the Banks should be authorised to cable the money daily to Turkey. We are asking the various Banks that have shown their willingness to do this business to sell their own printed receipts, if possible without commission, like the French Bank. In the meantime, we have great pleasure in announcing that the Poona Bank, Limited, and the Bank of Madras have also accepted to do this business on the Alliance Bank's terms. But we would beg our readers not to worry the Banks with unintelligent questions. These Banks exist for their own profit and not for relieving Turkey or teaching would-be investors the A. B. C. of investment. We have often and often enough published the fullest details about these Bonds, and before troubling the Banks, or even increasing our work, they should go through what has already been published and try to understand it. If after that they still wish to know anything more we shall not resent any inquiries. But we would still recommend them to consult a prominent Mussalman in their own town or district, and, if he is unable to satisfy them, he could obtain the necessary information from us. It is possible for one man to do four men's work, but not the work of four hundred or four thousand. At present we have to do at least forty men's work and are required to do at least four hundred thousands'. This is neither fair nor likely to succeed. At the risk of repeating these suggestions a hundredth time, we say once more "Don't delay. Don't talk. Don't ask. Trust Turkey with your hundreds and thousands. Believe in her credit at least as much as Europe does. Rest assured that the money invested in these Bonds is safe, whether Turkey wins or loses. Send money daily to the Banks yourself or through some trustworthy Mussalman in your town or district. Authorise the Banks to send you their receipts and remit the money by wire to Turkey every day. And when the Bonds have come from Turkey, exchange your receipts with the Bonds through the same Banks. But if you cannot do this, don't waste your breath in speech-making and protests. Don't be foolish enough to believe that your boycott will impress the world more than your want of confidence in Turkish credit. And for mercy's sake profane not the name of the Brotherhood of Islam when a little confidence in the credit of a solvent Moslem State can and will save the lives of those that are your brothers, and the honour of those that are your sisters."

What to do?

WE ARE thankful to the Hon. the Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad for the trip he took to Bombay, on the 26th February, in connection with the Muslim University and, particularly, with the Bonds. Mr Mohamed Ali accompanied the Raja Sahab and both stayed at Bombay till the 28th. Practically the whole of the 27th was passed in company with H. H. the Aga Khan, who appeared to think that his Times article had been misunderstood by his co-religionists, as he never advised Turkey to give up Europe without a struggle. He did not, however, seem inclined to withdraw anything that he had written on the subject of Moslem India's appeals to Turkey to fight the good fight, unless he saw more clearly than at present that Moslem India was prepared to assist Turkey with money for the purpose of continuing the fight. In a way we agree with him and would like our readers to know that this is an open challenge thrown to the sincerity of their appeals to the Turks. His Highness sent no such appeals to them, but has responded to their appeal for funds by purchasing nearly a lakh's worth of these Ottoman Bonds. Which of the two is the better plan, we leave it to their good sense and Islamic patriotism to decide. Bombay Mussalmans are forming a local committee, each member of which will individually underwrite or make himself responsible for the sale of Bonds to the extent of a lakh. He could purchase them himself or induce friends and relations to share the purchase with him. A meeting may be held on the 4th instant or a little later in which H. H. the Aga Khan is willing to explain the financial aspect of the question. We regret that His Highness's early return to England and other engagements make it difficult for him to come to Delhi where the Hon. the Raja Sahab and we offered to gather together in the Jam'i Masjid a lakh of Mussalmans from Northern India to whom the details of the Bonds could be explained. We are still pressing him to come and preside at the meeting, but if our appeals fail, we trust the Hon. the Raja Sahab of Mahmudabad will preside and the vast courtyard of the mosque will be filled. Bombay is expected to invest not less than 25 lakhs in the Bonds in spite of the fact that the money market is tight owing to large quantities of opium lying unsold in Calcutta, and even though a return of 5 per cent is small for capitalists of industry. But when will the "dark and true and tender" North respond to the call of duty?

His many friends and admirers must have rejoiced to learn of the release of Mr Channing Arnold, Editor of the Burma Critic, from Rangoon Jail on the 18th February. By the exercise of the Viceregal prerogative he has been restored to freedom before completing the full term of the savage sentence inflicted upon him. While it is gratifying to see that he has emerged from a duration infinitely vile and harsh, we can not disguise our sympathy with his attitude in regard to this act of clemency. He repudiates any suggestion that he deserved mercy, for he is absolutely convinced of his innocence and the purity of the motive that urged him to expose what he believed to be a grievous wrong. And it is solely with a view to wipe off the slur cast on him by the decision of the Special Bench of the Burma Chief Court that an appeal has been made to the Privy Council. We are confident that Mr Arnold will secure a complete vindication of himself in that Tribunal. We can not, however, view it without misgiving that the Executive should occasionally feel itself justified in sitting in judgment on an erring Judiciary. It is absolutely beside the point that such interference may some time be eminently desirable in the interests of public justice. The resolution of the Government of India on the case of the Khan of Hoti will remain a clear reminder of how the Executive may come perilously near to trenching on the judicial independence of the Bench. That the prerogative of the Viceroy has, in the case of Mr. Arnold, been exercised with adequate and just reasons no one, we believe, will be willing to dispute. What is, however, a matter of grave concern to us is that in the administration of justice even by the highest tribunals in this country cases should arise when the ends of justice can alone be served by Executive benevolence. The refusal of the Government Advocate in Rangoon to grant leave to Mr. Arnold's Counsel to appeal to the Full Bench of the Burma Chief Court will ever remain a puzzle to us, especially in view of the recent decision of the Privy Council. One cannot help wondering with Truth that things should be so curiously ordered in Burma that it rested with the Government Advocate, who conducted the prosecution, to say whether the defendant should be permitted to appeal. How much ignorance and prejudice exist in certain quarters in regard to this case will be apparent from the supplementary question with which the irrepressible Sir J. D. Rees recently interposed in the House of Commons. The question began: "Did not Mr. Arnold receive a trial on appeal by a Full Bench of the Chief Court of Burma, and is there any reason for showing any sympathy towards a man whose offence was so grievous and so desperately—" But before the fierce expletive could end the Speaker cut it short. As Truth remarks, the latter part of the question was simply an expression of the Hon. Member's opinion, which is of no importance. The Daily Chronicle, we may remark here, throws a curious sidelight on another aspect of the case of which Mr Arnold was the victim. Referring to the official papers in the Arnold case it says:—"Mr. Channing Arnold was, in October last, sentenced to a year's imprisonment for alleged defamatory statements concerning Mr G. P. Andrew, Deputy Commissioner and Magistrate of the Mergui District, in disposing of an accusation of abduction and rape against Captain H. B. McCormick, a rubber planter. The criminal prosecution ended on October 19, so far as the Chief Court of Burma was concerned, and on October 26 the Lieutenant-Governor sanctioned the payment of Rs. 5,822-8-0 (£888. 3s 4d) being the costs incurred in the prosecution. A good deal of correspondence, which has just come into our possession, ensued. The Accountant-General objected to payment of the account on the ground that the case 'appears to have been a Crown prosecution, and it seems it ought to have been attended to without any additional remuneration.' The Chief Secretary thereupon informed him that the Lieutenant-Governor decided that 'the proceedings must be instituted by Mr. Andrew at his own expense in the first instance, and in the event of a decision in Mr. Andrew's favour, he should be reimbursed by the Government to the extent of the whole of the costs.' It is for the Privy Council to decide upon the ethics of this heads-I-win-tails-you-lose policy. We would simply direct their attention to the fact that even the ingenuity of the representatives of the British Government in India could not explain how the costs in another action, that is pending against Mr. Channing Arnold are being paid in advance. The action in question is a civil one for £1,000 damages, filed under official instructions by the police-officer, Mr. Finnie, and is standing over until April next. In it the Lieutenant-Governor has already sanctioned payment to the Government Advocate of Rs. 650-8-0 (£18 7s. 4d.). These are curious revelations, and if true they are scarcely calculated to enhance the prestige of the Burma Government. But in view of Lord Haldane's statement that in refusing leave to appeal, the Judiciary was guilty of "a denial of natural justice," we are not sure which to admire most, the Executive or the Judiciary. But this is no time to discriminate in our admiration. Money is urgently needed for the appeal and it must be forthcoming if we are lovers of truth, honesty and courage. Will not our readers co-operate with us in helping to remove the stain from the fair name of Channing Arnold?

It is a genuine pleasure to us to see that the promoters of the Hindu University scheme are pushing on the work of collecting funds with determination and vigour. The University Deputation, headed by the Hon. the Maharaja of Darbhanga, has had a very successful tour recently, and it appears that upwards of eighty lakhs of rupees have so far been subscribed to the funds of the University. The Maharaja of Darbhanga, in his speech at a Bombay meeting, said that "one and a half crores will be required to start the scheme;" and, judging by the steady response hitherto made by the Hindu public, we have no doubt that the entire sum referred to by the Maharaja will be subscribed before long. In sketching the ideals that the leaders of the Hindu University movement had in view, the Maharaja observed that the constitution of the University will be drafted on the lines of universities like those of Sheffield, Manchester and Birmingham in which the supreme administrative body is known as the Court. "Our aim," he said, "is to make the Hindu University in all respects adapted to India, similar in educational equipment to the best of those universities in other countries which have no largely moulded national life and character wherever they have been established." These words strike the keynote of the movement. Education in India has got to be adapted to the life and genius of the people, and this adaptation will not be achieved completely as long as the control and direction of Indian education are in the hands of the State. The Hindu and the Moslem University movements are, in essence, a protest against an artificial system that has little organic relation with the roots of Indian life.

H. H. the Aga Khan, while offering the Hindu University Deputation a hearty welcome to Bombay, laid bare the fundamental need that has rendered the creation of universities at Aligarh and Banaras so desirable and necessary. He said that India had produced very great men in most walks of life, great captains of industry, great lawyers, great scientists. "But if we turn to the emotional side of the mind, apart from the religious, and compare it with the same standard in Europe or America, we have no men worth naming, because our educational system is not natural and right, based as it is on foreign principles. Consequently the system was wanting in that touch with the emotional experience of our race. May this Hindu University develop every side of life so that out of it may come a greater, more spiritual, more tolerant, more loving India." The Hindu and the Moslem University projects represent the only hopeful, healthy and constructive educational efforts since the advent of British rule. State-controlled education has done its destructive work and subjected the earlier synthesis of society to a process of dissolution. India is, at last, becoming conscious of its life and destiny and it wants a new and better educational homes to recover its mind and spirituality. The ultimate success of the projects will depend on the measure of freedom they are allowed to exercise in their evolution and practical working. The proceedings at Bombay, however, make one thing clear. The suggestion of a joint Hindu and Moslem Deputation to wait on H. B. the Viceroy, is hopelessly sterile, for whereas the Hindu University is intended to supplement the existing educational institutions of the State, which will still receive the mass of Hindu students, the Moslem University is designed to be a substitute for State institutions as far as Moslem students are concerned. Affiliation, therefore, is not so essential for the Hindu as for the Moslem scheme, and may be given up. But to the Mussalmans the recognition of this important and far-reaching principle is not a part of their life, but the whole of their existence. Because is not designed to centralise all Hindu educational activities, but Aligarh is; and those who talk wisely of the absence of colleges to affiliate to the Aligarh University may as well take out the heart of a cripple because he has no legs, or dig out the roots of a sapling because as yet it has no flourishing branches.

The Comrade.

Gaekwar-Baiting.

II

In the last issue we dealt with the Durbar incident and its accompaniments, but the Gaekwar's critic is not content with throwing a fierce light on that affair only. It is in a way fortunate for His Highness that it is so, for attacks on the ancestry of the Gaekwar and the position of the Baroda State show clearly that the Durbar incident was only a plausible excuse for the pouring out of a venom which had been accumulating for more than a decade.

As regards the extent of his dominions, the Gaekwar may not possess as vast a territory as some other Princes, but he rules over the Garden of India, and Dr. Voelker's testimony to the fertility of the soil, and the industrious and thrifty habits of the Gujratis which need no testimony, would be juster reasons for the large revenue of the State than the Gaekwar's extorted taxation. How many States possess such soil as Narsari's, and how many communities are as enterprising as the millowners and cotton gin and press proprietors of the districts of Baroda and Narsari and the Taluqa of Sidhpur? Again, if the Gaekwar has no ties of blood with his subjects, have Scindia and Holkar, or even the Nizams, any blood relationship with those over whom they rule? The more relevant question is, how does the Gaekwar treat Gujrat and the Gujratis? To this, the best reply is the complaint of the Mahrattas in his service that they have no preferment under Gujrati superiors, and the appointment of a Mussalman in more than one case to hold the balance evenly. It may be that the Gaekwar has not such a long pedigree as some English peers, nor should this greatly perturb one who knows that, in the words of an English poet when he deals with English peers and peeresses,

The gardener Adam and his wife
Smile at the claims of long descent.

But surely, after comparing the Mahratta ruler with English peers, it does not lie in the mouth of the Gaekwar's critic to say that the "founders" of his "dynasty" "gained their possessions by rapine and pillage." We should like to know the opinion of Mr. Lloyd George about the ethics of the founders of English dynasties! Perhaps even Hengest and Horsa would have pleaded guilty to the charges of a want of knowledge and due observance of the Ten Commandments!

It is, however, amusing to find in this writer one who claims to be an authority on every subject under the sun, from jewellery to ethnology and from millinery down to Marathi history and Marathi philology. Would it greatly surprise him to know that the Gaekwar does not mean "a hordsman," but only a Protector of the Cow? We have ourselves had to deal with an appeal from opium dealers and brokers of Malwa and Marwar who wished the Protector of the Cows to pay a large sum every year out of his dwindling opium revenue for a Refuge for Kins. In fact, any one acquainted with Baroda could tell this critic a number of stories about the clever manner in which His Highness proved to those who appealed to him as a Protector of Cows that some of their thoughtless appeals when responded to sent a larger number of cows to the butchers than had gone there without their Protector's reluctant intervention.

So much for philology. Now a word as to history. The Gaekwar was never a vassal of the Peshwa. Both the Peshwa and the Gaekwar owed allegiance to the house of Satara, and in the distribution of Gujrat the Gaekwar had secured the more fertile territory. As regards the relations of the Gaekwar with the British, the treaties do not show a trace of his being a British feudatory. He commenced his relations with the East India Company as an ally. The Baroda State has no doubt passed through as many crises as other Native States; but if British assistance was helpful to the Gaekwar, it was with their assistance that the British secured a footing in Gujrat. The records of the British Government acknowledge this indebtedness and one need not, therefore, at the feet of the Pall Mall historian to learn new "facts." As for the present ruler, he has no less a right to be the Gaekwar of Baroda than the Maharaja-Adhiraja of Burdwan to be the successor to the Burdwan Raj. He owes his title as a collateral adopted as a son by the Dowager Maharani to the Hindu Law just as any ruling prince of Europe owes his title to the law of succession in force in his kingdom or principality; and if the Gaekwar owes his selection to the British Government in any shape or manner, his critic, who is so solicitous for the good government of Baroda, and, at the same time, acknowledges that "the records of the State of Baroda are one long story of misgovernment until the British Raj intervened and deposed the then ruler in 1875," must be thankful to the British Raj for providing, by means of Baroda's ruler since 1875—the "humble little boy playing about in a remote village"—a turning point in the records of Baroda.

What Sir John says is not that he has been not to be as long as to explain. The Education Member of the Government of India still lacks the sting of the comparison when the Government's policy of free and compulsory education is placed in juxtaposition with that to which the British Government has now given its consent for British India. And yet it is Sayaji Rao's "unwholesome influence" that has given to the masses both eyes and ears through their Primary Schools in addition to excellent railway communications in a country where there is no earth, but only sand or clay. It is his "unwholesome influence" that has brought about social reform in the most practical shape, and has purged the life of Baroda Sardars and Gujrati Sethias of the impurity that had cost Mahar Rao his throne. But need we continue this re-statement of facts which he who runs may read?

We may, however, say a few words about the "stage army" of the Gaekwar and his so-called flat refusal to join the "Imperial Service" movement. If the Baroda army is a "stage army" the responsibility for this must be with those who have no desire to vitalise Indian manhood. The Gaekwar receives no cordial assistance in this respect from Government, the wisdom of whose policy is not clear to the public. As regards Imperial Service Troops, the history of the Gaekwar's contingent of 3,000 horses placed at the disposal of the British Government was not encouraging enough to make the Gaekwar launch without misgiving on another experiment of the same nature. He placed the whole force at the disposal of the British Government, and we know that he has been anxious to improve it. But this was met by the British authorities with a refusal.

As regards printing presses in Baroda producing seditious literature, the defective condition of the laws in Baroda could not be remedied as quickly as in British India, because His Highness was away in England. In his absence the Council looked after the affairs and included a European Civilian who was the Minister. In important matters the opinion of the Resident predominated. To be fair to Indian Princes, it must be said that they were expected to protect the British Government from all seditious writers when they themselves were exposed by the British Government to the vile attacks of every slandering blackmailer. But as soon as His Highness the Gaekwar returned from Europe he took steps to amend the laws, and was all the more anxious to do so because of Lord Minto's just and statesmanlike action in making the Native States truly "protected" against insolent and audacious libellers. Lord Curzon's policy had estranged the affections, if not the lip-loyalty of Indian Princes. But Lord Minto altered all this and rallied the princes by his Odeyone speech. But the question is whether that speech is to be applied also to him "who still compares favourably with many of his fellows," on his critic's own reluctant and grudging testimony, or to such princes only as may break all the Ten Commandments of God and the thousand and one laws of mere men so long as they keep the Political rari and khosh?

We think we have now sufficiently wiped an honest pen on the tissue of lies and insolent audacities that makes up the article of the Gaekwar's article in the Poll Mall; but there is a question of considerable public importance which we have yet to ask. Who is the man who presumes to "Know Better"? The Pioneer, which approvingly reproduces the article, only states the obvious when it says that the writer "evidently speaks with intimate first-hand knowledge of the things he relates." Who could that be? How and when did he acquire this "intimate first-hand knowledge"? And, last but not least, who has paid him during the process of this acquisition? Is he or is he not a public servant, which should mean, even if in India it does not, a servant of the public? Does the Government authorities or even permit these servants of the public to draw a salary from the public exchequer and blacken the characters and attack the ancestry of those who are not only Indian princes but may be among India's foremost public men? To be more particular, we should like to know how Mr. Cobb is spending his leave in England and whether he has already justified, or is now attempting to justify his newly-acquired title. If we are not mistaken, Government once made an inquiry into the authorship of a letter published by the Pioneer over the signature of "I. G. S." That was in the days of Lord Minto when he had accepted the resignation of a Lieutenant-Governor. Is not an Indian Prince deserving of a similar inquiry into the authorship of another and a more unworthy letter against official discipline? To-day it is the turn of the Gaekwar; to-morrow it may be the turn of a Scindia or a Nizam. Whatever the loyal and proud and chivalrous Rajputs may have thought of the Gaekwar's conduct at the Durbar, we feel sure they would be wroth of the conduct of the author of this letter, specially if it happens to be one whom they may dread as a future infliction.

So long as nothing is done to check the insolence of such people as these happen to be Government officials; the Indian Princes will be liable to public insults in addition to the private humiliations with which they are now being treated; and every official who makes "an honest penny" by Anglo-Indian journalism would be encouraged to garish his account of Zamindar weddings and his resentment at any inconveniences caused to officials through the proverbial unpunctuality of Indian brides and bridegrooms, by pointing the finger of scorn at His Majesty the King-Emperor's view of the Durbar incident, as the Pioneer's Bahrampur-Jaypore wedding reporter has done. We can readily sympathise with Sir James Meeson, whose social dealings with all classes of Indians are an ideal which even the smaller fry of the bureaucracy will find hard to approach. But we are certain that no one would resent the reference to the Durbar incident in this connection more than Sir James Meeson. If a wedding procession is unpunctual and keeps a subdivisional officer from going half an hour earlier to his club and the bridge-table, will His Highness the Gaekwar and His Majesty the King-Emperor be answerable for this "affront" to His Majesty's "representative" in the Parganah, and provide the reporter of the Pioneer with a fresh instance wherewith to point an immoral moral and adorn a silly tale?

Primary Education.

IN our brief examination of the policy and principles embodied in the important resolution on education recently issued by the Government of India, we alluded to its comprehensive character and the wide range of topics with which it dealt, and we deferred our detailed comment on some of the most practical issues of the educational problem now confronting India. Few will be disposed to deny that the question of mass education is one of these practical issues. Indeed, by virtue of its vital bearing on the progress and happiness of millions, it is by far the most anxious and urgent educational question with which the people and the Government alike have got to deal. The resolution devotes a considerable space to its discussion and defines the attitude and policy of the Government. It is satisfactory to read that "the propositions that illiteracy must be broken down and that primary education has in the present circumstances of India a predominant claim on the public funds represent accepted policy no longer open to discussion." But, while recognising its urgency and its need, the Government of India, for financial and administrative reasons of decisive weight, "have refused to recognise the principle of compulsory education, but they desire the widest possible extension of primary education on a voluntary basis." It is manifest that the desire of the Government to extend primary education as wide as possible, without resorting to compulsion, can be realised, if at all, only if they provide the utmost facilities for the education of the masses by systematic and vigorous efforts. The resolution indicates the lines along which the Government propose to work out their policy. First of all, it is assumed that time is not yet ripe for free elementary education, though local Governments have been requested to extend the application of the principle of free elementary education amongst the poorer and more backward sections of the population. Certain other principles in regard to primary education have also been laid down for guidance in the immediate future. They include a large expansion of lower primary schools teaching the three R's, the establishment of upper schools at suitable centres, the development of lower primary schools into upper schools where necessary, the encouragement of aided schools under recognised management where expansion by means of board schools is financially impossible, and the employment of trained teachers, as far as possible, who should receive not less than Rs. 12 per month. The programme which the Government propose to work up to is to add 91,000 more schools to the 1,20,000 already existing, and the number of scholars is to be doubled. Much stress is also laid on the improvement of the school teaching and the qualifications of the teachers. "The Government of India believe that the day is not far distant when teachers in primary schools will receive considerably higher remuneration, when all teachers will be trained and when it will be possible to introduce more modern and elastic methods in primary schools."

The aspirations of the Government as set forth in the resolution are admirable. In the absence of free and compulsory education the least that should be done is to create every facility for its expansion on a voluntary basis. The Government programme may not be adequate, but it aims at a definite move forward and would yield substantial results if realised in full. The supreme question, however, is how and when this programme is to be accomplished. The resolution is discreetly silent about the resources to be applied to the expansion of primary education as well as about the period within which the promised expansion is to be attained. In the absence of definite information on these two points the bright hopes held out by the resolution may well have appeared as mere pious wishes. The debate that took place on the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council on the 25th February has caused widespread disillusionment just at the time when extensive hopes were being built on the good wishes and aspirations of the Education Department. The Government of India recognise the need for the extension of primary education. They regard its claim on public funds as predominant. They even go so far as to express the ambition—very modest but still a definite ambition—to increase the number of primary schools by 91,000 and double the number of scholars. And yet they have neither fixed the time-limit within which to realise their ambition, nor set apart a definite sum for the purpose. Last Tuesday's debate in the Council has revealed that these ambitions are deliberate.

In order to realise the Government attitude as defined by the Hon. Member for Education it is important to refer to the discussion that the Hon. Mr. Gokhale initiated in the Council with his usual ability and force. Mr. Gokhale moved that "this Council recommends to the Governor-General in Council that all papers, including correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State on the one hand and between the Government of India and Provincial Governments and Administrations on the other, relating to the scheme outlined by the Under-Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons last July on the subject of the extension of primary education in this country, be laid on the table of the Council." Proceeding to discuss the motion Mr. Gokhale made a brief reference to the important discussions on primary education that had taken place in the three successive years—1910, 1911 and 1912. When the question was first raised in the shape of a resolution in 1910, recommending that a beginning should be made in the direction of making elementary education free and compulsory, Sir Harvey Adamson showed considerable surprise that proposals such as those should have been brought forward. In 1911 these proposals were embodied in a private Bill which was introduced in the Council with the permission of the Government. The Bill gave rise to widespread discussion in the country, and when it came up again before the Council for being referred to a Select Committee, the Education Member had definitely made up his mind to stay the Bill and it was accordingly thrown out. He, however, made an important pronouncement on the occasion, "committing the Government for the first time in the history of education in India to an eventual policy of free and compulsory education, and he wound up with an enthusiastic declaration for the spread of primary education which made a deep impression on the Council." Next came Mr. Montagu's famous speech on the occasion of the Indian budget. The Under-Secretary of State for India reiterated the view expressed by the Hon. Member for Education that free and compulsory education was bound to come in India as it had come in other countries. He, however, did not think the time for it had yet arrived. He outlined what he called an alternative plan for the spread of primary education which the Government of India in the meantime had decided to adopt. That plan contemplated the simultaneous expansion and improvement of primary education. He announced that the programme which the Government of India had set themselves to achieve was to add 91,000 more schools to those already existing and to double the number of scholars. "This was an important announcement," remarked Mr. Gokhale, "but it would be seen that there were two essential gaps in it which greatly detracted from its practical value. No period was mentioned in which that area was to be covered and no definite resources were promised to spread over a series of years to carry out the programme." And now comes the resolution of the Government of India, comprehensive in its outlook and full of laudable intentions, setting forth the principles of Indian Education in all its important branches, and defining in considerable detail the educational policy of the Government. But even this ambitious document has failed to supply "the gaps" in the speech of Mr. Montagu.

Now, there can be no doubt that the Government of India have some definite programme in view which has received the sanction of the Secretary of State. This fact is plain from the language used by Mr. Montagu as well as the Government resolution itself. Under the circumstances, it was a quite legitimate and reasonable demand when Mr. Gokhale urged that the programme should be published and the country should be taken into the confidence of the Government in the matter. Unless it is definitely known in how many years the programme is going to be achieved, and what additional funds are to be allotted to it year after year, few can regard the programme with much satisfaction. According to Mr. Gokhale's calculations, based on "certain hints which were to be found in Mr. Montagu's speech and the resolution," the cost of boys' schools at the rate of £20 per school and probable expenditure on the proposed improvement and expansion, including the charges connected with the training of additional teachers, inspection and so forth, would together come up to about 6 crores. As regards time, no definite calculation is possible. According to Mr. Gokhale, "if the rate of progress for the four years from 1907 to 1911 was, however, to be the basis of calculation, it would be very disappointing." During those four years the number of boys in primary schools had increased at the rate of about 1,30,000 a year and not 2,40,000 as had been wrongly stated by Mr. Sharp in the debate of last year and repeated by Mr. Montagu in Parliament last July. Now at that rate it would take 35 years for the present number of boys in primary schools to be doubled. The calculation about schools was even worse. The schools had been increasing in the last four years at the rate of about 1,350 a year, which meant over 70 years for 91,000 additional schools to be established." If, therefore, any reliance was to be placed on the programme definite information ought to have been forthcoming on the points summed up by Mr. Gokhale, viz., first, what resources were behind the scheme; secondly, in how many years would the programme be completed; thirdly, in what proportion were any funds that might be available going to be divided between improvement and expansion; and fourthly, what steps were being taken to increase the supply of trained teachers without which, according to the policy of the Government, further expansion was not desirable.

The Hon. Member for Education, however, could not vouchsafe any definite information on these points. His speech was one pathetic confession of the inability of his Department to provide for ways and means and to measure the path ahead. It was an eloquent and passionate exposition of the vagaries to which the Indian finances were subject. By a merciful dispensation of Providence they had had a succession of good years, but it would be a folly to disregard that fat years were often succeeded in India by lean years. The possibility of famine, with the consequent devastation and misery, always hovered before their eyes. The budget was "a gamble in rain." Only in 1908-09 they had had to face a deficit of 3½ millions sterling. Then again, there was the Nicholson Committee on military expenditure sitting at Simla, and there was the Public Service Commission. And who knew what further demands these Committees and Commissions might eventually formulate on the finances of India? In addition to all this, "we have an obviously ambitious but wholly undeveloped sanitary policy ahead." The demand for railway development, too, was insistent and could not be ignored. "And I should like to say," said the Hon. Member for Education, "that I look upon the railways as one of the greatest educators of the country. They cause a stir of ideas and a protest against illiteracy which is hardly inferior to the provision of schools." (The italics are ours.)

After looking at this formidable array of arguments one feels as if the Government of India have all along been "gambling" recklessly in "committing posterity" ahead to fixed expenditure on the various public services and the army. One never suspected that the twins of the Education Department, sanitation and education, were rivals in disguise and that each in turn would be used to confound and thwart the pretensions of the other. One is grateful to learn that the railways, in their educative value, "are hardly inferior to the provision of schools." It now remains for some new apostle of "efficiency" to rise and suggest the amalgamation of the Education Department with the Railway Board. The annual increase in the rolling stock, the locomotives and the railway mileage would automatically furnish the standard for measuring the educational progress of the country. Frankly, the speech of the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler was, as Mr. Gokhale said, greatly disappointing. Unless the charge for the spread of education is put on the same footing as the expenditure on the army or similar services, it is impossible to hope for substantial results. As long as the educational needs of the country are liable to be subordinated to the demands of the Civil Service for increased salaries and pensions, official sympathy with the condition of the Indian masses and enthusiastic forecasts about the educational future of the country cannot solve the problem. If the programme was never meant to be published, then, in the words of Mr. Gokhale, "Mr. Montagu had no right to refer to it publicly in his speech, neither should the Government of India have referred to it in their resolution, for its mention only served to create a somewhat misleading impression."

The Turkish Treasury Bonds.

(Dr. H. H. THE AGAI KHAN, G. C. S. I.)

A few days back, I begged a friend of mine—a very wealthy Mussalman gentleman—to subscribe largely to the Turkish Treasury Bonds and thus participate in the glory of saving the honour of Turkey in the saddest hour of her history. My friend at once stiffened his attitude, and, turning sharply round upon me, with a glow of fire in his eyes, exclaimed: "Do you wish that the children of Indian Moslems should starve and perish of hunger, and that their little savings should be wasted on Turkey?" This query, coming as it did from a wealthy gentleman of high rank and position in the community, who was supposed to be well-informed (I) came upon me with intense surprise. I recognised the ignorance in which even those who are expected to possess a first-rate knowledge of Turkish monetary affairs were sunk as to the real financial position of Turkey. This opened my eyes, and I saw the necessity of some one dispelling the ignorance and explaining to his Muslim brethren how safe and profitable it was, from a purely financial point of view, to subscribe to the 5 per cent. Turkish loan, that it was a perfectly sound and reliable medium of investment of any money held by Indian Mussalmans. Apart from the patriotic, religious and political aspect of helping Turkey in its hour of sorest need, the advantage of the investment itself is a sufficient inducement to Mussalmans to subscribe to the loan. It requires no stress of imagination to argue its advantages. Again, the fact that the loan is required urgently, and that it will go a great way towards improving the shattered fortunes of Islam, is indisputable. And, as a humble but true lover of Islam, yielding to none in the earnest desire to respond to the call of patriotic work to which we are immediately brought face to face by the present unfortunate plight of Turkey, I feel it my duty to bring before the Mussalmans of India the fact that, if they subscribe two or three millions sterling within a fortnight, it is almost certain that Turkey will be able materially to strengthen her position against Bulgaria and will be able to secure important modifications in the terms of peace and raise a dead wall for the future safety of Constantinople, around which surrounds a halo of imperishable memories venerated by Mussalmans, and at the same time improve her position in Thrace. This then is the position in a nut-shell that, while having the satisfaction of materially helping Turkey and strengthening her position against her implacable foes, and thereby restoring to her the essential vitality and recuperative power needed for the future development of the remnants of her territory and power and arresting its decay, they will be assured not only of the safety of their investment, but of a good return of 5 per cent. Reason and the law of self-preservation, which is the main-spring of all human actions, speak in favour of the proposal for the investment and the argument need not, therefore, be pursued too finely.

One constantly hears it said in non-Mussalman circles that if the Mussalmans of India felt as much as their Islamic speeches and resolutions imply, surely they would not tolerate the Sultan and his Government reduced to the humiliating position of being forced to mortgage even the parade ground and the Public Offices of Constantinople to a Syndicate of Belgian financiers—Belgians who are known as the "leeches" of Persia—for the paltry sum of seventy-five lakhs of rupees! Will you allow this sneer and reproach to be justified by refusing to subscribe to the loan? If you fail to do your duty on this emergent occasion the sneer will be justified and it will prove that we are far from realising the real position, that we are apt to be profuse in talk, but to lack in action. This is the time for deeds and not for words: it rests with you to prove that your love for Islam has not abated and that you are not indifferent to the call of religious and patriotic duty. One other point should be clearly brought forward by the leading members of the Mussalman community. Surely, the Moslem race in India is sufficiently religious and spiritually-minded to come forward and to subscribe the much-needed two or three million pounds without requiring "Begging Deputations" of so-called leaders to go round and cajole and flatter and beg for a cause which after all involves the honour of every Mussalman, and the furtherance of which would redound to his credit. The dictates of commonsense and self-interest urge themselves in favour of subscribing to the Turkish loan, and these are evident to any thinking man. But, having some experience and knowledge of the financial position of various States, I claim to speak with an authority on the financial stability of Turkey, and particularly of the real significance of the required loan, which offers, I think, as good an investment as can be found in any civilised State. From a purely financial point of view the aspect is promising; and I would like to impress that fact prominently on my co-religionists. To begin with, five per cent. interest is assured for five years. Secondly, it will be repaid at the end of five years at par. This in itself is a great point, for, as a rule, when one invests his money in any Government Bonds, it is impossible to say whether in such a short time as five years the capital value may not have depreciated. A five per cent. investment that one can be assured at the end of five years at par is worth 5½ per cent. investment with the same security, but without the repayment assured in such a short time. If we now turn to the credit of the Turkish Government even at this moment of the darkest period in her history, the Turkish 4 per cent. bonds are quoted at 84 throughout Europe. This is a ample proof—if any proof were wanted—that her credit is fully equal to five per cent. even when there is no sentiment attached to it and when her fortunes have sustained a severe reverse. The total indebtedness of Turkey is 131 millions sterling, and even if we take the gloomiest view that could be imagined, the clouds are not without their silver linings. Even imagining that the worst happened (which will never happen if the Mussalmans of India will have the grace to subscribe to this loan, which should be done quickly—at least in a few weeks) and even if Adrianople were lost with the whole of Thrace and Albania, she will be financially better off by £14,000,000 a year than she was before this war. It is computed by various European financial experts that over £12,000,000 have been annually drained from her Asiatic provinces and have been spent every year on the up-keep of the administration of her European provinces which have taken a tremendous toll in men besides. So that without taking into consideration any future development and the growth of wealth expected to be realised therefrom, and without a reduction in her Army and Navy, Turkey can with perfect safety borrow 20 million pounds now even if the worst came to the worst. As a matter of fact, I can say from my own personal knowledge that several very big banks and financial houses in France would be only too willing to advance £40 millions to Turkey provided the French Government allowed the loan to be quoted on the Paris Bourse, but owing to political reasons and France's desire to please Russia, there is no chance of Turkey receiving this financial assistance from France till after the conclusion of peace. I am sure that immediately after peace has been concluded, Turkey will easily be able to get 40 million pounds (to be distributed over a period of three or four years) out of the French financial houses. This fact is apparent to all who have studied this intricate question. Besides we should assume that the lessons of the war will not be lost upon Turkey and that she will, after this war, set to put her house in order, that she will not waste her resources over the sentiment of hollow prestige, but use them on developing her Asiatic and Mussalman provinces, which are fraught with great potentialities for the enrichment of the nation. I do not see any warrant for the assumption that Turkey will commit a folly that would bring about her eternal disruption and ruin. On the other hand, we have every reason and right to expect that after the war is over, the millions that were foolishly wasted formerly on keeping Macedonia and Albania, will go towards the development of Mesopotamia, which would enable her to more than recover her former position in the world. That country can support 25 times as many inhabitants as it actually contains. It should be remembered that when railways traverse that territory they will be not merely local lines, but the main routes of traffic for Western Asia. The very rich resources of Mesopotamia in agricultural produce have hitherto been little developed. History has recorded that once the province was in a most flourishing condition and the neighbourhood of Nubia was celebrated as a very paradise. But owing to inattention it has lost its fertility. The province is capable of yielding magnificent crops. The Asiatic dominions are the mainstay of the Ottoman Empire, and it is these that Turkey should develop. Every engineer, every financier, every traveller knows perfectly well that if 20 or 30 millions were properly spent on Mesopotamia there would be another Egypt. Money spent there will not bring 5 per cent. but 30 to 40 per cent. per annum. I am not alone in the opinion that I hold that in subscribing to the loan the Mussalmans of India do not risk the loss of even a penny. On the other hand, they stand to gain. With the fullest sense of responsibility of every word that I am saying I will say that if a poor widow came to me with her orphan child and asked my advice, I would honestly and strongly advise her to put every pie of her small fortune in Turkish Bonds. It may be asked where the Mussalmans of India will find two or three millions. I think the Mussalmans all over the country have money in various banks and in various kinds of securities, and where will they find better investment than transferring their holdings to the 5 per cent. Turkish Bonds? Personally, I would not hesitate to get out of every investment that I possess and that does not bring me more than 5 per cent. and buy the 5 per cent. Turkish Bonds. If we help in raising the loan, the Turkish Government would naturally turn to us in future when they develop their untapped resources in Mesopotamia, and we shall have the opportunity of being able to reap the benefits arising from the development of Mesopotamia. Here we have a splendid opportunity to contribute our share for the preservation of remnants of the Turkish power and prestige and at the same time putting our money in sound securities with no risk and a good return of interest assured. This is the one practical way in which we can help the Turkish Government in their present difficulties. This will be the test of our sincerity and our earnestness to help the Sultan's Government, and by the degree of support that we extend, our sympathy with the Turkish Government will be measured. Such an opportunity will not recur in our lifetime. If we play well our part and do our best the Indian Mussalmans will have the first moral claim upon sharing in the future prosperity of Turkey's Asiatic dominions, which are full of the greatest possibilities of future development. If we can only realise what it means to help in the development of Mesopotamia. It will be for the Mussalmans of India, what the Argentines have been for Europe. If these words of mine bear any practical fruits, I will consider myself very fortunate indeed, and if the dream of the development of Turkey's vast Asiatic territory is realised through the help of Indian Mussalmans, I shall not have lived in vain. Let Moslems realise what an opportunity for profitable trade will be opened to them by the development of Asiatic Turkey. It will be more to them commercially than five East Africas. And if they subscribe now they will get a chance later of subscribing in the Mesopotamia development loan.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Misfortunes of Turkey.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I beg your pardon for the audacity of addressing this letter to you. I am a poor, self-supporting Hindu student, but, with all that, I yield to none in my sympathies towards Turkey. Would that, I were able to be of some material service to Young Turks at this critical juncture. What a pity it is that, in spite of my strong desires, owing to my straitened circumstances I have not been able to save a decent sum to relieve the sufferings of my fellow-brothers there. But, finding in your columns, that you accept even the small sums with the same openness as you do the larger ones, I dare to remit you Rs. 5-0-0, through the postal Money-Order to-day, as an humble contribution of a poor Hindu student towards the Turkish Relief Fund opened by you.

I assure you that, as I read the accounts of Bulgarian atrocities perpetrated in Macedonia, my blood boils within me. Alas! I cannot but be a mute witness only to all these butcheries in these days of much-talked-of and so-called "civilization." In my opinion, the Turks, of course, will have to bear the direct consequences of the war, but its moral effect will be felt in the whole of the Continent of Asia. The victory of the Turks will strengthen the hands of the workers for the constitutional cause in China and Persia. The future of Asia, as a whole, largely depends upon the success of the abovementioned three countries. The honor of the whole of Asia is at stake.

But God is great. He will surely protect the righteous from the wicked. In His dispensation it is not unusual that out of evil cometh good. If the present calamities and the trying days of Turkey, China and Persia could make us realise the true situation, then I can say with all confidence that there is a bright future in store for all of us. Even now I hope that, under the guidance of Mahmoud Sherket Pasha and Qazi Enver Bey, the Turks will be able to retrieve their honor and recover the lost ground, if the cunning diplomacy of Europe does not come in. Thus they will fittingly demonstrate that Asiatics, too, given the chance, are quite fit for Constitutional Government.

A HINDU STUDENT.

Separate Electorates.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I read a letter signed by "S" in the Leader some days ago and found it a fine specimen of the Hindu political philosophy. It is the old story. Whenever there is an absolute certainty that a Hindu candidate, say for a Council election, is sure to be elected, then it is proclaimed from the house-tops that the Indian people, out of sheer patriotism, should slake their petty differences and elect the most suitable candidate. But whenever there is competition, and the Muhammadan candidate has some chance of getting in, then there are frantic appeals on the platform and in the Press exhorting all good Hindus to rise to the occasion by showing a united front and returning a Hindu. Was it not only the other day that the Leader was preaching a crusade and calling upon the Hindu electors of the U. P. Legislative Council to follow the noble example set by the Punjabi Hindus and to squeeze out any Muhammadan candidate who might seek election to the Imperial Legislative Council? But the self-styled Hindu publicists have conveniently short memories. Do they not remember that their patriotism and solidarity for their Muhammadan friends and fellow-countrymen led them to exclude Moslems from the Legislative Councils for years until the Regulations of the enlarged Councils made Muhammadans independent of their good offices? The Municipal Boards still continue to be in the hands of the Hindus simply because the Muhammadans have no fixed seats, and the injustice would continue so long as the Hindus are in a position, by their numbers and influence, to dominate the elections.

We may here point out that the Honorary Secretary of the U. P. Moslem League in his letter did not complain that the Muhammadan representation on the U. P. Council was inadequate. His object was simply to illustrate how impossible it was, in the near future at any rate, to expect a confluence of the interests of the two communities. The Muhammadans now realize the painful situation and politely, though most regretfully, tell their Hindu friends that they have reached the parting of the ways, and that it would save a good deal of heart-burning if there is nothing left to quarrel about and their rights are definitely specified in the Councils, in the University, in Local Boards and, in fact, in every department of administration so that they may be able to work along with their Hindu confères with independence and dignity.

If "S" studies the regulations relating to the Council elections he would find that it was merely an accident that on the principle of rotation it happened to be the turn of the Muhammadan landholders of the United Provinces to return a Member to the Imperial Council. The Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad was returned by the general Muhammadan electorate for the only seat reserved for the Muhammadans of the U. P. Provinces in the Imperial Council. As to the mixed electorate of the general members of the U. P. Council, the game was played once more with the old skill of past masters, and the result was that no Muhammadan candidate could secure a single Hindu vote. With these facts staring it in the face, we hope the Government would be pleased to treat the tribes against separate Muhammadan electorates and seats as so many political curiosities.

We do not make a secret of our great love for our co-religionists all the world over. But we need not take lessons in that peculiar and fashionable loyalty to Government which often enough takes the shape of convening more or less uproarious meetings in which the art of speaking bad English and worse Urdu is sedulously cultivated. The history of the past years points out in an unmistakable manner who has to learn lessons in loyalty, and from whom. The fact is that Moslems will always stand by the British Rule in India, because bitter experience of every-day life teaches them that they can enjoy their ordinary rights of citizenship only so long as there is a strong British Government to hold an even balance between the Hindus and themselves, and any supremacy of Hindu patriots, however slight, is bound to be disastrous to the cause of all good government.

MOSLEM.

British Policy in Persia.

MR. H. F. D. LYNCH has addressed a letter to the Times on "British Policy in Persia," in the course of which he says:—

"You will never persuade the British people to consent to the partition of Persia. I trust therefore that you may use your great influence in support of the alternative policy of helping Persia. On December 14, 1911, Sir Edward Grey laid before the House of Commons the outlines of a constructive policy. The Persian Government was to accept the principles of the Anglo-Russian Agreement and was to conform itself to its provisions. That was what the Persian Government was to do. On the other hand, Great Britain and Russia were, once for all, to throw over the ex-Shah, Russian troops were gradually to be withdrawn, and the existing Persian Government was to be 'put on its feet and maintained there.' How was this to be effected? Sir Edward Grey indicated that a competent successor to Mr. Shuster in the Persian Finance Department would have to be found without delay, such successor being acceptable to Great Britain and Russia. A loan was then to be made to the Persian Government, sufficient to enable it to restore order. Our Foreign Minister added that Great Britain could not co-operate in any harsh or aggressive policy aimed at the destruction of Persian independence. 'If we co-operate it must be in a constructive policy after the present crisis is over; it must be aimed at putting the Persian house in order in such a way that order may be preserved by the Persian Government in Persia, and that the present occupation, whether by British troops or Russian, may be only temporary.' 'I do believe,' he added, 'that a policy such as I have indicated is the only wise policy for Persia.'

"A year has elapsed since that programme was put forward. The Persian Government accepted the Anglo-Russian Agreement. As regards Mr. Shuster's successor, it has taken the man whom Great Britain and Russia recommended. But the 'constructive programme' which the two Powers were to inaugurate remains a dead letter."

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Feb. 22.

In view of the indecisive nature of the war operations and the intense cold and exhaustion, physical and financial alike, of Turkey and the Allies the idea of effective mediation by the Powers is gaining ground. Turkey is willing to accept mediation, and movement on part of the Allies is now awaited. The Servian delegate yesterday informed Sir Edward Grey and the Ambassadors that Servia associates herself entirely with the Montenegrin demand regarding Scutari. Servia also insists that Djakova and Dibra shall remain outside Albania contrary to the Austrian demand. Hakki Pasha, interviewed by Reuter, said that his Mission in London was merely semi-official. He declared that the Turks wanted territory in Thrace to make Constantinople, the Sea of Marmora and the Dardanelles secure. Adrianople was only one of the points on which they insisted. They asked Europe to intervene because peace resulting from direct negotiations between the belligerents was apparently out of the question. The Turks insisted on the retention of the Aegean Islands.

London, Feb. 24.

A Constantinople telegram states that cannonading continues at Adrianople. A Bulgarian aeroplane piloted by a Russian lieutenant descended in the Turkish lines and was captured. A strong force of Bulgarians advancing from Kadikus were repulsed after a two hours fight. Simultaneously other forces of the enemy advanced and occupied the hills of Ilbasan, but the Turkish volunteers recaptured the positions in a night attack.

Later in his speech the Marquis San Giuliano, Italian Foreign Minister, said that the formula "The Balkans for the Balkan peoples" was the solution most satisfactory to Italy and Europe, but it could only be attained by a series of compromises conforming to the ethnographic conditions while conciliating the moral and material interests of the Great Powers. The possession of Libya solved for Italy the balance of power in northern Africa, but did not diminish her interest in the balance of power in the Mediterranean. If by force of events remarkable territorial changes should occur in the Mediterranean Italy would not remain an inert spectator, but would exact consideration of her position as a Mediterranean Power. No-one nowadays had a right to call Mediterranean mare nostrum. It must remain a free-way for the nations. The present situation in the Mediterranean satisfied the political and economic interests of Italy, which like other Powers desired it to be maintained on that basis. Italy's relations with France and Great Britain as her neighbours in Africa continued to be inspired with the spirit of equity and friendliness governing the existing agreements.

A Sofia message states that the Ministry of Finance has issued a statement declaring that payment of an indemnity by Turkey is an essential condition of the conclusion of peace, but that immediate payment is not demanded.

A Constantinople message states that the Turkish outlook has improved somewhat thanks to the success of the Government in raising half a million pounds from the sale of certain properties in the neighbourhood of Constantinople. This relief has enabled Government to pay the outstanding month's salary to all officers and its more pressing accounts with bankers and other contractors. The military situation has been equally affected by the relief from pecuniary pressure, and the question of supplies is not likely to cause worry for some weeks. It is stated that Government has altered its plan of campaign and is abandoning the contemplated forward offensive and flanking movement. It is confident of its ability to hold out indefinitely at Tchataldja and Bulair.

Reuter learns that Vienna and St. Petersburg are now directly negotiating with regard to the boundaries of Albania, and that it is hoped that the determination of Austria and Russia to avoid hostilities will result in some form of compromise.

Replying to Turkey's last démarche asking for the good offices of the Powers the latter have intimated that acceptance of their Collective Note has not yet been received from Turkey. It seems that action by Powers is not to be expected until acceptance is received, Turkey's latest reply being regarded as useless in producing a cessation of hostilities.

Later,

Rumania has accepted the offer of mediation by the Powers. Acceptance by Bulgaria is practically assured.

A Constantinople message states that the Government has prepared to Eyed Idriss a settlement which includes certain formal acknowledgments of the Sultan's authority, an engagement not to enter into pourparlers with Foreign Government without the Porte's authorization, to send surplus revenues to Constantinople, and to allow the training of the inhabitants as militia by Ottoman officers and their despatch if necessary to other provinces.

London, Feb. 25.

Bulgaria has accepted mediation in the difficulty with Rumania.

A Sofia telegram states that heavy snow everywhere at the front will prevent military operations for some days.

London, Feb. 26.

Definite reports from Vienna indicate that it has been provisionally settled that Scutari will be included in new Albania, Austria making in return concessions to Montenegro and Servia in other directions.

Though important points still remain to be settled Russia's concession in regard to Scutari is likely to ensure an early solution of the differences between Austria and Russia.

London, Feb. 27.

A Bukharest telegram states that in handing the representatives of the Powers Rumania's formal acceptance of mediation the Premier added that Rumania would in no case renounce her claim to Silistria. He expressed the hope that the mediation would be conducted through ambassadors in St. Petersburg.

Reuter learns that the King of Montenegro is making a final appeal to the Tsar with reference to Scutari.

Circumstantial reports that Russia and Austria are ready to demobilise are semi-officially described in Vienna as premature. The official journal Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung last evening said that demobilisation is probable but by no means certain, and that the situation is virtually unchanged.

It is admitted in Constantinople that Hakki Pasha's mission to London has been a failure, the Powers refusing to accept the Porte's reply to their Note as a basis for fresh pourparlers.

In view of the Bulgarian acceptance of unqualified arbitration by the Powers the latter are desirous of inducing Rumania to renounce her reservations both with regard to Silistria and ultimate acquiescence in the decision of the Powers.

London, Feb. 28.

Reuter learns that although agreement in principle about the delimitation of Albania is in view owing to the spirit of conciliation displayed by the Powers during the negotiations in the past week a continuance of the state of war, and particularly the position in regard to Scutari by the Montenegrins, would seriously affect the present situation.

A Sofia telegram says that Russia has informed Bulgaria that the Porte is disposed to negotiate peace with Bulgaria on the basis of the surrender of Adrianople.

A Constantinople message describes the situation at Bulair and Tchataldja as unchanged. The bombardment of Adrianople continues but less vigorously.

The Constantinople police have discovered a conspiracy against the Government and Committee of Union and Progress, alleged to have been organised by Lutfi Bey, Secretary to Prince Sabahaddin, and nine others including four officers.

Several conspirators have been arrested, and others are in hiding. There is no evidence that Prince Sabahaddin is connected with the plot.

News from Turkish Sources.

The Ottoman Consul-General, Bombay, sends to the Associated Press the following telegram received by him on the 23rd February from the Foreign Office, Constantinople:—

"On 20th instant cannonading continued at Adrianople. Lieut. Nicolas, Russian aviator, was captured with his apparatus at Bulair. There is no change at Tchataldja. Two attacks were advantageously repulsed at environs of Kadikuey. On the 7th and 8th instant, after battles in which 6,000 Montenegrins and 4,000 Servians were killed, Bardjan was recaptured. Montenegrins will no longer be able to continue war."

The following telegram has been received by him on 24th Feb.: "Sublime Porte, 23rd February.—On 22nd instant bombardment continued at Adrianople; battle with artillery at the east front. At Bulair there is no change. At Tchataldja enemy is fortifying heights at west of Tchiflik Kouy. Our reconnoitring parties are active."

News by the English Mail.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, Feb. 1.

The Ottoman Agency issues a statement made by the Grand Vizier, Mahmud Shevket Pasha, categorically denying the reports that have appeared to the effect that regrettable incidents had occurred among the troops at Tchataldja. "The army," says the Grand Vizier, "was never so animated by a spirit of solidarity, union, and devotion to the country as it is now. Its sole anxiety is to do its duty and to devote itself exclusively to the national defence. There is no division in the Tchataldja army, as the enemy will find to their cost." The Grand Vizier further said that the Note presented on Thursday in reply to that of the Powers was very different from that prepared by the previous Government.

He was also convinced that Rumania would reach an agreement with Bulgaria. Political personages in Constantinople had for the last three years acted on the assumption that they could count on Rumania. He had never shared that belief. These personages were wrong, just as Rumania was wrong in leaving the Balkan States a free hand in the settlement with Turkey. He sincerely wished that Rumania would have no cause to regret in the future her attitude towards the present conflict.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung telegraphs:—"The Pera lie factories are working at high pressure. It is reported that a great military revolt has broken out at the Tchataldja lines, and that forty wagons have arrived here with wounded. After a most careful inquiry I am in a position to assert that the Oriental Railways have not carried a wounded man for a long time, and that the hospitals here have not admitted a single wounded soldier. The Grand Vizier and Izzet Pasha declare upon their honour that the condition at Tchataldja have not undergone any change, and that the discipline of the army is above reproach and may be thoroughly relied upon. Only three officers have gone over from the lines to the Bulgarian camp, including Captain Hadji Ali, who commanded the personal escort of Nazim Pasha."

The same correspondent denies categorically the report of an advance made to the Porte by some bank or banks.

Salonica, Feb. 3.

The continued arrival of refugees is taxing to the utmost the resources of the various organizations engaged in relief work. Many persons have been driven to take refuge at Salonica owing to the scarcity of food in the interior, others desire to go to Asia Minor, but the majority are fearful of a renewal of the massacres upon the recommencement of hostilities.

The Bulgarians are now running a through passenger service as far as Dedeaatch on the Salonica-Constantinople line.

Albanians who have arrived from Dibra report that the opposition to Servian rule continues, and that the insurrectional movement is growing in force. As a result of the recent rising, which provoked the despatch of a punitive expedition, the Servian troops destroyed 86 villages.

(REUTERS' CORRESPONDENT.)

Sofia, Feb. 5.

In a fresh order issued to the Bulgarian army General Savoff says: "In order to break the enemy's resistance finally the Bulgarians will have to scatter his hastily mustered and untrained hordes, bring him to the ground, and dictate terms of peace to him on the battlefield. The Turks must be driven beyond the sea."

Statement by the Ottoman Delegates.

Bavaria's representative has been furnished with the following statement by the Ottoman Peace Delegates:—

Before leaving London we are anxious to let every one know our sentiments of gratitude to the august Sovereign who presides over the destinies of the powerful British Empire, as well as to the authorities and the noble British nation. We shall carry with us the most agreeable recollection of our stay in this capital and of the friendly welcome and the kind hospitality we have received. We infinitely regret that the Peace Conference has ended without a definite result, but we do not doubt that the British public, whose sentiments of equity are universally recognized and justly appreciated, having closely followed the negotiations, will judge who is responsible for their failure.

The first fortnight was spent in our asking the Allies to formulate their demands. The Allies themselves, convinced of the unacceptable nature of these demands, which were presented after some sittings spent in repeated insistence, showed every eagerness to get us to make a counter-proposal. We made three proposals in succession, the last of which involved enormous sacrifices. The Allies, without making a single counter-proposal, abruptly suspended the negotiations despite our desire to continue them and our protests. The Powers thereupon took the question in hand, but, without waiting for their decision, the Allies denounced the armistice. The Allied States certainly owed a debt of gratitude to the Powers, their real desire to arrive at the conclusion of peace, just as Turkey had given numerous and convincing proofs of her desire for it throughout the Conference.

This war, which Turkey did her best to prevent, was begun on the fallacious pretext of rescuing the Christians in Macedonia. Now the war is being resumed because Bulgaria, after having asked for immense territories inhabited by Mussalmans, insists on the cession of a Mussalman town, the second capital of the Empire. We leave it to the eminently just and logical sense of the British people to draw their own conclusions as to the real aim of the war.

We only add that we are happy to know that British public opinion is beginning to recognize the iniquity of the demands of the Allies and of the harm they are doing by their unyielding attitude, to the cause of peace.

Kiamil's Reply to the Powers' Note.

In the course of several messages to his paper, under date of January 28, the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung makes several interesting statements relating to the recent political crisis. He says (on the authority of a personage in the closest touch with Kiamil Pasha) that at the moment when Enver Bey appeared at the Porte the Council of Ministers was engaged in reading the reply to the Powers' Note which had then been prepared. Enver Bey and Talaat Bey at once seized the document, thinking that it had been drawn up in accordance with the decision of the Divan. Yet it was not so at all. The Porte's reply contained a non-acceptance of the demands of the Powers, and would have satisfied the latter very little.

In another passage the correspondent states that "during their eight months of office the Government of Kiamil Pasha sinned frightfully against the Turkish army. Now that they have come to power again the Young Turks will perhaps gain a clear view of the systematic devastations which have led to the disasters at Kirk Kiliseh and Lule Burgas. They may perhaps now come to the same conclusions to which Kiamil's Cabinet came in the matter of terminating the war, though perhaps for different reasons."

With respect to the provisional arrest of Reshid Bey, hitherto the Second Chamberlain of the Sultan, the correspondent mentions the fact that he had been till June last in the service of the Khedive, and adds that "the Young Turks assume that the Khedive took a prominent part in their overthrow last summer."—The Manchester Guardian.

Turkey and the Allies.

(BY THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

ROUGHLY speaking, and although precise figures are not available, we may take it that Izzet Pasha, the new Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish Army, has 200,000 men at his disposal behind the Tchataldja Lines, and another 50,000 in the Gallipoli peninsula. There are probably 40,000 men left at Adrianople, and there are besides the garrisons of Yambina and Spatari, but all these garrisons are restricted to a defensive rôle unless a Turkish army should appear to relieve them. The question is what course the new Turkish commander is likely to adopt.

We are told that Turkish Army will restrict itself to the defensive, and will not move unless attacked. This is not a position which Izzet Pasha will in all circumstances be able to maintain. If, for example, the Allies concentrate their efforts upon Adrianople and maintain a more or less defensive attitude upon the Tchataldja and Gallipoli fronts, it will soon become impracticable for Turkish soldiers to remain quiescent and to see Adrianople captured almost under their eyes. Izzet's General Order to the Army is as full of spirit as that of General Savoff, and when it is learnt that Adrianople is again attacked, and, is perhaps almost in extremis, offensive operations by the main Turkish Army will become almost imperative.

The command of the Black Sea and of the Sea of Marmara allows Izzet Pasha a certain latitude in his plans, but the feeling in Russia makes any movement across the Black Sea of very dubious wisdom, while the time required for a movement of this kind, the numbers to be carried, and the want of transport on landing all rule this operation out of account. On the other hand, the reunion of the Tchataldja and Gallipoli forces is less impracticable and might in certain circumstances be carried into effect, whether by a simultaneous advance, if successful, or by the transport of part of the Gallipoli forces to the northern shore of the Sea of Marmara. The armistice has, of course, enabled the Turks to improve their position. The Tchataldja Lines are now reported to be stronger than ever and much better armed, while stockpiles have diminished and supplies have been brought up. Many fresh troops have come up, and the successful repulse of the rush and Unsuccessful Bulgarian attack upon the Lines has done much to sap the heart to the army. Nevertheless, the political quarrels of the corps of officers, the want of money, the lack of good administrative services, and the proved inability of a Turkish army to conduct offensive operations with the vigour and science demanded by modern war all combine to render any lasting military success most improbable, especially in view of the increased numbers of the Allies which are sure to be encountered.

PLANS OF THE ALLIES

The main fault of the Allies in the earlier phase of the campaign was their deployment of insufficient strength in the principal theatre. The whole of the armies of three of the Allies, and an important part of the forces of Bulgaria, were directed upon the secondary theatre of Macedonia, where, indeed, they were very successful, but where they did not secure the peace which they desired. The allied forces directed upon Macedonia were too largely set upon the selfish tasks of pegging out claims, each ally for itself, and in the principal theatre the main Bulgarian armies were left too weak either to capture Adrianople or to dictate terms at the enemy's capital. The Bulgarian armies in Thrace fought with desperate valour and incurred a loss of 70,000 men. Half of the remainder were in hospital with dysentery and cholera, and when a last effort was required to reap the fruits of victory the Bulgarian armies were not in a condition to make it.

These were great faults which are not likely to be repeated. The Montenegrin mountaineers, aided by Serbian artillery, will, of course, continue to rage round gallant Scutari until it falls, and a large part of the Greek Army is still detained by the strenuous resistance of the Turks at Yanaia, but the whole of the Bulgarian forces, most of the Serbian troops, and possibly a couple of Greek divisions can be spared to conclude the campaign by a vigorous blow. It is declared by Dr Danell that Bulgaria has now 550,000 men in the field. Serbia has 300,000, including some 45,000 who are assisting round Adrianople, and from these forces adequate numbers should be obtained to carry out any plan which commends itself to the Bulgarian staff.

The alternatives are, first, to attack Gallipoli, clear the Straits, and make way for the Greek Navy to appear before Constantinople; second, to attack Tchataldja, and, lastly, to concentrate upon the capture of Adrianople and to maintain a defensive attitude in the south. Of these courses the last appears most probable. The fall of Adrianople is confidently expected when the attack is resumed, and although we have not been given any decisive reasons why the place should fall, we must assume that the Bulgarian staff knows its business, and has knowledge of some facts which are concealed from us. It is certain that desertions from the fortress have recently been numerous and that the siege train of the Allies has been considerably strengthened during the past few weeks, so that we cannot feel any confidence that the brave defence of the town by Ghazi Shukri Pasha can much longer be continued. The fall of the place will remove the most important obstacle to peace, especially if the Turkish army makes an effort to advance and fails.

The exact position of the Bulgarian armies in front of Tchataldja is not definitely known, but there are reports that they have been withdrawn from the immediate neighbourhood of the Lines and that their headquarters are at Tcherkesskour. In this case it may be that General Savoff hopes Izzet Pasha out of his lair into the open country, and then expects by a vigorous offensive to drive him back and to capture the Lines at a single stroke. The armistice has been as useful to the Allies as to the Turks. The health of their armies has been restored and their war material and supplies have been renewed. Most of the slightly wounded are back at the front, and the delay has enabled the distribution of the allied forces to be rectified. The season is still not very favourable for offensive operations, but this, on the whole, will tell most against the Turks, and there seems to be no reason, if Bulgaria can pacify Rumania, why the second phase of the campaign should alter in any way but for the worse the fate of the Turkish Army. We must note, however, that any demand by Bulgaria for Greek or Serbian assistance in order to secure what are mainly Bulgarian ends is likely to be followed by claims on the part of Greece and Servia, which may cause the final settlement between the Allies after the war to present difficulties which might otherwise have been avoided.

garians towards the end of October, and that for two months Ghazi Shukri Pasha maintained a spirited and active defence. It seems probable that the Bulgarians, beyond local counter-attacks against this offensive, were content with the rôle of an investing force.

From the technical point of view Adrianople is a formidable fortress. Under Izzet Pasha's scheme of reorganization of the Turkish Army three years ago a great effort was made to bring the existing works at Adrianople up to date. As early as 1908, when Nazim Pasha commanded the then Second Ordnance, the trace of the permanent works was improved, and to the writer's knowledge orders given for a powerful fortress armament. How much of this armament ever reached the Adrianople platforms is not known. The perimeter of the fortress is about 23 miles. There are said to be 20 main permanent works on the Adrianople side of the Maritza River and five on the Karagatch front. As the perimeter of the fortress lies at the junction of the Maritza, Arda, and Tunlja rivers, and as in winter these rivers inundate nearly a third of the approach to the fortress, they furnish a natural obstacle to investment.

The Turkish ordre de bataille was in such a hopeless confusion during the fevered mobilization that it is hard to say what force was actually in the fortress when it became invested. The garrison, over and above the fortress troops, consisted of three divisions of first-class redifs and two divisions of second class redifs. This would total about 30,000 bayonets. There were, however, other troops within the perimeter. The Turkish Field Army was caught by the Bulgarians in the process of concentration. Certain units from Omar Yaver Pasha's and Ahmed Abouk Pasha's commands are known to be in the fortress.

How long the garrison can withstand an active investment or the series of assaults that will be necessary to reduce it by force is problematical. The Turkish Headquarters Staff in December believed that the fortress was rationed until the end of March. This meant that it could under extreme circumstances hold out against an ordinary investment until, say, the end of May. How far this belief was justified by the facts it is impossible to say. The circumstances that must now most concern the gallant commandant are losses by his active defence, losses by sickness, and the condition of the large civil population of Adrianople proper. In nearly every case in history the defender of a fortress, when communicating his condition to his superiors, understates his powers of resistance and overstates the stresses which his men are suffering. In our own war in South Africa we had a remarkable instance of this in the messages from Sir George White to Sir Redvers Buller concerning the resisting powers of the Ladysmith garrison. Shukri Pasha probably is not exceptional amongst the commanders of beleaguered fortresses. It is therefore unwise definitely to believe the reports that the fortress is in extremis.

On the other hand the calculations of the Turkish General Staff have been so erratic that they may have counted upon the garrison without a thought for the large civil population. We have not heard yet that Shukri Pasha has made any effort to rid himself of the bouches inutiles within his perimeter. A commander who has shown such resource in active defence would hardly have allowed his garrison to be reduced by starvation without commandeering the food of his 100,000 civilians. The Turk, however, is mentally so curiously constituted that it is quite possible that Shukri Pasha would not have the heart to be really heartless in dealing with his bouches inutiles.

It cholera and epidemic dysentery have taken the same toll of the Adrianople garrison as they took from the Turkish Field Army and the Bulgarian Army in Thrace then Shukri Pasha may have difficulty in manning his perimeter. He had, however, ample reserves of arms and ammunition, and has doubtless reinforced his fighting strength from the civil population. In any case, if he has food it is certain that his fortress will not be taken by assault except after a long series of bloody engagements. The trace of the fortress is such that the permanent works, if stoutly defended, can only fall to an enemy possessed of slow and bloody perseverance.

Second Phase of the War.

The second campaign in Thrace is evidently going to be fought behind the veil of a secrecy even greater than that maintained during the first. In the autumn the newspapers and news agencies were encouraged to send war correspondents, although elaborate precautions were taken to prevent their seeing or reporting anything. On the renewal of the war both sides have adopted the more straightforward course of giving notice that no correspondents will be allowed to follow the operations. News is therefore likely

The Investment of Adrianople.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT LATELY WITH THE TURKISH ARMY.)

THE war is, apparently, to be renewed on Monday evening, and everything seems to indicate that the first effort of the Allies will be to take Adrianople. Very little is known of the real circumstances of the fortress beyond the fact that it was invested by the Bul-to be very scanty, to be coloured by its official origin, and to deal only with accomplished facts. This morning there is no news worth mentioning.

There is much speculation as to the plans of the Allies. Hitherto it has been generally assumed that they would concentrate their efforts on the capture of Adrianople. But the fact that this intention has been freely expressed by Bulgarians now tends to create scepticism. It is argued that the disunion reported among the Turkish troop holding the Tchataldja Lines may tempt the Bulgarians to make the attack of a point where a victory would enable them to dictate terms in the very capital of the Turkish Empire. The capture of Adrianople, while it would give the Bulgarians possession of the city, the dispute over which caused the failure of the negotiations, would still leave intact the Turkish Army defending the capital. Recent indications, slight as they are, are taken to show that Adrianople is much more strongly fortified and much better provisioned than was believed; and it is possible that General Savoff may have discovered some weak spots in the 20 miles stretch of the Tchataldja Lines.

Another project that has been suggested is that fortification on the north of the Dardanelles Straits might be captured by the Bulgarians. This would enable the Greek Fleet to enter the Bosphorus and not only menace Constantinople but permit a Bulgarian force to be landed on the Asiatic side and completely isolate the capital from the rest of the Empire.—The Times.

The Spirit of the Turkish Army.

An "old Prussian officer," who went through the first stage of the war and returned from Constantinople just before the Young Turkish coup d'état, in publishing in the Frankfurter Zeitung a series of articles in which he greatly praises the qualities of the Turkish soldier, but severely criticises the higher commanders. Among others, the late Nazim Pasha comes in for his special criticism and this is what he writes in his last article:—

"In my last letter from Constantinople I drew attention to the fact that an exaggerated demand on the part of the Allies might easily bring about a revolution, especially as great dissatisfaction was noticeable in the army on account of the conclusion of the armistice after the victory at Tchataldja. To-day I may speak with greater freedom than was permitted to me at the time. I knew that the overthrow of Nazim was only a question of time. His conduct during the battle of Tchataldja would itself have been sufficient to strengthen the suspicion that it was a matter of comparative indifference to the Commander-in-Chief whether his army gained a victory or not. Even if, though I am not at all sure of this, he was kept informed by telegraph of the course of the battle, it was nevertheless an unheard-of procedure on the part of a Commander-in-Chief to sit all the time in a train ready to start at any moment while his men were fighting with the courage of despair. The conclusion of the armistice, however, after the first victory of the Turkish army was especially Nazim's work, and this circumstance was bound to confirm the suspicions already existing—the more so as Nazim, in spite of the temper of the army of which he must have been cognisant, persisted in retaining the command, and did nothing to combat in the Council of Ministers the demands of the Allies. Had not Nazim been killed he ought, with more justice than some of the unfortunate generals of other campaigns, to have been taken before a court-martial, and there can be scarcely any doubt as to what its verdict would have been."

As for the spirit of the army at Tchataldja he says: "Whoever has caught even a superficial sight of the temper prevailing among the eastern army ought to have known that the reports of a revolt in the lines on account of the death of Nazim were false. From the first time since the outbreak of the war the well-known fanatical Turkish patriotism reigns there, and not only among the officers but also among the men, as revealed even to a layman by the enthusiastic welcome accorded to the incoming reinforcements from Asia. An army in such a temper was certainly not inclined to submit tamely to an additional disgrace, especially in the hour of its victory."

The correspondent is of the opinion that the Lines are not easily to be taken even from the rear, and adds: "Should a second attack on the Tchataldja line fail, I think the Bulgarians will have to be regarded as defeated. Winter is now in full swing in Thrace. The so-called roads have become thereby still more impassable. The supply of foodstuffs and ammunition seems to be almost a matter of impossibility, and a retreat through the devastated country would in such circumstances be one of the most terrible in history."

(PRESS ASSOCIATION FOREIGN SPECIAL.)

Constantinople, Feb. 4.

In the opinion of many competent observers the new chapter of the war which opened yesterday evening may present many surprising developments in the first portion of the operations, only this time it is believed that the surprises are in store for the Allies. It is pointed out that not merely are the soldiers fresh men, drawn from the highlands of Asia Minor, who are burning with a desire to wipe out the defeats of the Ottoman army in the early part of the war, but that new blood controls the head of affairs. A new spirit animates both officers and men, and enterprise, initiative, and daring like those of Enver Bey will be given a chance to prove their worth. Mahmud Shevket is already showing all those qualities as an organiser which have won him renown. The other day for over four hours he personally superintended the embarkation of some troops and war material, giving advice and encouragement to the men.

For the moment it is not believed that serious operations are likely at Tchataldja. The condition of the southern portion of the zone between the belligerents' lines is said to be that of a boggy morass, which would render the movement of troops impossible. The higher ground of the northern region is more likely to be the point of first contact, but is regarded as improbable that either side will indulge in an attack in force. The message reporting the burning of a village added that the Bulgarians seemed to be retiring, especially on the left wing. According to military critics here, such a movement is highly probable.

The Position at Constantinople.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" AND THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" TELEGRAM.)

Constantinople, Feb. 4.

THE diplomatic situation and the whole position with regard to the reopening of hostilities are very obscure, and no one seems able to dissipate the uncertainty which prevails. A statement which Mahmud Shevket Pasha, the Grand Vizier, made to me during an interview which I had with him this morning at the War Office seems to show that the disposition in Government and military quarters is to adopt an attitude of "waiting for something to turn up."

"The bombardment of Adrianople," Mahmud Shevket declared, "began last evening at 7-48. Since I assumed office I have done every thing that is possible to avoid the reopening of hostilities. The responsibility for that lamentable event must rest entirely with the Allies. As far as Tchataldja is concerned no gun has as yet been fired by either side across the swamps which separate the two armies. We are determined to wait and see what the enemy is going to do."

"With regard to the question of summoning Parliament," the Grand Vizier went on to say, "we have not yet given that as much as a single thought. The matters we have on hand are of first importance, and Parliament must wait until peace is declared. The government of the country is, as you know, in the hands of Liberals, and the institution of Parliament is perfectly safe."

I am informed that correspondents, who will be excluded from witnessing the operations in the field, may receive every facility at a later date.

The statement that Enver Bey is in hiding in the German Embassy and that he met with a hostile reception near the Dardanelles when on a tour of inspection is devoid of foundation. He is at present busy with the army.

The aged Kiamil Pasha, ex-Grand Vizier, left this afternoon for Egypt on board the Khedival mail steamer Imatilia. I was received by him very cordially in his cabin. He appeared to be in fairly good health, and smilingly declared that he could offer no views on the situation and that all that could be done was to wait upon events, which would decide whether his proposed visit to England in May would take place or not.

Mahmud Mukhtar, ex-Minister of Marine and commander of one of the corps d'armée during the early part of the war, came over the Bosphorus from Scutari (of Asia) to bid his former chief good-bye. It will be remembered that Mahmud Mukhtar was wounded in a reconnaissance early in December, and as he descended from his motor-car which brought him along the quay I noticed that he was still lame.

Djavid Bey reached Constantinople yesterday from Constantinople. He has had interviews with many prominent holders of Turkish stock with a view to procuring an internal loan, but without great success. The Treasury is utterly empty, and December salaries have not yet been paid, though they are promised daily. The popular subscriptions which have been started have only raised insignificant sums.

A high military authority told me to-day that Adrianople is still in a position to hold out for weeks, and that the commander there, Shikri Pasha, has informed the Government by wireless telegraphy that the town is in no danger of having to surrender.

Shakri Pasha has told the Government to make its military plans without worrying about the Adrianople garrison, as that is still in a position to make short work of attacks upon it.

Kiamil's Use of the Sultan.

A PERSONAGE who is in close touch with Court quarters at Constantinople who had arrived at Constanza gave the local correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt an interesting account of the events preceding the summoning of the Grand Council which throws a sidelight on the startling developments on Thursday. It appears that up till Sunday last the Sultan still shared the optimism of the war party and believed in the possibility of a better turn in affairs. As he placed great hopes on the navy, the latter, though weakened by the elimination of the "Hamidiyeh," was ordered to engage the fleet on Saturday, with result that it was "thoroughly defeated." All the ships received more or less serious damage, and the number of killed and wounded was comparatively great. It was then that the Sultan on receiving the personal report of Kiamil Pasha became convinced of the impossibility of further continuation of the war, and the papers at once received instructions to prepare public opinion for peace and the surrender of Adrianople. Thereupon Kiamil, who had not been able to persuade the cabinet of the necessity of convoking the Council, induced the Sultan to agree and to order this measure, since he himself was reluctant to undertake the heavy responsibility for accepting the Note of the Powers.

The correspondent then adds, on the strength of information derived from another good source, that the interview of the Sultan with the editor of the Sabah was also entirely Kiamil's work. It was Kiamil who had conceived the idea of such an interview as a means of influencing the public. The editor prepared the account of the conversation under the eye of Kiamil, and the manuscript was then submitted to the Sultan, who found the sentiments expressed therein "very beautiful." The interview "appeared" on the next day, though the interviewer had, as a matter of fact, never for one moment seen the Sultan. The correspondent observes that this method of using the Sultan's person is giving rise to severe comments among the Turks. —The Manchester Guardian.

Relations of the Allies.

THE Nationalist Pravda, of Belgrade, seems to be very impatient at the slow progress of the peace negotiations. "Why," it asks, "do we Serbians keep our delegates so long in London and continue to pay them their big salaries? Our task was finished as long ago as December 6. Our position with regard to Turkey is quite plain. We have not a single point at issue with the Turks any longer. Yet from that day to this we still maintain an army of 800,000 men under arms, in spite of the unfavourable weather and the enormous cost. What for? Simply because the Bulgarians want Adrianople and the Greeks want a few islands. But did the Bulgarians or Greeks move a finger to help us in our position on the Adriatic or in Albania? Indeed, M. Pa-Jitch knows very well that on the day when the Bulgarians and Greeks have achieved their objects they will at once disarm and leave us alone to fight out our dispute with Austria-Hungary."

(REUTERS'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Part of the Bulgarian press has lately been publishing articles hostile to Serbia, the Serbian press, and the army. The Serbian Minister in Sofia, therefore, asked for an explanation, and the Bulgarian Government replied that that section of the press which had attacked Serbia was composed of Opposition and Democratic journals, which were generally hostile to the Balkan Federation. The ownership, however, would be enforced to prevent a repetition of similar occurrences.

Danger of Montenegrin Claims.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

WHETHER Scutari shall or shall not be awarded to Montenegro is one of the crucial questions that have to be determined by the Powers. But to detach Scutari apart from its surrounding plains and mountains can only lead to misery and misunderstanding. Scutari, a large town of some 50,000 inhabitants, must stand or fall with the Scutari vilayet. All its meat, wood, and vegetables, its vine and fruit, and much of its corn comes from the mountains on one side and the plains on the other. The inhabitants of the mountains possess large grazing lands on the plains and pass the winter there with their flocks, returning to the high mountains on St. George's Day. Should the Scutari be so drawn that these people are deprived of their winter pastures they will be ruined in a large number of cases, and a promising industry—for the demand for meat, hides, and cattle products is a steady one—seriously crippled. The Drin is talked of as "a natural boundary," but much of this grazing ground is beyond the Drin. The only boundaries that can be truly considered "natural" are those that are formed by the everyday needs of the people. The Berlin Treaty caused great suffering by, in many instances, drawing the frontier between a village and its wood supply or its pasture land. It thereby produced the ceaseless little "frontier affairs" that for years cost so much blood.

Montenegro pleads that she needs these fertile plains for her own population. But it must be most emphatically impressed upon her that these lands are already private property and fully worked. Her scheme for the eviction of the population is one that cannot be tolerated. When after the Berlin Conference large tracts of Albanian-inhabited land were given to Montenegro and to Serbia the inhabitants were forced to emigrate in large numbers, and their lands were "bought" from them at merely nominal sums. In the case of Montenegro most of these lands have never yet been developed. Neither has the port of Duleigno, which was most unjustly wrested from the Albanians by a naval demonstration in which most of the Powers took part. A wholly Albanian town, which the Montenegrins had failed to take, was thus terrified by the might of Europe into forming part of Montenegro. But to this day it has resisted all attempts at Slavising. Montenegro has profited little by it, and its Albanian inhabitants not at all.

CRUSHING THE ALBANIAN LANGUAGE

The refusal of Montenegro to allow schools in their national language to the Albanians has alienated their sympathies, and many Albanians, though continuing to live in Montenegro, have been in the habit of sending their children to the Austrian or Italian schools in Scutari. Other families, when the children have become old enough for school, have removed to Scutari, taking with them all the savings earned in Montenegro. In some of the Albanian districts of Montenegro, where the Albanians were in smaller numbers, and so less able to show a solid front, they were commanded to cease wearing their national costume and to cease speaking Albanian. The Albanians of the Scutari vilayet now say and they mean it—that they have not fought the Turks for two years on the language question in order to learn Servian.

Except for the little Serb village of Vraka, there is not a Serb village in the whole of the Scutari vilayet. As for the few Serb inhabitants of Scutari, they are in most instances people who have fled from Montenegro for political reasons or to escape punishment for crime, or are the descendants of such emigrants.

Montenegro has failed entirely to conquer the Scutari vilayet. She entered it by the help of the Malisori tribes who wished to get rid of the Turks and considered the Montenegrins as their allies. In 1911, when these same tribes revolted, Montenegro not only assisted them, but promised them that they should have Montenegrin support "till Europe had guaranteed their national rights." Sullen and suspicious now, the tribesmen ask, "Where are our national rights?" They hint quite plainly that in case Europe should try to treat them as she did Duleigno they will stand no nonsense, and that Austria will help them.

THE PROVINCE INDIVISIBLE.

The Albanians are a very much more industrious and intelligent people than the Montenegrins, and one thing is quite certain—if Montenegro again be given a large share of Albanian territory it will not make for peace. Should she obtain the whole vilayet she will be outnumbered and outwitted by the Albanians, who by forming an "Irish vote" will be able to upset Montenegrin plans. If, on the other hand, only a portion of the vilayet becomes Montenegrin, such ruin and distress will be caused by the division of Scutari from its food supply, the mountaineers from their grazing grounds and so forth, that peace equally cannot be expected. As for the wretched "port" of San Giovanni di Medua, it is a bay, half silted up, with neither quay nor pier. Landing is possible by small boats in fine weather. No town exists there; only a few scattered cottages, a Custom-house, and some barracks. It could be developed as a port for Scutari, but at present the bulk of Scutari's trade comes up the Boyana river or through Antivari. But should San Giovanni be awarded, apart from Scutari, to either Serbia or Montenegro, Scutari will be deprived of any free exit. The whole vilayet must stand or fall together.

Let Montenegro be satisfied with having accomplished that which was her ostensible object for war—the freeing of her brother Serbs in the Kosovo vilayet. Let her not sully this noble deed by striving by European help to enslave another people. Fertile lands has she now in superabundance for her people. Let her work them. And let her rather cultivate friendship with Albania as a neighbour State than seek to destroy her.

As for Montenegro's historical "claims" and "rights" to Scutari, they are too distant and too brief to be worthy of consideration. The fact that in the Middle Ages some of the Serb kings had suzerainty over the mountain tribes is of small moment nowadays. That the bulk of the people then were Catholic and Albanian-speaking is attested by various witnesses. And in the flood-tide of Servian glory Pristina, Priština, and Ipek were capitals. Scutari was never capital of Great Serbia. But if history is to count, it certainly was the capital of Illyria.—The Manchester Guardian.

The "Rumanians" of Macedonia.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, Jan. 12.

At a moment when, according to M. Take Jonescu and other Rumanian statesmen, the tension between Bulgaria and Rumania is acute, a brief consideration of one of the grounds on which Rumania claims compensation at the expense of Bulgaria may be of interest. I refer to the contention of many Rumanians that their country "will lose 400,000 Rumanians" in consequence of the annexation of Macedonia and parts of Albania by the Slav and Greek, which is described by some Europeans who know Macedonia well as "the great Rumanian myth." The description is, perhaps, unkind, but it is not altogether unfair. To begin with, no State can be said to "lose" subjects over which it has never ruled. Western Europe has been treated of late to a surfeit of historical claims. Turks, Bulgarians, Greeks and Servians can each make a fair case, on purely historical grounds, for the retention or the acquisition of the greater part of the Balkan peninsula. Byzantine emperors, Turkish sultans, Bulgarian and Servian tsars have lorded it over all or most of Macedonia and Albania. An Albanian of genius, John Kastrioti (Skanderbeg), ruled Northern Albania and Epirus for over a generation, but with the exception of Mircea, who held Silistria for some 25 years, no Rumanian prince or voivode has ruled territories south of the Danube from what is now Rumanian territory.

THE VLACHS OF MACEDONIA.

According to Rumanian publicists, there are now 400,000 "Macedo-Rumanians" in European Turkey. To the writer this estimate seems prodigiously exaggerated. It is true that a large proportion—according to some accounts 50 per cent.—of the Vlachs of Macedonia are nomads who wander with their flocks and herds from Thessaly to the middle valley of the Vardar and from Durazzo to Thrace. A census of wandering shepherds generally gives results that are well below the truth, but the fact that there are not more than 12,000 Vlach houses in the provinces of Salonica, Monastir, and Keshovo, and at most 8,000 in Epirus, would give the settled Vlach population according to ordinary methods of computation a maximum of 100,000 souls. It is therefore improbable that the total Vlach population of European Turkey exceeds 250,000. This population is scattered in little groups over an enormous area. It is only on the slopes of Grammos (Pindus) and its eastern outliers that one finds large Vlach settlements, such as Metsovo, on the Greek frontier in South Epirus, Khusura, between Florina and Koritza, and Krushevo, north of Monastir. In these towns resides the large proportion of traders, professional carriers, and craftsmen whom one finds among the settled Vlachs, a race with abundant commercial aptitudes and quite capable of holding its own in business and commerce.

THE "RUMANIZING" MOVEMENT.

From the fall of the Asend Empire, which certainly contained a very great majority of Slavs, the Vlachs of Macedonia were reckoned as Greeks. They spoke and still speak their Romance dialect, akin to but not identical with Rumanian, in their homes and in their tents, but for centuries the Vlach who went out into the world as a trader, a banker, or a scribe learned Greek as a matter of course. The Hellenic revival of the late 14th and early 15th centuries found no more devoted adherents than the Vlach merchants and bankers established in the Greek world. Kolettis, Orivas, and a host of other "Greek" patriots were Vlachs, and from the War of Independence until to-day men of Vlach origin, from Marko Bukovalas to George Averoff, whose name is borne to-day by the flagship of the Greek fleet, have worked devotedly and unceasingly for the glory and the well-being of Greece and the Greek people. It was not till the middle of the 19th century that the "Rumanizing movement" began. Till that period the Vlachs, while calling themselves Aromani (Romans), while maintaining their speech and their customs, and seldom or never intermarrying with Greek or Slav, were politically, as far as they concerned themselves with politics, Greek subjects of the Sultan, attending Greek schools, acknowledging the authority of the Ecumenical Patriarch, reading Greek books, and giving a mainly passive support to Greek propaganda, though, like Canning's knife-grinder, the average Vlach of Macedonia "never dared to meddle" with such matters.

It was Rumanian dislike of the Greek, based on memories of the days of Phanariot exploitation combined with the natural desire of Rumanian statesmen to obtain "interests" south of the Danube, that brought about the "Rumanizing" movement among the Vlachs. A "Macedonian" Committee was founded at Bukarest in 1860; but it was not till 1865 that the movement took a definite shape. In that year Apostol Margariti, a Vlach merchant who had made a considerable fortune in Rumania but passed as a Greek, returned to his native province of Monastir. Dubbed an adventurer by the Greeks, a patriot by the Rumanians, Apostol was undoubtedly a very remarkable organizer and propagandist. Thanks to the support of the Turks, who were delighted to divide in order to rule the "Hellenes" of Macedonia, and of a few wealthy countrymen, he founded several Vlach schools in Epirus and the Monastir region between 1865 and 1875. The Greek clergy took fright, but it was not till the Russo-Turkish War broke out and Rumania joined the Russians that they persuaded the Turks to close the Vlach schools and throw Apostol into prison. But the Porte soon returned to its old policy, thanks to the Thessalian dispute and Rumanian banknotes. The Rumanian kingdom began to devote larger sums to the support of Vlach educational work in Macedonia, and by 1885 over thirty "Macedo-Ruman" schools had been opened. Thenceforward the progress of the movement was in inverse ratio to the friendliness of the relations between Greece and the Porte. Whenever Greek and Turk quarrelled the latter authorized fresh schools. When the terrible period of band warfare—1903 to 1908—devastated Macedonia the excesses of Greek bands brought about a rupture of relation between Greece and Rumania, the formation of Vlach bands, and the recognition by the Sultan in 1906 of the right of the Vlach community to representation on the local administrative councils. Under the Committee régime the Vlachs of the Rumanizing faction sided on the whole with the Turks.

VLACH PASSIVITY.

Such is the history of the "Rumanizing" movement. It was from the first based upon Turkish and Rumanian support. The sole genuine grievance upon which it traded was the Hellenizing policy of the Greek clergy. Had the Phanar yielded on the question of language and permitted the use of "Kutzo-Vlach" in churches and schools where a majority of the community demanded it, neither Turkish friendship nor Rumanian subventions would have prevented an enormous majority of Vlachs from counting themselves as Patriarchists—that is, as Greeks. Even as it is, after more than forty years of propaganda, competent European observers are convinced that not more than a third of them are genuine "Rumanizers," the remainder acquiescing, usually passively, in the political opinions of their numerically superior neighbours—Turks, Albanians, Bulgarians, or Patriarchists.

The War and the Correspondent.

WITH THE VICTORIOUS BULGARIANS. By Lieutenant Hermanegild Wegener, War Correspondent of the Reichspost. With 55 Illustrations and Six Maps. (Constable.)

WITH THE CONQUERED TURK. The Story of a Latter-day Adventurer. By Lionel James. (Nelson. 2s. net.)

WITH THE TURKS IN THRACE. By Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, Special Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph. In collaboration with Seabury Ashmead-Bartlett. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)

Modern wars are now customarily followed by a remarkable outcrop of literary activity, especially on the part of those who have seen comparatively little of them. The Balkan war promises to be no exception to the rule. The value of books upon a war is generally in inverse ratio to the order of their production, and in the case of the present war we cannot expect an authentic history of the whole of the operations for many a long day to come, so studiously have observers been limited in their notions, and so carefully have they been prevented from forming a judgment based upon adequate and first-hand experience. First impressions of honest men and faithful chroniclers sought by a public increasingly interested in military affairs, and, so far as they meet these conditions, the pioneer books above mentioned deserve attention. The first purports to be a more or less veridical history of the campaign up to the armistice. The second and third are mainly records of personal experiences, but contain military information and criticisms which merit attention. Major Lionel James's little volume is a record of things seen at the front and under fire by a man competent to express an opinion on them, and consequently it deserves to be read and considered. Like all this writer's work, it is an intensely human document in which the temperance of the author makes no effort to suppress itself, but flashes out again and again with beautiful variations of light and stirring humor and pathos. It would be hard to name any other book which so faithfully describes the immense difficulties which stand between the war correspondent and success, or one which brings out in a more illuminating manner the rivalry which exists between brother correspondents in the actual exercise of their onerous missions, and the good fellowship which, when work is done, unites them all in a common bond. Major James has seen more than a dozen campaigns, and for this reason his reflections on the war carry much weight. He gives, as the reasons for Turkish defeats, inefficient administration and inadequately-trained material.

They fall into the error, which is common in nations where self-confidence is a malady, that, given a small steel-point of efficiently trained troops, it is possible to fill up numbers with the partially trained; that after the first clash of arms, given a martial race, there is time and opportunity to fashion the pig-iron behind the first line into serviceable steel. Never was there a greater fallacy. Never in the history of war has the danger of employing inefficiently trained and inefficiently officered troops been more poignantly demonstrated. The machinery of modern war will plough through the armies thus improvised with the same irresistible case as the share of the steam plough turns its furrows.

Lieutenant Wegener's book is the work of a reserve officer to whom cannot be denied either talent or the gift for clear military exposition and sound criticism. His knowledge of the Bulgarian language and of Balkan problems enables him to tell us much of real interest, and must have gone far to secure for his paper the journalistic success which was for a time the envy of all foreign rivals. It is a fair claim on the part of the author that he set out on his mission better equipped than most of his competitors; and we should be inclined to attribute to his knowledge of Bulgarian a greater share in his somewhat ephemeral success than the supposed aid and protection of high dignitaries of whose help, if it were given, we can find no very definite traces in his book. Whether the author's account of the campaign is sufficiently accurate or not we are not yet in a position to judge. Lieutenant Wegener avoids detail. Some of the Bulgarian victories which figured in the Reichspost despatches have quietly disappeared in this more sober narrative, a very large part of which is given up to events antecedent to the war and to a description, with numerous and excellent photographs, of the chief actors on the Bulgarian side. But while we are ready to allow to Lieutenant Wegener every praise for his intelligence and application, we confess that we are left in very serious doubt, which the author does nothing to dispel, whether he saw anything at all of the war except the distant bombardment of Adrianople. This doubt might have been set at rest had the author told us where he was at different dates during the campaign, but this he omits to do, and he makes a particular point of the futility of watching the fighting if a correspondent is to send home general accounts of the operations as a whole. This point is not unworthy of consideration; but the Lieutenant's chief claim upon our attention during the war was the fact, as we thought it to be, that he was constantly present with the headquarters of one or other of the Bulgarian armies in the field, and was personally a witness of many of the operations which he described so vigorously and well. We can find little in his book to lead us to suppose that our assumption was correct, and although the merit of the Lieutenant's book is not thereby necessarily diminished we certainly have no warrant to suppose that the accounts of field operations which are contained in it can be taken as first-hand evidence except in a very limited degree. Several of Lieutenant Wegener's telegrams are quoted by Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, who disposes of them in amusing and sarcastic terms. Very different indeed from the Lieutenant's methods were the ways of the British correspondents, whose anxiety to reach the front at all costs and hazards, and gallant efforts to serve their employers and to be first with the news of a battle, are very fully told by the correspondent of our contemporary. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's account of Lüle Burgas is one of the best that has appeared, and his book is not only an entertaining record of personal experience, but an illuminating record of the military disasters of the Turkish Army.—The Times' Literary Supplement.

Press Censors and War Correspondent.

In October I was invited by the Ottoman authorities to join their headquarters in order to assist in the censorship of the Press; and after a brief delay at Constantinople I left for the front with Major Ross, Bay, various staff officers, and the foreign attachés. The capture of Kirk Killiseh and the subsequent retreat of the Thracian army from the positions held from Lüle Burgas to Vize naturally involved the withdrawal of the correspondents from their camp at Edirne. From that moment the censorship of the Press, which had hitherto worked smoothly and so efficiently, I fear, to please some of the journalists, was rendered more difficult and, from sheer force of circumstances, in some respects impracticable. My own métier, therefore, was reduced to very slight dimensions, nor, in fact, after the great retirement of Abdullah Pasha's forces was any member of the censor's staff very busily employed, except the two officials who were especially charged with the vies of all telegrams sent from Constantinople. In face of the facilities afforded by the postal conditions in the Turkish capital, and the three departures per week of the Roumanian steamers for Constantza, all definite control over the despatch of news came to an end. If a telegram was of such a character that its refusal by the censor was certain, it could reach Constantza by boat in twelve hours, and from this port be immediately forwarded to any of the European capitals, including, of course, Sofia, Belgrade, or Athens. The journalists, in fact, enjoyed facilities never before accorded to correspondents, and frequently violated the censor's regulations without the possibility of any effective check on their action. The indulgence accorded them was perhaps regarded as a more indication of weakness and the fear of giving offence, and was in some cases repaid not only by an utter disregard of regulations duly accepted, but even by unrestrained abuse of the Turks in general and the censor in particular.

It may therefore be of some interest to consider the relations which existed between the army and the journalists during the Thracian campaign, and the still larger question of war-correspondence in the future.

I was accorded every facility for moving about the theatre of war, and owe more than I can well express to the courtesy and the consideration of my Turkish comrades on the staff. They know me well enough to realise that any criticisms passed in these pages are the candid criticisms of a friend who warmly admires their fortitude under unspeakable calamities, and earnestly longs for the day when over a new and stronger Turkey the sun of peace and good government will arise with healing in his wings.

On the other hand, I have no wish to level indiscriminate charges against the whole body of foreign correspondents who visited Turkey during the war. There were some journalists who 'played the game' and treated the Ottoman authorities with courtesy and consideration. Others, however, did not hesitate to conduct themselves in a way which has left a most unpleasant impression on the minds of the Turkish staff, and will, I believe, be taken into serious consideration by any continental government which is met with demands for journalistic facilities at the commencement of a war. We heard a great deal about the 'honour of the Press' and the 'claims of gentlemen,' but I fervently hope that the Turks, who were justly described by Bismarck as 'les vrais gentlemen de l'Est,' will not derive their idea of a foreign 'gentleman' wholly from the conduct and manners of some of their journalist guests.

Almost from the first a spirit of unreasonable dissatisfaction against the regulations of the Press Censorship made its appearance among a considerable section of the war correspondents. These gentlemen had been duly recommended by their respective Embassies to the Ottoman Minister of War, and undertook to obey the regulations of the censor if permitted to join the army. One rule was that the correspondent should not leave the country until the termination of the war. Had the authorities confided less than they did in the honour of the Press, the terms of this pledge would have been more definite and precise. As it was, the undertaking to remain in Turkey not only covered the personal presence of the journalist himself—a pledge frequently ignored—but was obviously inconsistent with the underhand despatch of news from countries other than the Ottoman Empire. The value attached to this item in the written or tacitly acknowledged contract may be judged from this frank avowal in a French newspaper:

Et puis, à Constantinople même, on a toujours la ressource du paquebot roumain. Trois fois par semaine, le mardi, le jeudi et le samedi, de lourdes enveloppes viennent s'abattre dans la grande boîte en fer du bateau de Constantza; ce sont les lettres de tous les correspondants anglais, français, allemands, italiens qui vont faire un tour en mer Noire avant d'être télégraphiées de Constantza ou de Bucarest à tous les journaux d'Europe.

The grievances of the Press correspondents at Tchiorlu varied in character. Two of them complained to me in violent language that they had been assigned a field for their encampment where the hardness of the ground made the fixing of tent-poles difficult. Others denounced the refusal of the Turks to permit their occupation of neighbouring houses—a refusal which was well grounded. Apart from other reasons, it was in any case undesirable in the interests of their own safety to have foreigners sleeping alone in detached buildings.

An almost unanimous chorus of angry complaint was directed against the practice of placing sentries round the correspondents' camp. This practice, adopted also by the Bulgarians, was fully justified for two reasons. The Turkish authorities, to be quite frank were convinced that they could not entirely rely upon the sympathy of all the journalists. Some correspondents had declared in Constantinople before they set out for the front that they had made arrangements for sending their 'stuff' abroad by secret methods and private couriers. But the strongest reason for the sentry cordon was the anxiety felt by the officers lest the famished soldiers might be tempted to raid the abundant provisions openly displayed in the correspondents' camp. The underfed troops who arrived from the capital, and the absolutely starving men who were forced back on Tcherlu, could witness the substantial meals and even the luxuries enjoyed by these Christian strangers, including a Russian and even an Italian. It is not my business to condemn the luxurious outfit of the war correspondent; this is a matter which primarily concerns himself and his employer; but it is clear that the temptation to seize food is a terribly strong one in the case of exhausted men who have tasted nothing for seventy hours at a stretch and drunk nothing except muddy water in the ruts of the sodden fields. One or two attempts to raid the correspondents' stores were frustrated by Turkish sentries, and it is clear that without the cordon the journalists themselves might have had some disagreeable experiences of the cruel hunger which was to a large extent the finis et origo of the Thracian reverses. This evil fate did, I fear, overtake some of them in the chaotic retirement eastwards from Tcherlu and Tcherkeskeni, for all manner of belongings disappeared in the general confusion. One correspondent lost for good three horses, costing 25*l.* each; another, whose pangs of hunger I allayed with Nestle's milk and a tin of sardines, bewailed the loss of everything he possessed. He had previously lost four horses and waggons and three servants; yesterday he had bought another waggon for 7*l.*; this had been lost the same evening, and with it all his remaining stores. I suspect that some of the 'lost' servants had not entirely severed their connexion with the missing horses and baggage. At one spot on the road a passer-by purchased from a Greek servant for ten shillings a case of fine old brandy, which a young photographic correspondent, whose normal beverage in the Strand was probably beer, had considered it necessary to bring 'to the front.' Many of the correspondents' difficulties were indeed the direct outcome of their complete ignorance of any language except their own: the majority of them lived at times in a condition of helpless dependence on polyglot guides and dragnmans picked up in the hotels and streets of Pera. These men were often unscrupulous, and in tight corners hopelessly inefficient; nevertheless, they demanded and obtained outrageously high wages, in some cases up to twenty shillings or more a day, in addition to an expensive outfit at the start.

Inability to ride and ignorance of the elements of horsemanship caused frequent delays and minor disasters. Very few of the servants could be trusted to keep their saddles if the horse broke into a canter, nor was the horsemanship displayed by some of the correspondents themselves calculated to impress the Turkish army. Surely men who are assigned the work of following military operations might take the trouble to have a few riding lessons. The Turkish officers were too polite to laugh in public at the strange equestrian exhibitions, but one of them remarked to me that he was surprised at what he saw, as he had read that every Englishman understood a horse, a dog, and a gun. On one occasion a correspondent at Hadzakeni aroused a neighbour in the dead of night with the news that his 'horse was unwell,' and on further details being demanded, declared that something must be wrong with the animal because, despite all efforts on his master's part, he refused to lie down and go to sleep.

The grievances of the journalists against the cordon of sentries round the Tcherlu camp were summarised by one correspondent as follows:

"In grave violation of international law the Turks are detaining here by force men who are not in arms against them. . . . The representatives of the foreign newspapers are appealing to their respective Governments to rescue them from Turkish thralldom and restore them to liberty."

It is difficult to believe that anybody could take this inflated nonsense seriously. The military protection of a number of foreign journalists who invited themselves to the theatre of war and undertook to submit to military discipline is actually held to violate international law! The whole paragraph is quite ridiculous. As to appeals to the Embassies, against this signal instance of Turkish 'thralldom' such applications did not always meet with success. On one occasion a correspondent found his way through a column of reinforcements marching through Pera in order to get to his motor car on the other side of the road. Some soldiers in England is, of course, not only an insult to our soldiers but illegal; and the Turkish infantry, who strongly resented such treatment in their own capital, hustled pretty severely the foreigner who had seen fit to break their ranks. The Ambassador was instantly appealed to, but it is an open secret that the complainant retired from the interview without much consolation for mental and physical bruises.

A further grievance was that photo requests were not permitted to send undeveloped films out of the camp. What staff in the world would grant the privilege claimed by these discontented? The army in retreat or assailed by cholera or snarls naturally does not wish sensational pictures of its misfortunes and difficulties to be published broadcast in the illustrated journals of Europe in general and the enemy's towns in particular.

Other protests were directed against the supervision of private letters—that is to say, the censor's claim, if he saw fit, to cast his eyes over the contents of such letters. Again, I ask whether any censor in Europe would have waived his right under similar circumstances to vise private letters. I listened to loud declamations that the 'honour of the Press' furnished an adequate guarantee that the privilege of sending private letters from the front would not be abused. But in justice to the Ottoman authorities, one can only repeat, however unwillingly, that the alleged guarantee could not be accepted. There were, as I have said, correspondents who honourably observed their pledges, and secured the respect of all who met them in a social or official capacity. On the other hand, a good many journalists appeared to hold that no promises tacitly or expressly made to the Ottoman authorities were binding. One of them declared emphatically that signatures to such agreements in Turkey were not worth the paper they were written on, and when he was asked how he justified so drastic a reversal of an Englishman's ordinary code of honour, he replied that the Turks had broken their pledges by not having 'shown him the war,' as if any staff in the world would dream of committing itself to so vague and preposterous an undertaking! Querulous persons of this type quite forget that war correspondents have no conceivable claim to follow the operations of any belligerent force, that they are simply the guests of the army they accompany, and that wars are not made for the pecuniary benefit of themselves and their employers.

I have already spoken of arrangements secretly made by certain correspondents before their departure for the front for the unauthorised despatch of news, and of the repeated employment of the Constantinople telegraph and the foreign post boxes in Pera for the dissemination of uncensored information. Much of the 'copy' thus sent was saturated with bitter animosity against the nation whose terms of service the writers had accepted, and in some cases correspondents did not scruple to forward information which, from a military point of view, was fraught with grave danger to the whole scheme of defence. One journalist, who on his own showing received every kind of courtesy from the Turkish officers, requited their hospitality by publishing a full and detailed description of the Tchataldja defences, including the number of the troops, the emplacement of the guns, the position of the reserves and so on. On another occasion an account of the defences of the Dardanelles was sent abroad by underhand means, which described the secret movements by night of the Ottoman reinforcements, the number of the troops, the alignment of the trenches, and the position of the ships. In short, the extraordinary laxity of the authorities was abused in order to establish in some cases a species of espionage extremely detrimental to Turkish interests and paid for, not by the Bulgarians, but by the funds of European newspapers. The trail of finance runs indeed over the whole sordid business, for such questionable proceedings on the part of correspondents are, as a rule, based solely on the desire to secure lucrative 'copy,' which is joyfully accepted by foreign editors without any apparent consideration of the means taken to provide it. The result of this 'for means or foul' policy presses heavily on those correspondents who honourably refuse to disregard their pledges. I have known men of this kind suffer cruelly for conscience' sake. While their less scrupulous colleagues were sending home graphic columns by wholly illicit means, they were condemned to comparative silence, the displeasure of their editors and, possibly, the failure to secure future employment.

A good deal of grumbling took place at Tcherlu and elsewhere, because telegrams had to be written in French or Turkish, and quaint indeed, at times, was the French of the Tcherlu camp. Foul Bey and his colleagues had frequently to correct, and sometimes recast, short portions of these French effusions as they could accept for transmission. Even in the case of despatches written by Frenchmen, alterations were occasionally made in the diction. When, for instance, a telegram stated that the Austrian Embassy 'avait eu un malheureux cardiaque,' through rushing him on board a steamer in a moment of panic the censor remarked that it was clearly ill-advised to permit the details of the fight to be telegraphed broadcast during the progress of the Lille-Burgas-Via battle, telegrams, therefore, were made from professed telegrams. One telegram of 250 words was refused for transmission to the press. . . . Details of the campaign were sent by the army.

After the retirement from Tcherlu and Tcherkeskeni the war correspondents had the best of their lives, and their photo staffs at November they reaped at will over the district between Stambul and Hademkoui. On horseback, in motor cars, and in steam launches, the journalists set off morning after morning to visit the lines between Derkös and Büyük Tehekmedje. But this liberty was used so extensively as a cloak of mischievous activity in various directions, that the authorities were compelled at last to make a firmer stand, and correspondents who left Stambul or Pera for the front without proper authorisation did so at considerable risk. If they were noticed near the trenches, soldiers with fixed bayonets marched them off to the rear, and in some instances bullets were fired into the ground in their proximity to scare them away and at the same time provide them with 'copy' about being under fire.

The general tone of the messages despatched by foreign correspondents was often bitterly hostile to the Turks. Amid the ever-deepening gloom of national disaster in October the columns of Continental journals contained lurid pictures of the unspeakable miseries of the Turkish retreat, grotesque prophecies of coming massacre and pillage, exposures of Turkey's military weakness, and jubilation at the prospect of a Bulgarian occupation of the capital. I have heard a journalist, in the hearing of Turkish officers and civilians, declare at the top of his voice that the Turks were 'd—d liars and scoundrels,' and that he intended to 'give them hell' in a letter home. One of the reasons alleged for these frenzied threats was that the Turks, through some trivial neglect or other, had been the indirect cause of the temporary disappearance of two correspondents since the retirement from Tchordu. As a matter of fact, the two correspondents in question were subsequently stated to have been 'captured by the Bulgarians,' but, whatever the circumstances of the capture might have been, the Ottoman authorities could in no way be held responsible for it, as I think would be readily acknowledged by the two gentlemen concerned.

I could not help contrasting the dignified silence of the Turkish bystanders on the occasion of this outburst with the sort of treatment which would have been meted out to a foreign journalist who in a dining saloon of any other European capital, at a time of national anguish and tribulation, indulged in such wild and unreasonable abuse of the nation whose hospitality he was enjoying. It was the same all along the line. Under a constant stream of bitter criticism and frequent misrepresentation, the Turkish officials and officers never forgot their good manners. I will go further, and say that their courtesy at times passed the limits of commonsense and became absolutely quixotic. A journalist arrives by the help of some Turkish officers at Abdullah Pasha's headquarters, and has the amazing audacity to wake the Commander-in-Chief at 4 A.M. because his car has broken down and he is hungry and cold. The general, roused from his much-needed sleep, apologises to this unknown stranger for the scanty state of his stores, but rouses his sleeping servants in order to furnish the self-invited guest with tea, biscuits, and warm blankets. I should like to see the foreign journalist who would think of waking Lord Kitchener at 4 A.M. in the morning because he is feeling hungry! And how shabby the return which was sometimes made for such unexampled courtesy!

Photographers in the employment of illustrated journals or cinematograph companies who tried to photograph the forts and trenches of Tchataldja were on several occasions arrested, marched off to an officer's tent, and then—entertained to coffee and cigars! Unknown journalists attached to provincial newspapers, did not hesitate to call on the Grand Vizier, who rarely refused to accord them an interview. The representative of a paper which has throughout maintained a strongly anti-Turkish attitude finds his motor car very naturally break down on the twenty-five miles run to Tchataldja—why not have ridden there on a horse at one-tenth the cost?—and is sent a warm breakfast by a Turkish general. A hungry journalist during the retirement from Tchordu finds himself without any baggage—but where was his haversack and his waterbottle?—near a group of eight Turkish officers who have managed to secure a big cabbage, wherewith to break a long fast of many hours. The officers insist on dividing this wretched菜 into two portions—the journalist is harded one half with appetite; the eight Turks share the other half among themselves. In short, it was sometimes difficult to restrain one's smiles in the face of courtesy and camaraderie which had passed beyond the limits of cold Western commonsense.

The question may naturally be asked—Why did not the military authorities punish correspondents who were obviously guilty of misconduct? I can find no answer beyond this same unwillingness to do a stranger an ill turn, coupled, perhaps, with a certain spirit of official laissez faire which was sometimes too much in evidence. That the Ottoman authorities would have been fully justified in at least arresting and summarily expelling a number of the correspondents cannot be denied, and such a course of action would have been fully endorsed by the members of every European nation. Some of the correspondents strongly resented the behaviour of their colleagues. One of them declared that had the Turks shot half-a-dozen of their number the victims would have had no just grounds for complaint, and it was by no means unusual to hear some of the more experienced journalists declare that if ever they commanded an army in the field not a single correspondent would be allowed to come within a hundred miles of it!

The war correspondents with the Turkish forces had, in short, slender grounds for their grievances against the censor's staff. There was practically no restriction on the number accepted by the Ministry of War; and, after a slight hesitation, an Italian journalist, whose presence in a Turkish camp might have caused some natural irritation, was admitted and treated with the utmost courtesy by Nazim Pasha's staff. The ranks of the journalists were even reinforced by the genial personality of a war correspondent representing 'The Pink 'Un'—(To be Continued.)

DEAR SIR,

I have much pleasure in acknowledging the favour and attention you have always shown me as a customer. The Durbar Auto-Knitter, that you supplied me, is now giving splendid work. I purchased the Machine for the purpose of giving a son of mine, who is deaf and dumb, some such occupation as would be at once interesting and profitable. I am glad to say that he learnt the use of the Machine in two days and, after working it leisurely for about a month, he now acquired sufficient facility to enable him to earn at least a Rupee and-a-half by a fair day's work. You have always approved his work and have never had occasion to refuse any of his work for any defect. I have recommended your Machine with pleasure to many of my friends who consulted me, and the quality of the out-turn has, in several instances, proved sufficiently attractive to speak in its favour. Thanking you very much for your courtesy and attention,

I remain, Dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

The Ministers of the six Powers concerned in the Chinese loan have arranged on the subject of adviserships which there is reason to believe the Chinese will also accept.

Mr. Larsen, the Swedish Missionary, reported to be the greatest living authority on Mongolia, has been appointed Adviser to the Bureau of Tibetan and Mongolian Affairs.

Tibet.

News has been at last received from Tibet regarding the entry of the Dalai Lama into Lhasa. January 28th was fixed as an auspicious day, and all the local Tibetan officers, prominent citizens, Gurkha residents and heads of various monasteries assembled at Lumbung, near the Drepung monastery, to receive him. His Holiness, riding in Mongolian dress, with twelve attendants, was saluted on arrival by the troops and the people. He then donned the full Lama dress and received the officials and the people in a tent and bestowed his blessing on all the visitors. At noon he entered a palanquin and was carried in procession to the Potala. Unfortunately, a strong wind suddenly sprang up and the weather was so inclement that the people waiting along the route were unable to obtain a view of him. His Holiness has since been in his residence in Lhasa and is presumably conducting the affairs of the Government from the Potala as his headquarters.

The Balance of Power.

It is semi-officially explained in Berlin that the German increase in armaments is due to the shifting of the balance of power through the overthrow of Turkey and the rising of a formidable Slav Power in eastern Europe, the existence of which tends to engage the special interest of Austria while Italy is occupied with her newly-acquired possessions in Libya.

A Paris telegram states that the Supreme Military Council has decided in favour of three years' service with the abolition of all exemptions. The French Chamber with the approval of Government has adopted a Socialist amendment to a Budget imposing a tax of five pence a ton on coal from mines whose profits amount to a franc a ton. The tax will produce fourteen million francs, which the Finance Minister declared was most moderate in view of the great duties now falling on taxpayers.

New Delhi.

At a meeting of the Executive Council held on the 7th inst., the Government of India considered the reports of the town planners, and of the Military and Medical Committees appointed for the purpose, and decided to adhere to their decision in favour of the southern site as the seat of the New Capital at Delhi.

The Public Service Commission.

Evidence by H. H. the Aga Khan.

Sitting at the Bombay Secretariat the Public Service Commission on Monday, the 3rd instant, examined four more witnesses, the first and most important of whom was the Aga Khan, who occupied the witness chair for two hours. There was a full attendance of Com-

China.

After prolonged negotiations, it has been already arranged to begin immediately the construction of the Hukin-Hukuang railway which was suspended owing to the revolution. British, French, German and American Banks are concerned in the original contract signed in 1911, which provided for a loan of six million sterling for the construction of 1,600 miles between Hunan, Hupoh and Szechuan. The railways are a most important undertaking and have been constructed for by China and will ensure employment for many thousands of workmen. It is understood that preference will be given to soldiers whom the Government wishes to disband.

ministers with the exception of Mr. Justice Abder Rahim, of Madras, whom domestic troubles prevented from being present, and the Commission again sat well into the late afternoon, finding it impossible once more to adhere to the time table.

The Aga Khan's evidence, which was completed before the fifth interval, was the feature of the day's proceedings.

His Highness the Aga Khan accepted the present system of recruitment by open competition for the Indian Civil Service as being generally satisfactory, and thought the principle of open competition should always be maintained. The system of recruitment he would adopt to the exigencies of modern times so as to give a wider scope for satisfying the legitimate aspirations of Indians and the fullest development of their talents. The Aga Khan also said he was in favour of a simultaneous examination in England and India. I would, he observed, give full effect to the House of Commons's resolution of June 1898: "That all competitive examinations heretofore held in England alone for the appointments to the Civil Services of India shall henceforth be held simultaneously in India and England, such examinations in both countries being identical in nature, all who compete being finally classified in one list according to merit." I would strongly advocate the holding of examinations in India, not only for the Indian Civil Services but for other competitive services as well, such as the Medical, the Forest and the Police. It is unfair that examinations for Indian Civil Services should be held only in England. When the principle of competitive examination for Civil appointments in India was introduced sixty years ago, there were no educational institutions in India and therefore it was natural to leave the holding of simultaneous examination in India out of consideration. But the contact of the East with the West has profoundly changed the aspect of Indian education and during the last half century there has been remarkable educational progress in India. By creating a Special Department of Education, the Government of India have shown their earnest desire to give a vigorous and systematic impetus to education. The establishment of various useful Faculties in recent years, will open up careers to Indian students outside the Government Service and the legal profession and I, for one, have no hesitation in saying that the Indian Civil Service will in no way be swamped by Indians. Nor will its morale deteriorate in any way. The brightest sons of India—Telang, Ranade, Gokhale and others—were the product of English education in India. As I have said, the simultaneous examination in England and India should be identical in regard to the standard of test, the examination papers, marks, etc. If the Indian Civil Service examination is held in India, it will open the doors to promising and talented students, who, owing to their limited means and the disabilities entailed upon them in consequence of their stay in a foreign land for their studies, and the risks involved in failure, are unable to proceed to England to compete for the Service. It will do away with any feeling of discontent that may exist at the idea that the Indian Civil Service has been kept as a preserve for Englishmen and that the children of the soil are shut out from their proper and legitimate share in controlling the administration of the country.

A MYTHICAL DANGER.

There is no fear of the Service being overrun by Indian, added the Aga Khan. At present in the Bombay Presidency out of 140 posts held by the I.C.S. there are only nine held by Indians, including two Statutory Civilian. This works out at something like 6 per cent. of the Civil posts in the Presidency being held by Indians. Again, in the whole of India, of 1,291 I.C.S., only 56 are Indians and the remaining 1,235 are Europeans. This is a very meagre proportion and if the simultaneous examination is held in India, I do not think that more than 15 or 20 per cent. at the most of Indians would be recruited by means of the system of competitive examination. I am convinced that the so-called danger of the service being swamped by Indians is imaginary. The fear that the Service will be overcrowded by Indians is based on the fallacious idea that Indians have the full gift of passing examinations by means of cramming.

The Aga Khan further declared that he would place the classical languages of India on the same footing as the classical languages of Europe in regard to the allotment of marks. Persian he would include and treat on an equal level with French and German and he would also include a knowledge of the rudiments of Indian administration and Indian history, particularly history of recent years. "I do not think," he added, answering question 19, "that the Indian element in the Service would ever be alarmingly great. I would certainly be sorry to see the British character of the administrative disappear, but to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of Indians for a larger share in the administration I would throw open to them, when they are found fit and eligible, such appointments as are generally held by Englishmen. They should be promoted to the Commissionership, to the responsible posts in the Secretariats, or even to Lieutenant-Governorship if they are fit and senior."

His Highness further expressed the view that a college started in some suitable centre like Bombay, or Calcutta, would be likely to be more useful for all the Indian Services. He thought young officers should not be first of all sent to districts where they were apt to form initial opinions of India and Indians based on faulty deductions drawn from observing the lower classes of society with whom alone in such districts they were brought into contact.

BRITISH CHARACTER ESSENTIAL.

The Aga Khan was examined by the members of the Commission at considerable length. Replying first of all to questions by the Chairman, His Highness emphasised the necessity of the British character in the administration being maintained.

The Chairman: You would be sorry if the European element became a negligible quantity?—Yes. I should be very sorry if it became only a half or even only two-thirds.

Holding that view what is your objection to placing a guarantee in your proposal, even though the contingency of a large proportion of Indians entering the service is as remote as you suggest?—It is so remote that I really think the contingency is unnecessary. "Let sleeping dogs lie." It is useless to stir things up. There is no danger and if there was such a guarantee then I should certainly have a guarantee put in.

Do you think the advance of education in India has reached a stage to justify the expectation that some Indian candidates might attain success in the immediate years to come in the simultaneous examinations?—On the whole—Yes.

His Highness was next questioned on the possible introduction of crammers, and on this point the Chairman asked: Do you think they would be an advantage to India?—I do not think they would do any harm. It would be one way of getting knowledge.

Not a very satisfactory way?—Well I have never been to one and don't know much about it.

But you are familiar, probably, with the effect of crammers on the educational position of a young man. Would you run the danger of increasing to a very large degree the number of what I might call artificially educated young men?—I don't think it is very probable.

Don't you think that a large number of young men would seek a career in the I.C.S., because of the possibilities to be attained by cramming?—If that happens then you may put in a minimum and change the character of entrance.

You would be prepared to deal with the danger of a large number coming in?—Yes, if it arises—at the very first sign.

Do you think that would be an appropriate moment for dealing with the danger?—I think it is better to wait because the possibility is so remote. And I think it is generally admitted that the spirit of service must be British. I admit that most heartily, and if the danger arose there must be this reservation.

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof?"—Exactly. If the proportion rose to more than 20 per cent. I should certainly be one of the first to ask for a restriction.

His Highness was next examined on the changes he recommended in the syllabus and said he did not agree that the present sur of admission was too high. "It is of no use bringing boys out," he observed. He did not object to the transfer of men from one province to another: he thought it would be rather a good thing.

POSITION OF MUHAMMADANS.

The Aga Khan did not consider that Muhammadans would suffer by the introduction of simultaneous examinations, and he remarked that he advocated that Muhammadans should be put into the Provincial Service in greater numbers because the Indian Civil Service did not guarantee any limit, while in the Provincial Services there was a moral understanding that a certain number of Muhammadans should be admitted. Another reason was that more was required from a man in the I.C.S. than from a man in the Provincial Service; and a third was that a man in the Provincial Service had to deal more with the smaller questions.

Asked if he expected that in a few years Muhammadans would stand a fair chance with other creeds in competitive examinations the Aga Khan said, "No worse than now." Giving his reasons why there should be an increase of salaries in the Provincial Services, he pointed out that prices had risen very much of late. The rise in prices had been the greatest in the towns, and all who lived in the towns should have an increase in salaries.

Sir Murray Haumick then put a number of questions to His Highness. He was informed by the Aga Khan that Muhammadans of late had been realising more and more the importance of education. Asked his opinion on the desirability of giving scholarships to selected Indian boys who would be sent to public schools in England and trained for the I.C.S., he said he could not approve of any such proposal. It was the business of the State to give scholarships to pay for which the ryots would be taxed. His Highness also suggested that the probationary period should be one year in England and one year in India.

Sir Valentine Chirol followed with a number of questions and elicited that the sending home of boys at an early age to be educated had not been sufficiently satisfactory. H. H. Khan of Hyderabad in which the results had been unsatisfactory, and he knew of not one case in which the results had been entirely satisfactory.

Englishmen, the Aga Khan thought, must preponderate in the Service, and if any limit had to be placed at present on the number of Indians admitted to Service he suggested that the proportion should be ten per cent. This proportion he suggested might be revised every decade or so, but there was no probability at present of this proportion being reached.

Sir Valentine Chirol inquired if it was not better to make some contingency rather than leave matters to chance, but the Aga Khan thought during the next few years danger was not only improbable, but it was possible. After all, he added, the Commission had come out to study the whole problem, and this was only a small part of that problem. The moment they saw many Indians coming into the Service there might be a Government resolution saying that at a certain date there should be a certain percentage.

Sir Valentine Chirol: You would be prepared that the Government of India should make this limitation by resolution rather than that the Government of India should do so backed by the recommendations of such a Commission as this?—I think this Commission can give the Government of India power to pass such a resolution if necessary.

MUHAMMADAN SATISFACTION.

Questioned as to the attitude of the Muhammadan community regarding the matter, the Aga Khan said the community was likely to contribute more in proportion to the examinations than the other communities.

Sir Valentine: Is your community in any way dissatisfied with the present system of education?—No, they are very loyal.

Are they satisfied with the agencies through which that administration is carried on?—They think that the Service is a very good one, but they think it might have a few more Indians in it.

Replying to further questions, the Aga Khan said most of the Indians who had the British spirit were brought up by the best Englishmen in India. The British spirit could be got just as well in this way as by going to Europe, but he strongly advocated a visit to Europe in later years, when they could form conclusions, in order that they might see English life. He thought the fact that a man had spent some years in the Provincial Service was a better guarantee of his fitness than the fact that he had passed an open competition. In the former event he had been tried and tested; in the latter event he was more or less a dark horse.

Discussing the merits of a knowledge of Persian, the Aga Khan said German and French were most excellent for Indians but he thought, especially to Hindus, that a knowledge of Persian was of great value.

Mr Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Madge also asked a number of questions. The former enquired if the system of scholarships was introduced it would largely alter the character of the Indian section of the I.C.S. As a supposition the Aga Khan did not think it would.

Mr. MacDonald asked several questions regarding the study of Persian. He asked: I suppose you only advocate that the Indian candidate should take Persian?—I wish that the English candidate would. It would be a very good thing, but I think on the whole that the Englishman would be more likely to take French or German.

At the same time you think English candidates should have a little knowledge of Eastern culture?—It is greatly needed.

Do you think it is far better to select subjects for open competition from a somewhat less specialised series of subjects and then give a much longer time for probation after this open competition has been passed in order that during that period he may acquire Eastern culture?—That would be one way. The other would be to give to the English candidates additional marks for Arabic, Sanskrit, and Persian if they take it up.

And therefore perhaps we should be better advised if we leave the study of Persian and all that it stands for until the probation period rather than before the open competition?—I think it is a very good thing for the European.

Then you will have to reduce the age at which the examination is held?—Yes, and increase the probation.

And if my mind is running on these lines you have not very much objection to it?—No; I approve of it.

And in the probation period you would bring in Indian economies and history?—Yes; and the best literature of the country.

THE PROBLEM OF THE COUNTRY.

The problem we have to face is how, so far as the Indian is concerned, to select by competition and by subsequent training Indians who will understand English methods but who will remain to India still as Indians?—Yes; that is the problem of the country.

In answer to a question by Mr. Sly, His Highness said that the Indian League came into existence in 1906. The various committees of the League were now considering the question in regard to the Public Services in India and they were in favour of the simultaneous examination.

You suggest that the number of Indian Civilians should in the next ten years be increased to ten per cent instead of the 6 per cent. at present:—Yes; and it should be gradually increased to 20 per cent, during the generation.

As a matter of fact when you make this recommendation, do you take into consideration the fact that at the present time there is a certain proportion of Indians, who hold what are called "listed posts"? At present the superior listed posts are about eight per cent, but if you take also the inferior posts, the percentage is still larger?—My recommendation is irrespective of the "listed posts."

Can you give a maximum of percentages for the joint posts of civilians and listed officers?—I have not thought that out; but I would increase the percentage of listed posts also.

In reply to question No 15 you say that Indians should be appointed to the offices of Commissioners and Lieutenant-Governors. What do you refer to when you make that suggestion? Do you know that at present there is no bar to the course you propose? Do you suggest any change?—No; I don't propose any change. I only emphasise the rights of Indians to those superior posts.

In reply to the Hon Mr. Gokhale, the Aga Khan said that the views he held about the simultaneous examination were shared by almost all the leading Muhammadans with whom he had conversed on the subject. He did not believe in the "theoretical danger" that the Indians would swamp the Indian Civil Service, if the simultaneous examination were allowed. The "theoretical danger" existed even now for if the Indians wished to go in larger numbers for the examination in England, there was nothing to prevent them from so doing if they had the means to do so. It was for that reason that he was not in favour of fixing a minimum number of Englishmen in the Civil Service. He recommended the same standard of examination both for Englishmen and Indians for the simple reason that all the candidates should possess the same standard of efficiency. He thought that Mr. Nairajan's scheme was the best alternative for the simultaneous examination.

BRITISH CHARACTER NOT IN DANGER.

In reply to Mr. Chaulsi, His Highness said that there was no danger of the British character in the administration being lost, by the admission of a larger proportion of Indians into the service. This was a question in which both the Hindu and the Muhammadan community was interested, and they both desired a larger proportion of Indians to be admitted into the Service. He did not favour the idea of communal representation in the Civil Service, though he did so in regard to the Provincial Service.

Cross examined by Sir Theodore Morison, the Aga Khan said that he recommended the study of Persian on the ground of its educative value. He did not recommend it because Indians were interested in that language, but because it contained a wealth of literature of historical value. Asked as to whether another scheme that might be devised for the admission of Indians to higher posts would find favour with him, the Aga Khan said that if it had the same end in view and if it removed the handicap that was placed on Indians being examined in England only for the Civil Service in India, he would agree to it; but the simultaneous examination has the simple and practical way out of the difficulty. Simultaneously with the admission of Indians to higher appointments, he would like to see the proportion of Indian civilians increased, but he would not sacrifice the one for the other.

Replying to Earl Ronaldshay, the Aga Khan said that he was in favour of the "open door" for all. Asked as to whether there were many Indians who could be considered capable for the offices of Lieutenant-Governor, the Aga Khan said that if they took ability plus the social position he was afraid there would not be many Indians found who would be fit and eligible for the office. He would bitterly resent any system, which favoured one class at the expense of another such as the introduction of a scholarship system. The State was not a charitable organization. There should be the open door for all, and there should not be selection or favouritism at the expense of the ryots shewn to the sons of those, who had money and influence.

Asked by Sir Valentine Chirol as to whether he had modified his views that the influence and the aspiration of the smaller Indian classes were in danger of being lost, since the presentation of the Muhammadan deputation to Lord Minto in 1906, the Aga Khan said that that applied to political rights and to representation in the Council and the Provincial Service and not to representation in the Civil Service. At that time the question of the Civil Service was not discussed.

TETE À TETE

This week we have received no letter from Dr. Ansari, but the Manager of the Mission—whom many of our readers may perhaps know as the fascinating late Manager of the Comrade—who has been left in Constantinople writes to us a long chatty letter from which we gather the following information. As Dr. Ansari had cabled to us early in February—information which was misunderstood owing to vagueness of language—the Mission was divided into two units, and Dr. Ansari had requested Bassim Omar Pasha, Vice-President of the Ottoman Red Crescent, that he should inform him where the units were to work. In the second week of February, Dr. Ansari received a wire from the Pasha and was called from Omarli, where his field-hospital was located, to Constantinople. On going there he was informed that the War Office had accepted the services of a section of his Mission, as also of a section of the Ottoman Red Crescent Mission, and that his section should get ready and await orders. It was indeed a great compliment paid to Dr. Ansari's Mission that it was selected in preference to the Egyptian, the British, the German and several other Missions that had applied for field service. As Dr. Ansari stated in his last letter, this section of his Mission was attached to Enver Bey's army the destination of which was kept secret. Mr. Abdur Rahman Siddiqui now writes that the goal of the expedition was revealed, on 17th February, and that it is Gallipoli; and, as our former Manager puts it in his own inimitable manner, "Enver means to dismiss the Bulgarians as he has done Kriani!" The equipment of the Mission was divided into two parts, half being left at Omarli and the other half being sent to Constantinople. On account of this division some more equipment had to be ordered, and there will now be 150 beds instead of 100, 75 in the Omarli hospital and 75 in Gallipoli. Of course, the Gallipoli section is in charge of Dr. Ansari, who has with him Dr. Rahman and the Egyptian Doctor Foad, who is given to the Mission by the Ottoman Red Crescent Society and will act as interpreter also. Mr. Khaliq-uz-Zaman, formerly Football Captain at Aligarh, will be the Manager of the section, and Mr. Abdul Aziz Ansari will be store-keeper. Mr. Noor ul Hassan is the Pharmacieur. In addition to these Messrs. Chinghluddin, Tawangur Husain, Tafazzul Husain, Qazi Hashiruddin Ahmed and Manzoor Ali are the other members of the section. It has also two interpreters attached to it. The section at Omarli consists of Dr. Naim Ansari, who is in charge of the section, Dr. Raza Khan and Dr. Mahmudullah. Mr. Shuaib Qureshi is the Manager of this section, and Mr. Abdur Rahman of Peshawar is the store-keeper. Mr. Abdul Wahed Khan is the Pharmacieur, but as he is on leave in Constantinople, having been invalided there with pneumonia and pharynx, Mr. Hamed Rasool is officiating for him. The other members of this section are Messrs. Ghulam Ahmed Khan, Hafiz Muhammad Yusuf Ansari and Ismail Husain Shirazee. This section has also two interpreters attached to it. Mr. Abdur Rahman Siddiqui himself is to remain in Constantinople where they have hired two rooms in order to store things not needed at present and where Mr. Abdur Rahman is to stay permanently. How he likes this work is best described in his own words: "I have to supply food to Omarli and Gallipoli now and it was thought very necessary. I wanted to go to Gallipoli, but the Director's despatch 'no' sealed my fate, and unhappily I am once more the same old Babu, and will not be able to serve the Turkish soldiers—the purpose for which I came." Well, we presume a permanent stay at Constantinople will not spoil the excellent uniform in which our former Manager has been photographed in Turkey, copies of which have been sent to us and a number of particular friends. He looks more fascinating than ever, and this should be at least some slight consolation to him in his splendid isolation. But banter apart, many a greater man than Mr. Abdur Rahman has had to sacrifice personal inclinations to the orders of his superiors, and we feel sure that Dr. Ansari has chosen the best man for the most indispensable although comparatively uninteresting work. We are also confident that whatever work Mr. Abdur Rahman has to do he will do with all his might. He will be going to Gallipoli for a day to establish connection and learn particulars about the best mode of sending provisions to the Gallipoli section. As he says, he is now a regular Quarter-Master-General. It is very interesting to know that the All-India Medical Mission has already proved its capacity for work and expedition, because the Mission was only informed at 2-30 that it must be on board the ship with its 350 packing cases by 5-30. "Imagine my horror and panic," writes Mr. Abdur Rahman. "It was raining and snowing and was as bitterly cold as you can imagine. But, thank God, we succeeded in taking our things on board. From Messrs. La Fontaine Bros. godown (They have been very kind to us and kept our things without any charge. They are an English firm.) we took the things to the wharf and from there by boats to the steamer. When Dr. Ansari embarked it was raining terribly and it was dark also. I am sorry I could take no photographs. They were all huddled together on a barge, and were being towed by a launch. That was the last I saw of them. I wanted to go on board, but Khaliq who had gone to bring a cart-load of food stuffs from the Hilal-i-Ahmar Anbar (Red Crescent Stores) had not come, and I had to go in search of him. I did not find him and, therefore, I hope he reached on board safely. The boat itself is rather an interesting one. It was once an English boat and is still called the Cambridge. It was taken from the Greeks and will now be utilised to take provisions to Gallipoli and to bring the wounded from there. It is given to the Hilal-i-Ahmar now. The saloons are good, but the ship does show signs of having received some shots. The section at Omarli is working. There are about 25 patients out of which 10 are surgical cases. The operations have been successful and the wounds are healing rapidly. The arrangements are to fill the hospitals at the base first and always leave room in the field-hospitals for emergencies. So, as long as patients can be brought to Stamboul they will be brought here. But we are going to get heavy work soon. I am sure there is going to be a decisive battle soon. May the Turks win!" As regards the war the Manager writes that the Committee of Union and Progress have appointed a Sub-Committee to supply us with authentic and completely reliable news. It seems that the news of the battle of Uzunkiuft was not authentic, but as Mr. Abdur Rahman writes, "it was not absolutely false." The number of the Bulgars killed was exaggerated by the Turkish Press. As regards the Bonds, he writes that Dr. Ansari had had several interviews with Talaat Bey who is the real worker behind the scenes. The Manager promises to ask Sheikh Abdul Aziz Chawish and let us know definitely what has been done about the Bonds. He was told that applications for these Bonds had been received by wire from Egypt. We regret to learn that the tents supplied to the Mission through the Rt. Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali, who had placed the orders with Maw, Son & Sons, were exceedingly bad and Dr. Ansari has decided to order nothing more from London. We have, therefore, decided to request Mr. Ameer Ali to return the balance of the funds we had deposited with him, as it would in every way be more satisfactory to purchase further equipment from Constantinople itself. We are sure that Mr. Ameer Ali did what one in his position was expected to do, and that the fault of supplying such defective tents lies entirely at the doors of the firm selected. Mr. Abdur Rahman encloses three Turkish Treasury receipts, one for £128-16-8 contributed to our Relief Fund by the shoe merchants of Delhi, and two instalments of £1,000 each for which we had ourselves purchased the drafts in December. We shall be glad to give inspection of these receipts to anyone who may care to see them. The Ottoman Red Crescent Society had also sent us an account of the work done by it which we publish gladly in these columns.

The All-India Medical Mission.

We have received through the India Office the following letter from

A Letter from Salonica.

Mr. Harry H. Lamb, H. M. B. Consul-General at Salonica, which we are sure will give the Indian Mussalmans some idea of the immense need for systematic relief work in that region:—"I have learned from the India Office, through the Foreign Office, that you have kindly contributed £100 for the Relief of Mussalmán refugees in this district, and that you are prepared to contribute a further sum of £500 for the prevention of death from starvation and exposure, on condition that it is made clear to the recipients of the relief that the money is being contributed by Mussalmán readers of the Comrade newspaper, and that you are furnished with a statement of the numbers relieved and the methods of relief employed. On behalf of the 'International Committee for the Relief of the Refugee' of which I am a member, I beg to thank you most heartily for your generous contribution and offer. The circumstances under which this committee was started were as follows—

Immediately after the first Turkish reverses in October last, the Muslim population of the regions bordering on Serbia and Bulgaria were seized with panic, abandoned their villages and fled south. This flight continued with the advance of the enemy until, on the entry of the Greek forces into Salonica, there were probably 45,000 collected in the town, many of whom remained absolutely without shelter, every available spare building being occupied. The town further had to provide accommodation for about forty thousand Greek troops, an equal number of Bulgarians and 25,000 Turkish prisoners of war. Several small committees were immediately formed for the supply of bread to the most destitute amongst the refugees, but it was speedily felt that something more was needed. The overcrowding and the insanitary conditions in which a large proportion of these unfortunate people were compelled to live resulted in an outbreak of disease, which constituted a serious source of danger not only for the refugees themselves but also for the town of Salonica. The International Committee was then formed, under authority from the Commander-in-Chief of the forces in occupation, to consider and advise the general sanitary and economic aspects of the situation. One of the earliest decisions of this Committee was that, in order to relieve the congestion and diminish the danger of epidemics, measures should be taken to assist the return to their homes of all such refugees as could easily and safely be repatriated and to establish a Refugee Camp outside the town for those who remained without proper lodging. The spread of small-pox shortly afterwards necessitated the establishment of a second camp of isolation in a different direction for segregation of those who had been in danger of infection. It is principally with these camps, and especially the former, as being the larger and more permanent, that the International Committee is now occupied. The Camp now contains about 6,000 refugees, in addition to whom there are 250 Turkish prisoners of war specially allotted for the maintenance and guard of the Camp. The supplying of bread and the strictly necessary amount of fuel to these people costs about £100 per diem, and as the Camp is perpetually increasing so also is the expenditure. The Greek Government has promised a grant at the rate of thirty centimes per head per day, which covers about half the expenditure. For the rest we are dependant on subscriptions, which so far have come in in just sufficient amount to enable us to carry on. We must, however, look forward to being obliged to maintain the camp for another two or three months and it is obviously very uncertain whether subscriptions will continue to come in at the same rate. As regards the repatriation of the refugees, it has so far only been found possible to send back a relatively small number to the districts occupied by the Greek forces, to places in the immediate vicinity of Salonica or on the railway lines. Between 2,000 and 3,000 have been sent to Smyrna, in addition to which the Egyptian Red Crescent recently shipped away to the same place about 260 convalescent soldiers and some families of Turkish officers and officials. The number of refugees in the city does not, however, appear to diminish in proportion to the numbers sent away. Fresh arrivals from the interior or persons hitherto accommodated in private houses and, therefore, not figuring upon any lists continually appear to fill up the places vacated, and I fear that this process is destined to continue and that we shall be faced with a Refugee problem for a year or more to come. With regard to your particular offer, it will, I think, be perfectly possible to satisfy your conditions, but you will see that, if your contribution is to be spent exclusively on food (for clothing is very little required, blankets have been generously provided and cash gifts are never tendered) it may be rather difficult to specify exactly which day's or which section's supply is the result of your readers' subscription. I have, therefore, thought that the matter might be facilitated if you would allow me to read into your conditions "prevention of death from disease" and specialise your contribution for the maintenance of the Camp Hospital, which we are just installing, and other medical expenses. I am commencing by expending in this way the £100 already at my disposal and, if you agree to my suggestion, will make it understood that the relief of the sick in camp is the special affair of the readers of the Comrade, taking upon myself the payment of the two Doctors and the chemist whom we maintain at the camp, and all expenses connected with the nursing of the sick, the burial of the dead and so on. At present there are already about 90 sick (including cases of small-pox, dysentery, pneumonia, measles, diphtheria, etc.) and unfortunately a mortality ranging from 5 to 10 per diem, the deaths being mostly amongst very young children. I shall be very glad to answer any possible questions, if the matter should continue to interest you."

As you pleased some of our Urdu contemporaries to publish without the least authority that can be found in their columns rumours of the capture of Soba by Enver Bey with the result that they have increased their own sales and our work. We have received no less than a couple of hundred reply prepaid telegrams, asking us to confirm the news published by our eminently shrewd contemporaries, and we have been forced, sometimes at some expense to ourselves on account of a larger number of words in the replies than paid for by the senders of the telegrams, to inform them that we have no news to give, and that we cannot undertake the duty of sending news to them by private wires. We are sure that these gentlemen mean well and, in fact, pay us the compliment of believing us to be the repositories and the distributors of authentic news. But like the majority of our countrymen, they are extremely thoughtless and would soon kill us with their kindness. As the Persian poet has it,

اے روشنی طبع تو برمن بلاشدی

(Oh, the brilliance of my intellect, thou hast become a dire calamity!) We would ask them to consider two questions. In the first place, why need we publish a weekly paper and a daily Urdu bulletin if we are prepared to act as a private news-agency for every one who chooses to send us a telegram or letter, or besiege our office with a request for news from Turkey? Even though our journalistic efforts are not commercial undertakings, surely we cannot afford to lose large sums by forestalling our publications with information privately communicated to every questioner. Why need the newspaper be bought if a telegram or an inquiry in person can elicit all the information that is wanted? Of course, it costs the sender of the telegram at least 12 annas, whereas the Hamdard daily bulletin can be bought for a fortieth of that amount; but the Hamdard bulletin when sold brings a grain or two of corn to the mill, whereas the telegram brings us nothing and costs us time and much trouble to our peons who are sent to despatch the reply. We are not a news agency, but a newspaper, but even news-agencies like Renter's and others do not supply news without charging something more than the telegraphic charges. Are we the only people who are expected to gain nothing and lose everything, in order to do our duty by the Moslem community? The second question to which we would invite the attention of our telegraphic questioners is whether they have ever considered how much time and attention we are devoting every day to the many undetected lies we have in hand without saddling ourselves with the additional duty of contradicting silly rumours published by newspapers whose one consideration is to make money out of popular excitement and curiosity. We do not grumble that such newspapers have a ready sale, but we are certainly entitled to refuse to accept the additional duty imposed upon us without the least consideration for our time, attention and expense. Many of the answers which we have recently sent to such telegrams have been somewhat caustic, and we are really sorry for having had to reply to them in this manner. But, in order to discourage such inquiries, the only other course open to us was to send no reply and waste the six annas for the reply which had already been paid by our questioners. We hope they will take to heart what we have said in reply to them and all that we write here, and we publicly state here that in future no such telegrams will be answered.

We were honoured by the receipt of an autograph letter from Mr. Channing Arnold which we take leave to publish in these columns. He writes from Rangoon just on the eve of setting out on a sea-trip to recuperate his health, and we pray to the Almighty that he will be his old self once more. "I write to thank you for your sympathy and efforts to have justice done in the McCormick case. I was released, as you are aware, by the spontaneous action of His Excellency the Viceroy, and until I was assured that the unsought remission would not militate against my right to appeal to the Privy Council I declined to leave jail. But during the ten days elapsing between the Governor General's order and my release telegrams of a reassuring character were received by us from London, and my lawyers were advised that I could not resist the remission but would expose myself to being treated as a trespasser in the gaol after the 18th instant; so I submitted to a so-called clemency most distasteful to me. The news of the admission of the appeal, and the stern remark of the Lord Chancellor, has been received here with profound relief and the thousands of people, Burmese, Indians and Chinese in the Province, who have been closely watching the case are eagerly looking forward to justice being at last done. My personal fate is of no account in this case. The principle involved is that which is the very basis of the justification for British dominance in the East—absolute justice in the King-Emperor's Courts. A deplorable impression would result if the Privy Council had declined to admit an appeal of such a kind. My imprisonment was a very wearying experience and has left me in a condition of nervous exhaustion. I had hoped to take up my daily editorial work and correspondence forthwith. But after a few days I have found this impracticable and am leaving to-morrow for a sea-trip and a stay "on the southern coast where I hope to recuperate thoroughly." Mr. Arnold has set a noble example to others in his profession which, we hope, will inspire them with courage and readiness to shrink from no sacrifice in the cause of duty. But this is not all. He has set a no less noble example to the British in India which should inspire them with a sense of duty to the Empire which, whether it may or may not have been won with the sword of Bellona, can only be maintained with the sword of Justice. That Empire is a precious possession to all within it, whether they be Indians or British, and its continuance demands from both the observance of the laws that ensure peace and progress. We have not been, nor shall ever be, remiss in our duty in condemning law-breaking, but whether an Indian Terrorist breaks that law or a British Planter or Civilian, the sword of Justice has to be kept equally sharp for both. H. E. the Viceroy, on the advice of his official advisers, has done what the Executive could do. The Judiciary of the Empire has yet to decide finally the question of Mr. Channing Arnold's innocence or guilt, and it would be a standing reproach to us if we left Mr. Arnold unassisted in proving his innocence in the highest tribunal of justice in the Empire. The number of our subscribers to-day is nearly 3,000, and if on an average each of those sent us even the insignificant sum of a rupee for the expenses of the appeal, we would feel that what we wrote about the McCormick and the Arnold cases has not been lost on three thousand men, whose love of justice and sense of duty to their Empire are second to none in the world. Readers of newspapers do not often demand from journalists the courage of heroes and the convictions of martyrs. But newspapers and journalists are mostly what the newspaper-reading public make them, and we should like to know more clearly than we do at present what standard of courage and convictions the readers of the Comrade wish to set for journalists in the British Empire. The Arnold Appeal is an excellent touchstone, and we are emphatically of opinion that none of our readers has a right to condemn any one connected with the McCormick and the Arnold cases who is not prepared to make even such an insignificant sacrifice as we have suggested.

At a meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, held on the 25th February, the Hon. Mr. Fazulbhai Currimbhoy Ebrahim asked if the Government would be pleased to state (a) the total expenditure from State revenues, (b) the total number of students, and (c) the number of Moslem students with reference to (1) Government Arts colleges, (2) non-Moslem grant-in-aid Arts colleges, and (3) each of the Moslem grant-in-aid Arts colleges. The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler could furnish the necessary information only as regards Government Arts colleges. The total expenditure in these institutions from State revenues was Rs. 11,64,697 in 1910-11, the total number of students was 6,178 and the number of Moslem students 2,803. As regards non-Moslem and Moslem grant-in-aid colleges, he could not give "reliable information, the great majority of such colleges being undenominational and open to Hindus, Muhammadans and members of other communities alike." The Hon. Member for Education seems to attach a peculiarly exclusive significance to the word "denominational," and no college, in his opinion, can be regarded as a Moslem college unless its alumni are exclusively and entirely Moslem. The Hon. Mr. Fazulbhai Currimbhoy Ebrahim, we feel persuaded, could have never imagined that a common and generally well-understood expression would be subjected to a love of academic precision. By "a Moslem college," for instance, one usually understands an institution under exclusive Moslem control and management, though it may be open for admission to students of any denomination in the country. We trust the Hon. Mr. Fazulbhai will respond to the fine sense of terminological exactitude displayed by the Hon. Member for Education and frame his question accordingly. The chief consideration is to get information on the important point of proportionate State expenditure, per student, on every grant-in-aid Arts college in the country, be it denominational or undenominational. Indeed, the information asked for is to some extent of the kind that the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler was pleased to give regarding the M. A. - O. College, Aligarh. "It was reported in 1909," said the Hon. Member for Education, "that the Mahomedan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh, would be in receipt of grants aggregating Rs. 26,400 a year when the Professor of Arabic reached his maximum salary." Now it may be stated that the annual expenditure of the college at Aligarh, which has about 800 students on its rolls, is about Rs. 1,85,000, exclusive of Rs. 35,000 spent on the school attached to it. The expenditure per student works out to about Rs. 309. According to the information furnished by the Education Member, the expenditure per student in Government Arts colleges comes up to about Rs. 189. It will be readily seen that the Aligarh College is proportionately spending much more on education than Government colleges, while the aid it receives from State revenues is not very considerable. There is a certain class of educational experts who measure efficiency by the scale of expenditure, though for our part we would very much like to know the cause of the greater costliness of education provided at Aligarh, especially in view of the fact that colleges maintained by the State are held out as models of efficiency to which all aided and unaided institutions are expected to conform. We wonder why the provision of an annual income at first of Rs. 600, and later, as a concession, of Rs. 500 per student was insisted on as an irreducible minimum for the Moslem University, especially when we remember that Government colleges only spent about Rs. 189 per student and not Rs. 485 as was incorrectly stated at the time. It is absolutely necessary to secure definite information as to the amount that is being spent on Moslem education from State revenues in any shape and form and determine its relative proportion in regard to the total expenditure on education in India. It would then be realised, we are fully persuaded, that the Mussalmans themselves are proportionately spending much more on their education, and that the expenditure on their education from public funds is not at all commensurate with the contribution that they make to the revenues of the State. Apart from the fact that the grant-in-aid to the Aligarh College is not adequate, we wish to make a few observations on a question of principle. As far as we can see grants-in-aid are based on the principle of allowing the fullest scope for the development of private enterprise in education. They are paid out of public revenues and involve the only obligation that they would be tightly and usefully spent. A feeling has, however, been allowed to get abroad that grants-in-aid are looked upon by Government as conferring on it a right to interfere in the internal management of the institutions that receive them. Such an interpretation of the principle would be altogether misleading and unjustifiable. Grants-in-aid are meant to foster education, to encourage private enterprise and not to strangle it. The Aligarh College receives grant-in-aid and the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces is ex-officio its patron, who enjoys certain well defined advisory powers according to the Rules. These two facts, however, do not stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect. Sir James Meeson in the course of his speech at the Central Hindu College, Benares, while defining his position to the Aligarh College, said: "The Aligarh College, in consonance with the wishes of its distinguished founder, has always had a close association with the Government. It receives grants from the public revenues, and the Lieutenant-Governor is ex-officio its patron. From its start the Hindu College has neither asked nor received direct assistance from the Government." We are sure His Honour simply wanted to emphasise the fact that, according to the wishes of the founder, the Aligarh College has always had a close association with the Government, and not that such association was a direct consequence of its receiving the grant-in-aid. If it were true that grant-in-aid can only be purchased by losing some measure of independence in internal management there would be a strong temptation to Mussalmans to do without it in all their efforts for the organisation and development of communal education. This would be most unfortunate, and we would be distressed to find that the chances for its growth are multiplying.

Much as we would like to earn the praise of the Pioneer which has at last found something to praise in the non official members of the Council, we regret we would prefer to know why a Bill such as the Conspiracy Bill must be published, presented and passed all in the course of some three weeks, and presumably without the benefit of the High Courts' opinion. Ever since British rule was established in India Conspiracy per se, except within well defined limits, has not been an offence. Was the divergence from the Criminal Law of England merely accidental? Even if so, could not a little more time have been given for a consideration of the Bill? To our mind the omission in the Penal Code appears to have been deliberate. Before we legislate, let us examine the merits of the proposed law not only as on paper but as likely to be administered in our courts. And we ask whether the same machinery for dispensing justice with the help of qualified judges and independent and educated juries exists in India as in England. Mere intention to do an illegal act or a legal act in an illegal manner, without any overt act in furtherance of that intention, should be made an offence only where truly English safeguards exist. We shall deal with the subject a little later also.

The Conspiracy Bill.

SHAIKH ABDUL AZIZ SHAWISH, our special correspondent, Latest News has sent us the following cablegram, dated Stamboul, 9th March, 6-40 a. m.:

About Peace.
"Interviewed Grand Vizier personally. Cabinet never cedes Adrianople, islands or Gallipoli. Negotiations coincide with reply to Powers' Note. Slight modifications possible. Mussalman interests in Rumeli and Macedonia safeguarded. Other statements false." After this we are sure none of us need put any credence in the State gossip that Renter has been wiring from day to day except as far as to believe that Bulgaria is most anxious for peace.

The Comrade.

The Financial Statement.

A MEETING of the Imperial Legislative Council was held on the 1st March to receive the Financial Statement from the Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson. The Statement is a record of another year of prosperity in the finances of India, as is evident from the large surplus that the Finance Member was able to announce. He claimed it as his good fortune that for a third time he was in a position to bear witness to the material well-being of this country. A year ago he framed his estimates on the assumption of a year of normal seasons and trade. "In looking back now over a period, the happenings of which it was then my duty to forecast, I shall have to describe a large improvement on our original estimates. The year that is drawing to a close has proved to be one of prosperity and plenty, the results of which have easily outrun anticipations consistent with the principle of caution which I have suggested as necessary in our financial prognostications." This principle of caution is based on the possibility of relapses "to which, by reason of its climatic conditions, India has always been subject." Whether these relapses are of such magnitude, frequency and suddenness as to justify rigidly conservative forecasts we will discuss later. There can be no doubt that the estimates framed on "the principle of caution" have often placed huge surpluses at the disposal of the Finance Member. It is worthy of note that the main agricultural features of the current year have not been abnormally favourable. According to Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson himself, for India as a whole the rainfall was little below normal, and the wheat crop of 1912, though in respect of area and outturn was greatly better than the normal, was inferior to the crop of 1911. The trade returns during the current year show a considerable expansion and, according to the Finance Member, they furnish a more definite and statistical test of the year's prosperity. The value of India's seaborne commerce in merchandise during the first nine months of the year amounted to about 296 crores as against 264 crores in the preceding year. "On every side," remarked Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson, "there are plain indications of a continuance of the progress and prosperity of this country. The effect of the conditions I have outlined is written large across our figures." He is, however, careful to note that the range of prices has been high, though he says that "I do not know that it is higher than in the preceding year, or consequently that the comparison I have drawn is misleading as an indication of the volume of trade."

The Budget for the current year was prepared for a revenue, Imperial and Provincial together, of £79½ millions, but according to the revised estimate it is anticipated that the figure will rise to £87 millions, an improvement of £7½ millions, of which £5 millions will be secured from Opium and Railways. It is estimated that the aggregate expenditure will exceed only by £171,000 that provided in the Budget. Large grants have, however, been distributed to provinces out of the Imperial revenues. After allowing for these grants, there remains a surplus of £3,362,000 as against a surplus anticipated in the Budget of £1,478,000. Apart from the Opium windfall of £1,463,000, the improvement in ordinary revenue has been £6,191,000, comprising increases under Railways, Customs, Mint, Post-Office and Telegraphs, Exchange and Irrigation. The great bulk of the improvement shown on a comparison with the Budget has been contributed by the railways. "In making my estimate under this head," said the Finance Member, "I was cautious, and it would ill-befit, in my judgment, a Finance Minister in this country to be otherwise; but I think the most irresponsible critic would have hesitated to predict that the development of traffic would prove so enormous as to constitute a crisis in railway management." The gross railway earnings have been almost £4½ millions above the estimate. The Finance Minister thinks he was justified in his caution as he could not obviously base his calculations on an expansion of railway traffic that has been incalculably enormous. The caution may have been justified. But as this caution represents the declared principle that lies at the root of the financial policy of the Government, it is permissible to examine its general propriety and wisdom.

It may be conceded, for the sake of argument, that the Indian finances are liable to sudden and great vicissitudes on account of the peculiar agricultural conditions as well as the general undeveloped state of the country. But even, in spite of these vicissitudes, the significant fact remains that there has been a steady and marked expansion in the Indian revenues year after year. This expansion has, of course, been due to the normal growth of trade and the general development of the country. With the growth of revenues the annual expenditure has, for various reasons, grown apace. Excessive prudence under these circumstances is rarely a virtue and may easily become an obstacle in the way of general progress and development. Beneficent measures for the well-being of the people need not wait till the financial experts have pronounced that the Indian finances have reached an ideal stage of stability. As long as estimates of revenues are framed under the shadow of abnormal periods of depression and expenditure is allotted on the assumption that the conditions would remain normal and favourable, the financial policy will lack the necessary elements of constructive statesmanship. To budget for as little a surplus as possible with the full certainty that the surplus would be enormous under normal conditions, may be admirable from the point of view of the financier whose sole business is to keep an equilibrium between receipts and disbursements, but it is hardly an ideal worth the efforts of a statesman aspiring to create a vigorous nation with powerful intellectual and moral equipment. As long as surpluses are more "fortunate" than anticipated, more in the nature of windfalls than the result of careful calculation and forethought, they will be applied neither to measures of public utility involving recurring expenditure nor to the alleviation of the taxpayer's burdens. The element of uncertainty that keeps the Finance Ministers of India from adopting wider outlook and bolder principles is itself a product of a nervous and timid policy. The Indian financial situation owes its instability mainly to the inadequate control that the masses of the people are able to exercise on the general conditions of their existence. Any measures that would raise their level of intelligence and capacity will correspondingly increase their powers to defeat chance and render their future position and prospects calculable. A Finance Minister of India who has the statesmanlike grasp of the situation, and is gifted with a long vision, will not hesitate to budget large and adequate sums for the moral and intellectual progress of the people as permanent and recurring charges on the revenues of the State. Thus, he will not only rescue the finances of India from the eternal dread of vicissitudes, but initiate a truly constructive financial policy and win the undying gratitude of the people. The Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson has, throughout his career, enjoyed the confidence of the Indian public and has never failed to express his sympathy with the hopes and aspirations of the people. His clear recognition of the claims of education and sanitation are a sufficient testimony that he is fully alive to the real needs of the country. But we are constrained to admit that, while dealing with the popular demands with sympathy and now and then with a measure of liberality, he has not been able to free himself from the notion that huge surpluses are an end in themselves. He has kept the finances of India in good order, but he has not laid the foundations of a constructive policy that would hasten the moral and intellectual progress of the country. "The great attention which has been paid in recent years to the needs of sanitation and education," observed Sir G. Fleetwood Wilson in the course of his statement, "has led to a systematic review of requirements and preparation of projects generally. So long as there is uncertainty as to the amount that will be available from year to year, progress must be fitful and uneconomical." The words we have italicised are pregnant with wisdom. We trust they will afford his colleague, the Hon. Member for Education, some food for reflection. We wish, too, that they had been of more practical use to him while framing his budget.

Much the greater portion of the improvement in the Indian revenues has accrued in the Imperial account. The Government of India do not propose, however, to retain all that has come to them; they would be generous and intend to make the provinces partners in their good fortunes. In disposing of his surplus the Finance Member has had to do much anxious thinking. "I have a large sum of money to dispose of," says the Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson, "we are unlikely to have again, for some time, a margin anything like so large as in the present year, and it is all the more necessary to be careful in the distribution of what is in our hands." It has been decided that the bulk of the money will go in grants to secure a steady progress in education and sanitation, "an object which has the support of both official and non-official opinion." The surplus is to be distributed by giving 2½ crores for non-recurring expenditure on education, 1½ crores for urban sanitation, 30 lakhs to Burma for communications, 20 lakhs to Assam for development and one crore in aid of general provincial resources.

As regards the Budget for 1913-14, the Finance Member estimates for a probable aggregate revenue of £82,322,000 and an aggregate expenditure of £83,850,000. It is estimated that the Imperial revenue account will be £3,612,000 worse under Opium, £594,000 worse under Railways, and £143,000 worse under other heads, while alienations of revenue would be £3,347,000 less. It may be noted here that the net expenditure on the military service during the year is anticipated to be £19,635,400 as against an estimate of £19,094,500. The estimate for 1913-14 is £19,646,800. The total capital outlay for the next year is estimated at £14,800,000. The other debits include the discharge of debt on account of railway debentures, the repayment of another £½ million India bonds and the deficit, which is estimated at £2,889,000, in the provincial account. Altogether about £10½ millions have to be found, and this the Government of India propose to do mainly by utilising their balances. They also propose to raise a loan of three crores in India.

The Finance Member dealt at some length with the question of opium, exchange, currency and gold coinage. In regard to the gold coinage Sir G. Fleetwood Wilson said that the view taken by the Government of India was a very simple one, and it did not involve any departure from their currency policy. All they proposed was that if anyone who had gold wished to have it coined, he should be able to do so. After putting in an eloquent and closely-reasoned plea for the establishment of a gold mint in India, the Hon. the Finance Member said: "The Council will appreciate that all I have said in regard to exchange, currency, and the coining of gold is subject to a reservation. I refer, of course, to the statement made in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister. Mr. Asquith has stated that in the opinion of the Home Government the time has come for an enquiry into (inter alia) questions of currency and finance relating to India by an expert body and preferably by a Royal Commission."

After referring to the significance of the Financial Statement, the forerunner of the Budget, having been presented, for the first time, in Delhi and to the glorious future awaiting the people of India, the Hon. Sir G. Fleetwood Wilson concluded with the following words:—"This is my last Budget and practically this day ends my career in India. I shall sever my connection with India with profound sorrow; but I rejoice exceedingly that I shall leave her loyal and prosperous." While differing from him in our views as regards the fundamental policy of the Statement we must congratulate Sir Gny on being able to produce another prosperity Budget. His administration of Indian Finance has been on the whole sympathetic; and his sad note of farewell will remind the Indian people that the official connection with India of one of their true friends is drawing to a close.

Ottoman Treasury Bonds.

WE CONSIDER it desirable to summarise the information which we have hitherto received about the Ottoman Treasury Bonds, and we trust this will be useful not only to our readers who intend to purchase these Bonds, but also to the various banks with whom arrangements have been made for the purchase of these Bonds.

1. The Ottoman Government is issuing Bonds to the extent of five million pounds sterling for purposes of national defence, in accordance with an Imperial ukûl of 19th January.
2. These Bonds are of different denominations, 10s., £1, £5, £25, £50 and £100 sterling, but it would be preferable if to prevent confusion, and to make them easily transferable, the banks would purchase on behalf of depositors Bonds of the lowest denomination only, i.e. those of 10s. or Rs 7-8-0.
3. These Bonds will be sent from Constantinople by the Ottoman Ministry of Finance against payment to any purchaser, whether he remits money direct or through a broker or a bank. As there is a likelihood of some delay in sending these Bonds to India, intending purchasers are requested by the Ottoman Government to accept the receipts of the banks where they deposit the money for the purchase of these Bonds in lieu of the Bonds themselves, and to authorise the banks to remit daily by telegram the amounts deposited to the Ministry of Finance without delay, and exchange the banks' receipts with the Bonds when the latter arrive in India. We understand that the French Bank—Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris—of Bombay has agreed to print a number of such receipts for Rs 7-8-0 each, which it is prepared to sell direct and through responsible agents pending the receipt of the Bonds in India. We invite other banks to do the same in order to facilitate the receipt of deposits for the purchase of these Bonds, and prevent all possible delay. Intending purchasers are requested to induce their banks to undertake this at an early date. We have no time at our disposal to press the many banks to do so.
4. The Bonds bear a bonus of 5 per cent. per annum accruing from 30th November, 1913.
5. The Bonds will be redeemed ex par within five years by annual instalments of a million sterling, the first lot being redeemed on the 30th November, 1918. This redemption of the Bonds will be made by the Ottoman Treasury and through the banks of foreign countries, the names of which would be published by the Ottoman Government.
6. At the time of redemption no deduction will be made from the amount of the Bonds for any taxes of the Ottoman Government.
7. The Ottoman Government reserves to itself the right to redeem these Bonds at any time before the expiry of the period of five years by payment of the principal sum and the bonus accrued to that date.

8. These Bonds are guaranteed by the Ottoman Government by a special land tax.
9. Ten coupons will be attached to these Bonds, five for payment of bonus and five for the repayment of the principal sum. Those who do not wish to accept the bonus may not present the coupons to the Ottoman Treasury or foreign banks for payment of the bonus; and those who do not wish the principal sum to be repaid to them may not present the coupons for the repayment of the principal sum.
10. The coupons for the payment of bonus will be acceptable throughout the Ottoman territory in payment of taxes like current coin.
11. The Bonds will be Bearer Bonds, and will be transferable from one holder to another without any registration of transfer by the Ottoman authorities, and payment of interest and the repayment of the principal sum will be made in return for the coupons to any one who presents them.
12. The following banks and their branches have undertaken to receive deposits for the purchase of these Bonds for an inclusive charge of 2 annas per cent. with a minimum of 2 annas for each transaction—
The Alliance Bank of Simla, Delhi.
Benares Bank, Ltd., Benares.
Karachi Bank, Ltd., Karachi.
Standard Bank, Ltd., Bombay.
People's Bank of India, Ltd., Lahore.
Punjab Bank, Ltd., Lahore.
Delhi & London Bank, Ltd., Amritsar.
Bank of Upper India, Ltd., Meerut.
Madras Bank, Madras.
Poona Bank, Poona.
The United Provinces Co-Operative Bank, Ltd., Allahabad.
The People's Industrial Bank, Ltd., Bahrach.
The Bharat National Bank, Ltd., Aligarh.
14. The Bank of Bengal and the Bank of Bombay, and their branches, have agreed to purchase these Bonds for an inclusive charge of two annas per cent, but with a minimum of Re 1 for each transaction.
15. The French Bank of Bombay—Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris—has accepted the purchase of these Bonds without any commission at all.
16. We take no responsibility for any bank, but having ascertained from various banks whether they would be prepared to do this business publish the list of such banks, with their conditions, as have shown their readiness to undertake this work. Every intending purchaser is not only at liberty, but is requested to make whatever arrangements he likes with any bank that he may find it preferable to deal with.

We trust the above information will be considered ample enough both for our readers and for the banks with which they may wish to deal, and we hope such of the banks noted above as have not yet sent the necessary authority or information to their branches will do so without further delay, and so would request them to advertise freely, especially in the vernacular papers, the fact that they are willing to do this business and the conditions on which they are prepared to do so. The majority of banks would probably wish the depositors to send a specimen of their signature for purposes of reference; but we trust they will make it clearly understood that they will hand over the Bonds when received in India to anyone who would produce their own receipt for the amount deposited with them, and that they would follow the example of the French Bank and sell at their own Head Office and Branches, and through responsible agents, their receipts for Rs 7-8-0 each, which would be exchanged with the Bonds by the receipt-holders when the Bonds arrive in India. We would once more urge intending purchasers to press this request on the banks with which they wish to deal, so that the work of sending money to Turkey may proceed without any further delay. The Banks should be urged to remit daily by telegram to the Ottoman Finance Ministry the total of each day's deposits. We also appeal to those who regard the Turks as their brethren to purchase a number of receipts themselves with a view to sell to others in their towns and districts so that their poorer and more ignorant brethren may not be deprived of the chance of lending money to the Turkish Government on account of any shyness in dealing with banks the business of which they do not yet understand. Once more we appeal for pushing this work as we feel sure that if a million, or even half a million, is sent from India within the month of March, the Bulgarians, who are an agricultural people and must revert to their homes to sow their fields if Bulgaria is to be saved from starvation and famine, cannot remain in the battlefield after the month of March. If at a critical moment like this the least avoidable delay takes place the sin of every evil consequence will be on those who could have avoided the delay and yet failed to do so.

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUR.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It.

When the Council met again on the 25th February an event of world-importance occurred. Let it be thundered out from the mouths of a hundred and one guns and chattered through the muzzles of a hundred thousand rifles. Waft it over to the four corners of the Empire, ye breezes of heaven. Hum it all over the world, ye wires that enmesh it in your wide-flung net. Carry it, ye æthereal waves of Cheatertonised Marconi to the furthest limits of the earth. Fling it, ye watery waves of the Marconi of Quetta, to the shores of five Continents, and roar it out, ye electro-magnetic throats of the Supermen of the Equator into the electro-magnetic ears of the Supermen of the two Poles. Suren, the hero of College Square, Suren, the darling of Beadon Square, Suren who had long been longed for, Suren who had sulked in his tent even when the Lord of Belvedere, boon companion of other days, had volunteered to make things smooth and brush aside technicalities barring the entrance to H. E.'s Council, Suren, the despair of Mahta and the envy of Moti Lal, Suren, the megaphone of mid Victorian oratory, Suren, the gramophone of Burke and Bright, Suren, the one and only crowned King of Bengal, had consented to grace the Council Chamber with his presence and had turned his footsteps from the capital of his realm to the seat of H. E.'s Government. As he stood there near the seat he was to take that day, a gaping crowd of non-officials gathered round him, and not to be outdone in adulation of the conquering hero. Bootlair Sahib, the debonnaire leader of the new Civilian School of Sympathy and Oudh Policy, walked up to him to welcome him home. The cordial sincerity of the meeting made angels weep in despair. Where, O, where but in burning Tophet could he had the warmth and glow of such a reception for the blessed when they trooped into heaven to him and hng the Cherubim and the Seraphim like long-lost brothers? While Bootlair Sahib welcomed the Hero of Bengal to Delhi and the Council, the ghost of young Hamlet whispered in the gallery: "The appearance of welcome is fashion and ceremony." When Sir Guy had taken the chair, Suren, anxious to swear his allegiance at the first provocation, got up to proceed to the table of St. Vincent, although it was the turn of the Mild Hindu to go to the confessional. When the Mild Hindu had done the deed, Suren marched up with a swinging and a steady step—as Nund Omar was said to have gone to the gallows—and, without flinching in the least, boldly and courageously, and in a clear voice, took the oath of allegiance. He swore like the best of loyalists and set the ghost of Hamlet atinking.

Is it not strange that Bengal's free-born son
But in a fiction, in a dream of feeling,
Could force his soul so to his own conceit
That from her working all his visage changed,
Forth in his eyes, submission in's aspect,
The mokest voice, with deep emotion touched,

Expressing folded hands and bended knees
And loyal neck in mute acquiescence bowed,
Fidelity's own true counterfeit and picture,
Voicing all this, and his whole function suiting
With forms to his conceit; and all for nothing.
For England!

What's England to him or what he to England
That he should swear like this? What would he do,
Had he the motive and the cue for faith
That Free-Lance has? Oh, he would flood the Council
With stream of oily words of loyalty,
And cleave official ears with fulsome speech,
Turn green the loyal and turn pale the free,
Convince C. I. D. and amaze, indeed,
Its faculty of million ears, no eyes

Having thus sworn his loyalty in final settlement of the morning's account of Civilian Sympathy, Suren, the anointed of Calcutta, took his seat on the throne of Delhi.

After him came Arbuthnot, Pince Nez in hand, walking leisurely as one that had studied

To throw away the dearest thing he ow'd,
As 'twere a careless trifle

He was followed by Robertson, and he by Khush-hal the landlord who took the oath twice in a month.

The swear words having been exhausted, at question time Fazoolbhai came in the garb of Peeping Tom to spy the nakedness of the arguments of S of S. which have cried halt to the Moslem University; but Bootlair Sahib all prudery and reluctant to publish the correspondence or make any statement about a matter which is and may always remain under discussion.

Sandow III moved that the Extradition Bill be taken into consideration. He was neither amazed nor moved when Bombay Cassandra prophesied evil, for he had supped full of dire prophecies of all sorts. Announced some concessions to clamour and then pronounced that further than that Government were not prepared to go. Bombay fears were baseless, and the good citizens of Bombay did not even know so long that their lives were at the joint mercies of Rajahs and Politicians.

Fazoolbhai was the picture of contentment when he rose to speak on the motion. Having succeeded not a little as success goes in Select Committees he echoed the sentiments of the feeble mendicant: "So de uska bhalá, jo na de uska bhi bhalá." (May he fare well who gives, and may he also fare well who does not.) Government had been obviously convinced of the necessity of checks, and that was a great point gained. But this not a new conviction. Where Native States concerned, Government had long been convinced of the necessity of checks.

This a mere positive degree of contentment. The superlative degree was reached when Free-Lance rose to deliver his pronouncement. It was a delight to see the gallant Tiwana Lancer taking the hurdles of "enunciate"—which was done successfully at last after several attempts—and of "equitabaly" and "expedious" which were cleared, as is evident, with nasty kicks. But the best sight of all was to see this self-styled "Gentleman" going out "to meet the wishes of the rest of the committee as far as possible." The rest of the committee creaked under a heavy load of gratefulness to Free-Lance for having "finally decided that it was not necessary for me to record a minute of dissent." But the gallant Tiwana still stuck to his guns and convinced Council that Government had been too anxious to placate Bombay's prophets of dire calamities. Political Agents were Daniels come to judgment and what they did not know about law and procedure was not worth knowing; nay, they were more competent judges than many magistrates in British India. Poor magistrates of British India! Wonder whether those contemplated were any shade except coal black. Bills should have been passed as introduced. In the exercise of his clemency gallant Tiwana allowed the amendments to be retained. So far the typed speech read out in the most approved form of the Third Standard; but the Free-Lance who can be always trusted to entertain the Council with a few extra turns not on the programme, launched into an impromptu description of the worries and lunge and train expense and multifarious other charges of sending witnesses to Bombay. They have got to "sow their crops et cetera," and giving evidence "awfully awkward." Council wondered what crop the et cetera were, and had the Hon. Member for Agriculture been examined not the least doubt that he would have been ploughed hopelessly.

The Public Services Commissioners in the gallery among the gods to witness the prowess of little tin gods and mere men below had seen excellent exhibition of Indian oratory and sure to be convinced that no long as India can produce its Tiwanas Indians were only fit for the posts of Lieutenant-Governors. But unfortunately for India Government had nominated the Bombay Duck as an expert on Moslem Endowments and he rose to ruin the character of India for loyalty and complacence. He made short work of "my friend the Hon. Mr. Tiwana."

The Oorya spoke with half an hour's interval between every sentence. He spoke for twenty minutes, and at the end thereof nobody knew whether Hon. Member was for or against the motion. Having had vast experience of Politicals he volunteered the remark that Politicals were mostly Civilian, and that there was no reason to assume that a Political was innocent of all law. If truth be told, he is very seldom guilty of it.

The Undesirable Alien very cross for being called upon to do anything more than to read the contents of his office boxes and files, and stolidly vote for Government. But as the matter related to Native States, and particularly as Politicals mostly of the same sort as the Undesirable Alien, found it necessary to get up and make his maiden speech. He first approved heartily the support of Orissa and then illustrated the Balance of Power which he maintained in the Native States. Where there was a bad judiciary, a Political fit for the Woolsock was posted; and where there was a good judiciary the one qualification for the Political was contempt for law instead of familiarity. He informed the Council that under the old rule Politicals were to find out if there was a prima facie case, by "judicial enquiry or otherwise." What a pity no one had hitherto known of the existence of the lovely phrase "or otherwise." Even now Council began to know how "or otherwise" was done. Was it the Bearer of the Ayah that was consulted on these memorable occasions, or was it simply an extra dance or a picketicking meet that decided "or otherwise"? Alas and alack for the unloveliness of things, for these lovely words will now no more decorate the rules of political procedure.

Sandow III "made a suitable reply," after which he rose again to move for the passage of the Bill. But the Bombay Duck came to the surface once more and blocked the legislative Suez with another speech. He explained once more the law on the subject, complaining that even without the amendment the old law was better. So he was inclined to take advantage of Rule 28 to move an amendment if no member opposed his doing so. Thus a somewhat knotty point of procedure. There had been a good deal of moving to and fro and turning over of the regulations between Sir Guy and St. Vincent and the Bombay Duck. But when the latter discussed his right to move an amendment, Sir Guy, careful of the dignity of the Chair, mildly rebuked Hon. Member for encroaching on his right to give a ruling on the procedure. Hon. Member had the right to move an amendment, but other Hon. Members had an equal right to bar his progress if they so willed. Before the Bombay Duck thought of exercising his right, and even before Sir Guy sat down after explaining the procedure, up rose the gallant Tiwana. Everybody wondered whether Free-Lance was going to lay down the law for Sir Guy and the Council. But Free-Lance after other games. He stood for a minute without uttering a word, then smiled benignly towards Sir Guy and the Government benches, and serenely said: "Sir, I am a member of this Council, and, Sir, I oppose the amendment." The Bombay Duck, not having moved one, went on in his own quiet way, but this time for the Member of Council, St. Vincent. Now on a point of order and curtly said: "The Bombay Duck has moved an amendment. The Free-Lance had objected to it. What more is there?" Sir Guy thought the Bombay Duck had not till then exercised his right of moving an amendment, and Bombay Duck confirmed this. So the matter ended by Sandow III rejecting his appeal. But although the Bombay Duck did not exercise the right given to him by law, and his appeal dismissed without further ado by Government, one person had all the same scored a point. That was the Free-Lance. His ledger of loyalty must surely be overflowing now.

When the Extradition Bill was safely through, the Dowager moved for the consideration of the Select Committee's report on the Official Trustee Bill, and as the motion was unopposed it was carried. Thereafter the Dowager, confident of an equally easy success, moved that the Bill as amended be passed. The motion was put to the House and carried. But just as the Dowager was rising to move that the Select Committee's report on the Administrator-General Bill be taken into consideration, Sitaji meekly informed Sir Guy that he had an amendment to move. Sir Guy, courteous to every man in India, would have been only too glad to have shown a great deal of chivalry towards one of Sitaji's sex. But the rules of procedure were too rigid for the code of chivalry, and Sir Guy was reluctantly compelled to catalogue Sitaji among the other of the two classes of virgins. "Too late, too late, ye cannot enter now." So the Dowager allowed to proceed, and pointed out the strong family resemblance between the first and the second Bill that he had charge of. Nothing unlikely, for was not the Dowager the mother of both, and matriarchy stands firm on the solid rock of a settled and indisputable fact. Sitaji was not going to be slow this time and had lighted the candle in very good time. If the Bombay Duck who could not have given notice of the amendment to the Extradition Bill was compelled to take advantage of Rule 28, notice or no notice, Sitaji could take shelter under the same protecting wing of the Council procedure. So he got up without the least delay to propose the amendment that Junkies and merchants should also be eligible for Administrator-Generals. Who could fling in his face the horrid inelastic rules of the Council now to defraud him of his amendment? Thus it was that the blow struck at him almost threw him off his feet completely for it was least expected. The Dowager, like his class, always unmerciful and severe to foolish virgins who were a little too previous, taunted Sitaji with the sweetly uttered remark: "You were a little too late a little while ago, but this time you have been a little too soon, my dear." Poor Sitaji as much disappointed as the ignorant ryot who waits at the railway station for long long hours for a passenger train only to miss it through ignorance, and to make up for it rushes into the next—only to find that she goes the wrong way. However, when the Dowager moved that the Bill as amended be passed, Sitaji, with greater courage of conviction than displayed by the Bombay Duck who only played with Rule 28, proposed his amendment in proper time at last. But, although the Dowager had no gallant Tiwana to come to his rescue like Sandow III, he did not like to take shelter behind technicalities and object to the amendment. So, with a deferential plea for greater regard for procedure settled for the proper conduct of debate, showed cause why the Bill should not be amended any further, and the Bill as amended by the Select Committee was passed.

After some more legislative business, Mild Hindu, looking milder still after his recent illness in his favourite land of the valley of the Lower Ganges, rose to move the resolution for the publication of the papers relating to the Government's primary education programme which had been announced with a flourish of trumpets by the latest Payet M. P. in the House of Commons, and belloyed out in a full-throated resolution by Bootlair Sahib. With customary tact, the Mild Hindu praised the resolution with several reservations. If the policy enunciated by Government was carried out in a strictly educational way, and no political bias was imported by Bootlair Sahib and his colleagues, there was hope of success. But the Mild Hindu seemed to forget that his Port Education the chief import was politics. He showed how often every 30 years the educational policy of Government was laid down, and thus raised Bootlair Sahib to the plane of Macaulay and the President of the Education Commission of 1883. For the benefit of a new Council gave a history of his efforts for primary education in the reformed Council since 1910. At first a modest resolution moved when there was no Bootlair Sahib, and Education rubbed shoulders with Police and Jails. Then a full-blown Bill when Bootlair Sahib had taken education out of the hands of the Police and the Jail authorities. But, although he had been in no hurry to slay, Bootlair Sahib had given the Bill its quietus all the same. He was opposed to compulsion, but the latest six weeks' expert had pointed on his behalf the vision of glory that was to be if instead of compulsion Government was permitted to work on a voluntary basis. However, the backbone of the millionists had failed to state how some the millionists would be.

coloured in. There was a programme, but it had several intervals, and the Mild Hindu wanted to turn the gas on the Kala Juggahs to know how the intervening time was to be passed. He was in no love with official correspondence. In his time he had waded through piles and piles, and at the end thereof he could venture to say it was often not very interesting reading, and it was not always instructive reading. But he was willing to wade through the mire of official correspondence in order to get sight of the goal which the Under Secretary thought would be reached after "a very considerable time" and which Bootlair Sahib's resolution located "in no distant future." No table of time and distances enabled him to judge what all this meant. This was an ancient land and to some Mathurals 50 or 60 years was not too much, whereas to the reformer-while-you-wait even 10 years was too much. He once more questioned the figures of the Sharp 'Un which the Under Secretary had repeated in spite of his protests. To him it appeared that at this snail's pace it may take anything from 30 to 75 years to reach the "no distant future." For so long he did not wish to wait, and pressed for a committal instead of mere promises. Wanted Education to rival the Army which marched on steadily, whether there was famine or no famine, opium revenue or no opium revenue, and at times broke into the double. This stern demand was mixed in the subtle manner of the Mild Hindu with the statement that he meant no offence and that Bootlair Sahib knew he meant no offence. Bootlair Sahib may go as Bootlair Sahib had come, but the bubbling brook of Indian agitation went on for ever. There must be a programme, and that programme must be produced. If not produced you may have some loopholes. There may be a Dragon in the path, the Dragon of another Department—and here Sir Guy smiled as if scenting the guilt of his successor—or it may be the Dragon of Higher Authority. Publish this programme, dear Bootlair Sahib, so that it may strengthen you in your moments of weakness. Mild Hindu believed in the weapon of compulsion, Bootlair Sahib in the armoury of voluntary effort. The Mild Hindu did not share Bootlair Sahib's beliefs, but he did wish more power to Bootlair Sahib's Samsonian elbow and all the Kokon and Tatchos and Har ones in the world to the Samsonian locks, especially in the aforementioned moments of weakness.

Bootlair Sahib waited for a time expecting further onslaught from other neighbours, but when none rose to speak he got up himself. But just after he had commenced, the Dowager pointed in the direction of Suren, and Bootlair Sahib instantly sat down. Suren initiated for the nonce the manners of Oudh Policy according to which Lucknow grandees prefer to miss a dozen trains rather than be guilty of stepping into one before their fellow passengers. He bowed towards Bootlair Sahib, and with courtly grace said: "After you, Sir." But if the Srijut wished to be after Government, Bootlair Sahib was even more anxious for Government being after the Srijut. So Bengal gave way, and Suren rose to deliver himself of his maiden effort in the Reformed Council. Mark Twain took great pride in describing the Coliseum in five pages without once quoting Byron's line: "Butchered to make Roman holiday." The Hon. Mr. Gupta in the gallery calculating how long the orator of Beadon Square could avoid "the Temple of Learning," but he had not long to calculate. In the very second sentence the Temple of Learning rose before his accustomed gaze. Said the obliging orator of Bengal, "the sacred Temple of Learning has no room for Politics." Did he not think even for a moment of his platitude of College Square? He established a new form of co-operative credit by linking up popular co-operation with Government's credit with people, and in his mid-Victorian style quoted Henry Sumner Maine about legislature doing the work of reclamation by filling the gulf between positive law and positive morality. After this he launched into a eulogy of the Mild Hindu's late lamented Bill in favour of which there was a vast mass of public opinion—not the Swadeshi manufacture of Bengal, but the genuine opinion of the whole of India. He was running on oiled castings at a furious pace when Sir Guy, reluctant but firm, drew his attention to the point in debate, which was not the corpus vile of Mild Hindu's Bill but the living issue of the publication of papers. This noted in much the same way as a sharp stone on the Delhi roads coming in contact with the tyres of a six cylinder Kalla-Royce, or a tiny air-pump as inflated balloon. The wind-puffed orator began to grow larger, and at last descended from the ætherial regions to the earth below. Suren sat down in less than a second or two.

Omney Chitais disinfected himself against a contact with the Mild Hindu, but showed the same curiosity for the educational programme. Rangbirsang did not wish to embarrass the Government, but laid down the dictum that woe cry creates, while publication will prevent uncharitable criticism. The Government were on the war path. "King Vicegerent of God on earth," "a few billions," and a few other such novelties were displayed, and then came a stream of metaphor which carried him into the region of the clouds. "The flies on its wings and carries on its wings even Government."

After this unexpected flood of oratory from all sides when Suren had burst the dam, Bootlair Sahib rose to reply. He thanked the Mild Hindu for the comparison with Manu and Hunter and then claimed the Mild Hindu as an ally. But he hastened to explain that the ally was a rather troublesome, and he might say a prodding and goading ally, in short, an ally of a certain well-known type so much beloved of the Politicals in these days. But it was of no importance to know whether Bootlair Sahib looked upon the Mild Hindu as an ally, 'twould be more to the point to know if the Mild Hindu looked upon Bootlair Sahib as an ally. It did not look like it when Bootlair Sahib, wrapping himself in the cloak of financial prudence, began to talk of fat years being succeeded in India by lean years and other general observations. How was it possible to be prudent in finance and still commit Government to a fixed expenditure on Education when in the fine phrase of Sir Guy the Budget was "a gamble in rain"? Hon. Members have short memories sometimes; but only in 1908-'09, the Budget anticipated a surplus and Government had to face a deficit of 9½ millions sterling. When a bad famine devastates the land, all the energies of Government have then to be devoted to the rescuing of human life and to the mitigation of human suffering. Did not Government devote all its energies to the rescuing of human suffering by spending in 1908-'09, the year of this unexpected deficit, £19,602,988 on its very human and lively and long-suffering Army, against £19,248,354 in the preceding year? Really and truly, Hon. Members have short memories in matters of finance sometimes—especially in matters of Army finance! Just at present it was specially imprudent to commit posterity. Was not the Nicholson Committee appointed to effect economies in the Army, and may it not, therefore, propose an increase? Again, had not India long complained of excessive expenditure on the Civil Service and recommended more extensive employment of Indians as an important factor in economy of expenditure? What more natural than that the Lord above who sat listening—whose presence in Delhi was—ahem!—welcome to Government—may shower some more shekels on the I. C. S.? Did not the gourmand when he suffered from fever repeat the well-known dictum of doctors, "Feed the fever and starve the cold," and when he suffered from the cold, did he not take shelter behind the equally well-known philosophy of the physicians, "Starve the fever and feed the cold?" And does not all this prove without a shadow of doubt that you can never provide more money for Education, for Sanitation is starved, and that you must not let Sanitation eat a crumb, for Education is famishing? And, again, what about Railways? Look at the Railway Sleeper there, contemplating the world with the dreamy eyes of the philosopher. Is he not any day as good as the best of pedagogues? All that is spent on railways is in reality spent on education, and the Sharp 'Un was arranging a table showing how many Schools, Colleges and Universities an open mile of railways equalled. If all this does not convince the Mild Hindu, let him question if he dare the fact of facts that in the last two years 71 lakhs allotted to Education have not been spent. You see, it hasn't the jaws of No-More-Kay's Department, and can't chew even what it is allowed to bite. What else can be done, then, but to throw away the dross to the Army, and load Education with the unalloyed gold of Sympathy? As for the argument of sweet Suren, how very unkind that such a common procedure—aye, Sir, it is common, as Hamlet said—as the refusal to publish the Imperial arcana should leave the Government open to the suspicion of want of confidence. Did Government publish the despatch of the 25th August, 1911, or the reply of the 1st November? These exhibitions are not good form, you know.

The Mild Hindu when he rose to reply was a picture of disappointment. Oh, why had he deposited his bunch of radishes on the grave of the Resolution of the 21st February, 1913? Couldn't he have it back again? But he would have his revenge. Bootlair Sahib had every right to commit posterity or to refuse to do so, but the Civilians were not on the bench but in the dock in the inquiry of Mild Hindu's Commission. Bootlair Sahib had no right to forestall the Commission's verdict. As for the Railway Sleeper, he may be another drowsing pedagogue, but he was paid out of the credit and not the cash, and Hon. Members had sometimes very short memories in finance. While Mild Hindu was still speaking sternly, St. Vincent foretold the weather without tapping the barometer, and took up the Division Lists. The result was not altogether satisfactory to the Mild Hindu, but it cheered his heart to see the gallant Tiwana dropping his lance to rest idly by his side when his constituents on the opposite side were sure that he would ensh it and go for the Mild Hindu for all he was worth. Really Moslem loyalty is as much a part of ancient mythology as Prosperous British India and the Benign Railway Guard.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

London, Mar. 1.

The prospects of peace are regarded as more favourable than at any time since the armistice at Tehtaldja. Tewfik Pasha called at the Foreign Office yesterday and was followed some time later by Hakkı Pasha. Diplomatic circles regard these visits as portending a more acceptable reply by Turkey to the Note of the Powers. No importance is attached to telegrams from Sofia stating that Turkey is endeavouring to treat directly with Bulgaria, because the Powers insist on negotiations being conducted with the Allies generally.

It is announced in Athens that a strong force of Turks was defeated after a six hours' battle to the northward of Janina, leaving 112 dead. One hundred and eighty prisoners were taken. The Greek losses were insignificant.

London, Mar. 3.

A Rome message says that the Turkish Ambassador has informed Marquis San Giuliano that Turkey places herself in the hands of the Powers with a view to the conclusion of peace.

Reports from other capitals indicate that similar action is expected. It is understood that the Powers will now seek to ascertain if the Allies are willing to accept the mediation of Europe.

The semi-official Norddeutscher Allgemeine Zeitung (Berlin), commenting on the recent speech of Marquis San Giuliano, says that it is clear that Italy is satisfied with the restored balance of power in the Mediterranean, but is determined that no important territorial changes shall occur without her co-operation. There is perfect agreement between Italy and her Allies on this question, continues the paper. Agreement is based on precise definition of the interests of Austria-Hungary and Italy in the maintenance of the balance of power in the Adriatic.

Djavid Bey with the Chief of the Cabinet, the Minister of Finance and Halidziz, ex-secretary to the Sultan, has started from Constantinople for western Europe. Djavid Bey, interviewed by Reuter, said that the party was visiting European capitals in a semi-official character to prepare the ground for certain financial operations and would make Paris its headquarters.

A Constantinople telegram says that in connection with the reported plot to overthrow the Government at the head of which was Lutuf Bey, secretary to Prince Sabueddin, an official communiqué says that the plan was to lead the mob to the palace and demand the dismissal of the Cabinet, the arrest of Ministers and their supporters and the appointment of a Cabinet to conclude peace on terms which would ensure the non-interference of the Powers for thirty years.

A Constantinople telegram states that the foreigners at Adrianople have not left. All are reported to be well.

London, Mar. 4.

A Sofia telegram states that the Minister of Finance has issued a memorandum pointing out that if the Allies as conquerors accept part of the liabilities of Turkey they do so in order not to prejudice the rights of others. The Memorandum declares that unless the Allies obtain an indemnity the fruits of their labours will be sacrificed and they will be financially burdened in favour of the vanquished.

The belief is growing in Vienna and Berlin that demobilisation on the part of Austria and Russia is imminent.

It is semi-officially stated in Sofia that the reply of the Allies to the Powers' offer of mediation will depend on Turkey's acceptance of the principle of the territorial demands of the Allies and the consent of Turkey to the payment of a war indemnity.

It is stated in Rome that the Allies' terms as a condition of the acceptance of the mediation include the surrender of Adrianople, Scutari and Janina, the fixing of the Bulgarian-Turkish frontier from Rodosto to Midias, the cession of Gallipoli and the Aegean Islands occupied by Greece, the payment of an indemnity, and the annexation of Crete to Greece.

A Trieste telegram states that the Albanians have risen against the Serbian occupation and that there has been fighting for five days. The Serbian garrisons at Tiray and Kroja have been expelled, and are fleeing to the coast. Communication with Scutari has been restored.

The Allies intend consulting one another before accepting mediation by the Powers, but they are likely to insist on the preliminary acceptance of their terms in principle. When all the parties have assented to mediation the Powers will probably prepare a draft treaty for acceptance by the belligerents.

London, Mar. 5.

In an interview the Grand Vizier denied that peace was imminent. Turkey had accepted the mediation of the Powers, but was not negotiating with Bulgaria direct. Turkey would refuse to pay a war indemnity.

An Athens telegram states that a Greek naval division bombarded Santa Quaranta, the port for Janina, annihilating the Turkish artillery. Troops were then landed.

London, Mar. 6.

The Powers have now approached all the Allies asking whether they are willing to accept mediation and have received the uniform reply that each must first consult the other Allies.

A telegram from Cotinje indicates that the proposal is regarded with distrust, and the opinion is even held that the Allies would rather treat with Turkey fearing that their interests would be prejudiced in the eagerness of certain Powers to assert their own claims in the Balkans.

Despatches from Constantinople indicate that the Government is reconciled to the surrender of Adrianople, but is resolute in resisting an indemnity. Government does not wish to negotiate directly.

It is reported in Athens that after the brilliant Greek victory at Janina the Turkish commander offered to surrender to the Crown Prince.

A Belgrade telegram describes the report from Vienna that the Albanians have risen against the Serbians as baseless.

An Athens message says that General Aontzo and three squadrons of cavalry entered Janina to-day. There is a great display of Greek flags in the environs of the city.

The Ransolian and Bagdad Railway Companies are advancing the Turkish Government three hundred thousand pounds on account of payments becoming due some time hence.

London, Mar. 7.

The capture of Janina is of great political as well as military significance as it has always been regarded as impregnable. It gives the Greeks the key to the Epirus and cannot fail to have considerable influence on the ultimate settlement between Greece and Bulgaria.

An Athens message states that the victory at Janina followed on two days' fighting in which the Greeks adopted a new plan. They withdrew their left wing and opened a terrific bombardment of thirty thousand shells against Bizani, silencing the enemy.

Meanwhile troops had rapidly advanced again on the left. The bombardment continued vigorously until Wednesday morning when the infantry stormed Bizani with indescribable suddenness and gallantry, routing the Turks. The Greeks then pressed on to Janina taking prisoners and guns, the Turkish panic being complete.

The Greek Chamber devoted the whole of yesterday to jubilation over the victory at Janina which is the first fortified town taken by the Allies during the war.

The Crown Prince's telegrams, which were read, stated that the whole of the Turkish garrison in Epirus, numbering 80,000, was included in the surrender.

Deputies afterwards walked to the Cathedral where the Te Deum was sung. The streets were thronged and in the evening were illuminated.

A message from Salonika to the Times states that relations between the Bulgarians and the Greeks are becoming very strained, and that a regular battle occurred recently between troops, a number being injured. The message adds that the situation in Salonika district is fast becoming impossible.

The Meeting of Ambassadors.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, Feb. 7.

THE New Free Press dates from London an ostensibly diplomatic account of the work hitherto done at the meeting of Ambassadors. Four main questions, it says, are before the meeting—the delimitation of Albania, the Aegean Islands, the financial arrangements, and the future of Salonika. With regard to Albania the original intention of taking the absolute majority of the population as a basis for the delimitation has been abandone, and the principle of a three-fourths majority proposed—that is to say, that only those towns and villages shall be recognized as Albanian in which three-fourths of the inhabitants are Albanians. Though Austria-Hungary has not yet accepted this principle an agreement will probably be attained.

When the frontiers of Albania have been fixed the meeting will have to consider what Adriatic harbour shall be set apart as an outlet for Servian trade. The Ambassadors will define the guarantees of free transit to be given to Servia. This point is likely to be reached in a fortnight or three weeks. Direct Austro-Servian negotiations will then begin and Austria-Hungary will put forward her demand for guarantees from Servia that Austro-Hungarian trade shall reach Salonica undisturbed. These guarantees will be analogous to those granted to Servia by the Powers and will be settled directly between Austria-Hungary and Servia.

With regard to the Aegean Islands* the principle contemplated is that the four strategic islands, Samothrace, Lemnos, Imbros, and Tenedos, shall remain Turkish, whereas Thasos will become Bulgarian. Lesbos, Chios and Samos will be autonomous under the suzerainty of the Sultan. All other islands will become Greek.

On the subject of the Turkish debt an international commission will probably be convoked at Paris. The Ambassadors will revise also the decisions of this commission. The question of the Orient Railway is still in process of examination. It is likely to be settled by expropriation. The question of the Turkish Customs is complicated and will require to be treated partly by the international commission in Paris, and partly by direct arrangement between the Great Powers and the Balkan States.

The Ambassadors will not approach the subject of Salonica until the Balkan Allies begin to partition their booty. If Bulgaria and Greece are unable to agree in regard to the future of the city, the Ambassadors will take up the matter, and Salonica, with a sufficient Hinterland, will probably be internationalized.

Second Phase of the Campaign.

The absence from the theatre of operations of independent British eye-witnesses reduces us to the familiar process of conjecture, and we have to make the best we can of official and semi-official news, part of which is certainly intended to mislead.

From the general point of view it is fairly clear that Bulgaria is making her main effort against Adrianople, covering the siege by two groups of forces, one of which faces the Tchataldja lines while the other has the mission of imprisoning Fakhri Pasha's troops in the Gallipoli peninsula. Bulgaria has utilized the period of the armistice to place the whole of her strength in the principal theatre, but has not apparently accepted any aid from her allies, over and above what Servia already has given, towards the conclusion of the war. This aid has certainly been offered, and Greece on two occasions is believed to have been ready to send 50,000 men to Thrace. The refusal of this aid, presuming it to be a fact, shows us once more the limitations which beset the operations of allied States. Greece and Montenegro continue to devote all their strength to the attainment of secondary ends in the secondary theatre, and Bulgaria takes upon herself the burden of concluding the war with such assistance as she receives from the 45,000 Servians who hold the eastern section of the lines which encircle Adrianople.

ADRIANOPLE.

The Drina and Morava divisions of the Servian Army are believed to be holding this line from the Arda on the south nearly to the Tundja on the north. At this point the 11th Bulgarian Division, consisting of two brigades, takes up the line, which is continued southward, by one brigade of the 9th Division and by three brigades of the 10th Division. The strength of the besieging army is probably between 90,000 and 100,000 men, but the number of heavy guns is said not to exceed 120. The Turkish garrison consists of the 10th and 11th Nizam Divisions, the 4th and 14th Rifle regiments of Nizams, and three Redif divisions, making a total of 40,000 to 45,000 men after deducting the losses incurred during the war. In the possession of the Turks are 250 heavy guns, but whether the supply of ammunition is holding out is a doubtful point, and various reports are current concerning the amount of supplies within the town. Except that the bombardment of the town and forts continues, there is no trustworthy account of the character of the operations, nor even definite mention of the front of attack where the Bulgarians hope to secure a decision. Statements that the place would fall in a few days have been made every day for weeks past, but we still await definite information that the close attack has begun, or progress that the fall of the fortress is impending.

THE LINES OF BULAIR.

During the first phase of the war the 2nd and 7th Divisions of the Bulgarian Army were detached in the secondary theatre, and played their part in pegging out claims at Salonica and elsewhere. As a consequence the main armies were left too weak in the principal theatre, and the war, which might have been terminated by a vigorous and decisive operation, has to be recommenced. These two divisions have been concentrated in front of the Bulair lines during the armistice and have been formed into a Fourth Army under General Korachoff, lately commanding the 2nd Division. This army has been engaged since hostilities were renewed in driving back into the Gallipoli peninsula those parts of the Turkish forces which had ventured outside the lines, and it is probable that Kovacheff's troops are now in occupation of Kavak and the high ground to the south of it, in which position they appear to have resisted very successfully on Saturday last an attempted sortie from the Bulair lines. A Turkish force, probably the Tenth Corps, left Constantinople and Ismid in 20 transports last Friday evening, but arrived too late on the scene of action. Troops were landed at Sharkeni, but were attacked and repulsed.

Whether any serious attack on the Gallipoli peninsula is intended is not a question that can at present be answered. Such an attack is practicable if Kovacheff is aided by the Greek Navy and by a body of troops brought by sea, to land under cover of the Greek ships on the northern shores of the peninsula. On the other hand, the Turks have command of the Sea of Marmara, and could not only make an advance by the Fourth Army along the narrow peninsula a costly business, but could detach troops from the main Turkish Army to attack the Bulgarians in flank and rear. It is possible that the Koracheff has fulfilled his immediate mission by the success already gained, and that his chief anxiety now will be to prevent interference with his plans by a Turkish force which might be thrown ashore with the object of attacking him in rear. The defeat of such a landed force is, however, primarily the concern of General Savoff, who has probably so distributed his main armies that a force may be rapidly detached to checkmate any operation of the kind.

THE TCHATALDJA FRONT.

The First and Third Bulgarian Armies now facing the Tchataldja lines include the 1st, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 10th, and part of the 9th Divisions, making a total of seven divisions with not less than 18 brigades, representing an available strength of between 180,000 and 200,000 men. There is no sign that any attack on the Turkish lines is intended. Tchataldja town has been burnt and the Bulgarian troops have been withdrawn from immediate contact with the Turkish Army. They have probably selected and intrenched a series of positions to assist them in resisting a Turkish attack, but their main object, as already indicated in these columns, is to attack the Turkish Army if it ventures to dishearten the enemy and bring him, to a yielding mood. Without much risk and heavy loss an attack upon the lines cannot be begun until the fall of Adrianople sets free the siege train of the Allies.

THE TURKISH PLANS.

The initiative, though in a limited sense, is thus left to the Turk. On Friday last Izzet Pasha appears to have despatched three columns from the lines to reconnoitre the enemy, and the prompt repulse of these columns will have opened his eyes to the meaning of the Bulgarian retreat. If the Turks pretend to reverse the verdict of the war they must take heart of grace, place every rifle in line, and risk a general action. A reasonable preliminary operation would be to win a blow at the Fourth Bulgarian Army, which is somewhat exposed. This has apparently been tried and has failed. We have, in fact, no assurance that the Turkish staff is capable of conducting an operation of this kind with the requisite celerity and science, and as the Bulgarian armies hover over the Turkish troops and watch all their movements, the element of surprise cannot be counted upon. The Turkish forces in the south are as strong numerically as the enemy in their front, and success is not in principle beyond hope; but there is nothing to show that Turkish leading organization, or spirit will allow Izzet Pasha to take advantage of the openings which the relative situation of the contending armies for the moment presents to him.

Disposition of the Turkish Fleet.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Feb. 6.

It is difficult to obtain exact information with regard to the movements of the Turkish fleet, but it seems certain that the battleship Mennuliyeh shelled the Bulgarian positions opposite Tchataldja with her 9.2-in. guns last night, apparently from off Derkös. The battleship Assari-i-Tught with two destroyers is lying off Kadı Koni. The cruiser Medjidiyeh is said to be in the Black Sea. The battleship Hamidiye was last reported from Jeddah, which port she visited partly for political reasons, partly for the purpose of coaling. Her commander has informed the local authorities that he intends shortly to return to the Aegean. The battleship Torgut Reis is said to be observing the Bulgarians at Rodosto.

Although the weather has been fine for the last two days, the saturated condition of the ground between Tchataldja and the Bulgarian positions must prevent any advance on either side for some days to come. The Bulgarians seem to have fallen back out of range of the Turkish artillery, after burning two villages which might have served as cover for a Turkish advance. Meanwhile the whole of the force concentrated at Ismid, Mudania, and other points on the Sea of Marmara has embarked and left for an unknown destination. This force will henceforth be known as the Tenth Army Corps, being composed of part of the troops belonging to the original army corps bearing that number. Hurshid Pasha is believed to have taken command of this force, with Enver Bey, who is currently reported to have taken a vow of death or victory, as his Chief-of-Staff. A small force of Kurdish irregulars is reported to have landed yesterday near Midia with the supposed object of raiding the Bulgarian communications. No attack has yet been made on Rodosto.

Ottoman Finances.

FINANCIAL activity in Turkey has entered a new stage since last week's issue of The Near East, but it cannot be claimed that it throws any light on what is to be the ultimate outcome of pourparlers, denials, rumours, conversations and the like.

Foremost, of course, is Hakki Pasha's errand to London. Count Leon Ostrorog, in a wire from Constantinople published by the Daily Telegraph, states that "in certain diplomatic quarters Hakki Pasha's mission is associated with the belief in an imminent rapprochement between England and Germany relative to the settlement of the Eastern crisis." The same writer adds—and apparently from an inspired source—that the journey has another object. "It will be remembered," he writes, "that towards the end of Turkey's Note to the Powers, the Porte, in exchange for its last concessions, asked the Great Powers for certain economic facilities, and also for the discussion of the capitulations, with a view to their progressive abrogation. If one adds to these matters the question of the Baghdad Railway, one will have a highly probable programme of the questions about which Hakki Pasha will engage in conversation."

Not less important than Hakki Pasha's journey is France's refusal to participate in an advance (which has consequently been postponed) of £1500,000 to the Ottoman Government for the payment of Government officials. London and Berlin agreed to the advance, and instructions were accordingly wired out to the representatives of British and German finance in Constantinople, but the French representatives received instructions of a negative character, the plea being that such an operation would be a breach of the neutrality proclaimed by the French Government. Why should it be in the case of France and not in the case of England and Germany? It will be asked. It was also suggested that perhaps France's real motive was a desire to see in the first place the definitive conclusion of an agreement with regard to the prolongation of the Tobacco Régie, but "the French financial authorities reply with a categorical denial." What, then, is France's motive? In the City theiddle is being eagerly discussed, and it is generally admitted that it would be interesting to know why France really objected to the advance. For, after all, with England and Germany participating, the advance was more in the nature of a banking operation, pure and simple, than of a loan in the ordinary sense of the word. It was remarked, in this connection, that at least one Balkan State recently visited Paris in the guise of borrower—The Near East.

The Turkish Debt.

Paris, Feb. 17.

UNDER the presidency of M. Goltz, of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, a Commission, composed of the Councillors of Embassy representing the Great Powers, together with representatives of the French Ministry of Finance, has been discussing the question of the amount of the Turkish Debt which will be transferred to the Balkan States when they are finally installed in the territory conquered from Turkey in Europe. These preliminary deliberations having been completed, the French Government has invited the other five Great Powers to unite their Ambassadors in a financial conference in Paris, over which the French Foreign Minister, M. Jonnart, would preside. It appears to be contemplated that the amount of the Turkish Debt which would be transferred to the Balkan Allies would be between £16,000,000 and £18,000,000 sterling. It is evident that the Powers cannot yet discuss the distribution of this transferred financial burden among the different Balkan States as it is not yet known what extent of territory, hitherto Turkish, will be annexed by each of them. It is certain that each State, in addition to its share of the Turkish Imperial Debt, will also have to undertake the burden of those obligations which are connected with the various enterprises in their new territories and with the guarantees for the interest on capital sunk in railways which pass through these territories.

[TO THE EDITOR OF "THE OUTLOOK."]

SIR,—As a citizen of that mighty Empire which has the unique distinction of claiming the allegiance of four hundred million Orientals, of whom fully one quarter are Mussalmans, and as a British-Indian Muslim who has the proud privilege of looking upon the Empire not as a purely alien institution destined to perish with the decline of British prestige, but as a political structure in whose stability Mussalmans are as much interested as Englishmen, I feel it is time that I should describe to the great British public the extent to which the feelings of Moslem India are being exercised as a result of the merciless campaign of extermination against Muslim lands that commenced with the descent of Italy upon the Tripolitan coast and has culminated in the sanguinary horrors of Balkania. My object in these lines is to remind the people of Great Britain of their obligations towards the seventy millions of Mussalmans whose devoted attachment to the person and throne of the British monarch, and whose admitted claim to be regarded as an important factor in determining the course of British Imperialism should entitle them to a voice in the councils of the Empire. The Mussalmans of India feel that as a part of that great whole which is called the British Empire they have a right to be heard on problems affecting the destinies of their brethren-in-faith abroad.

An Indian Muslim looks upon the British Government as a divine dispensation, and as such it inspires him with a feeling bordering on reverence. He also regards it as a tolerably fair substitute for a Muslim Government, and as such he expects it to discharge the functions which in his mind are associated with Muslim rule. To reconcile himself to the notion of perpetual British supremacy which has come to be regarded by him almost in the nature of things, all that he requires is this, that the British Government should cultivate friendly relations with the surviving independent Muslim State, which in his case—such is the constitution of Muslim mind—supply the void created by the absence of a free and unfettered Muslim sovereignty in India.

Such is the attitude of the average Indian Muslim towards British rule, and unless British statesmen are so shortsighted as to reverse the traditional policy of England and, regardless of the cherished susceptibilities of a hundred million loyal Muslims, embark on a course of open and reckless hostility against Islam, the attitude is sure to be indefinitely prolonged. An Anglo-Turkish entente would create for the Mussalmans of India a political environment of ideal bliss. Even the neutrality of England shorn of its benevolence would still ensure the traditional loyalty of Muslims whose good sense in making allowance for the exigencies of Imperialism will feel that in dissociating herself from those who are bent upon the destruction of Islam, England is at any rate respecting the sentiments of her millions of Muslim subjects. For an England whom they regarded, if not as an active at least as a passive ally of Muslim States, the Mussalmans of India would continue to shed their life-blood. But the moment they felt that England, whom they regarded as the friend of Islam, was openly fraternising with the avowed enemies of their Faith a disillusion is bound to follow.

With infinite sorrow I am constrained to confess that as a result of the sanguinary events of the last two years, which have spread misery and desolation from the valleys of Morocco right up to the steppes of northern Persia, the Mussalmans of India are just now in the throes of such a disillusion. The unfortunate conviction is dawning upon the minds of millions of British Indian Muslims, that England, who with her unlimited resources could have easily prevented this vandalistic scramble for Muslim territory, which is a disgrace to Christian civilisation and the law of nations, began with conniving at the misdeeds of the Italian Corsair and ended with openly espousing the cause of the Balkan bandits. The frightful toll levied upon Muslim blood by the so-called champions of the Cross and the disgusting horrors perpetrated in the name of Christianity might have been neutralised by a single frown on the brow of Britain, and the Mussalmans of India are struggling against the sickening sensation that "the Policeman of the World" permitted the butchery to go on under his very nose.

As a publicist having control of a Hindustani vernacular daily with the largest circulation in India, I am in touch with Muslim feeling in England's great Dependency, and accordingly I am in a position to declare with some authority that the policy of the present British Cabinet, in so far as it affects ultra-Indian Muslim interests, is giving rise to grave discontent. People here in England are not perhaps aware of what is going on in India as a direct consequence of England's strange participation in what, according to the Saturday Review, may be called "the immolation of Turkey." The great living heart of Islam in India has been stirred to its innermost depths as it has never been stirred before. As day after day news reaches India of the massacre of Muslims, irrespective of age and sex, with the silent approval, so it would appear, of a united Christendom, the mind of the Indian Muslim grows distraught and distracted. They are seized with an intense loathing of the atrocious cynicism which helps in raising hordes of their innocent co-religionists. In a paroxysm of anguish they appeal to their Government, in the name of humanity, to put a stop to all this wanton bloodshed. But their appeals go unheeded. They are told that the Government are unable to do anything as their hands are forced by the International Law of Neutrality. This very nearly drives them to the verge of desperation, and but for the tact and sympathy of Lord Hardinge, whose statesmanship, by permitting them to raise subscriptions for the aid of the sufferers from this twentieth-century crusade against Islam, has created a safety-valve for the desperate mood of Muslims, there is no knowing to what grave developments India might have been exposed. As it is, meetings are being held all over the country loudly protesting against the fanaticism of Europe, sympathising with Muslims in distress, and calling upon England to sever her connection with the tormentors of Turkey. The demonstration of sympathy has been universal, and its manifestations are so genuine, so multifarious, and so practical as to furnish the far-sighted British Imperialist food for serious reflection. All sections of the Muslim community have rallied to the call of Islam in this dark hour, and loosened their purse strings with unstinted liberality although it is the poorer class which has chiefly replenished the Red Crescent coffers. It does one's heart good to see a poor widow, a helpless orphan, an indigent beggar, giving away their little all, in the pious hope that perhaps their humble contributions will go just a little way towards alleviating the sufferings of those whom a kindred faith has made to them as dear as kinsmen. The conduct of a penniless Muslimah of the wild northern frontier who, for lack of ready money, subscribed her nine-months old babe to the Peshawar Red Crescent Fund and had the satisfaction of seeing it put up to auction for £60, gives an index to the feeling of Muslim India over the anti-Islamic campaign of Europe in the Near East. Branches of Red Crescent for raising funds in aid of the Turkish sufferers from war have been established all over the country, and within the last two months nearly £200,000 have been collected. Two medical missions have been equipped and sent out from India, and it was a member of one of these missions who is reported by the Constantinople correspondent of the Daily Telegraph to have harangued a street meeting on the day of the great coup d'état and assured them that India was heart and soul with Turkey. Thousands of Muslims have been anxious to proceed to Turkey as volunteers, and only their imperfect knowledge of the Law of Neutrality has hitherto prevented them from leaving the shores of India and joining their Turkish brethren in the defence of Islam.

All this must be quite new to the British public, as the English Press, which alone could have enlightened the people of this country as regards happenings in India, has on the whole been strangely indifferent to the situation. It is a mistake to suppose, as the leading papers in this country seem to have supposed, that the Turkish question is a purely Ottoman question which can be solved by quashing or oppressing Ottomanism. The question has a wider aspect. It is the question of Islam, and as such it is bound to react upon India, which has the largest Muslim population of any country in the world. Great Britain is, therefore, directly interested in its equitable solution, and politicians or publicists who advocate the dismemberment of Turkey ignore the stupendous stakes Great Britain has in India. The anti-Turkish and, on the whole, anti-Islamic policy of Sir Edward Grey has already done much harm. Discontent is fast spreading among Indian Muslims, and the latest move of the British Foreign Office in the matter of violating its plighted neutrality by subscribing to the Collective Note of Europe, which is openly partial to the allies and stoutly hostile to Turkey, has only made matters worse. There is no such thing as International morality. Of that the Mussalmans are certain. Europe is adept in the art of making its own words. It has torn its treaties at will. It has violated its plighted truth whenever it has suited its convenience to do so. But then we have been accustomed to regard England physically and morally as something distinct from Europe. Not only her insular position but her unique love of justice and fair play has justified our belief in her exalted idiosyncrasies. Sir Edward Grey, by jumping from neutrality to partiality, has given a rude shock to the implicit faith which Muslim India had for half a century reposed in the unchallenged probity of England.

But just as England is not Europe, so Sir Edward Grey, or the party he represents, is not England. On behalf of Muslim India, I appeal to the people of England in the name of the glorious traditions which have made the name of this small island, all the world over, synonymous with all that is good and just, to vindicate this fair name by rallying to the standard of justice and fair play. England, if she means to remain a World Power, must set inflexible justice above every other consideration. It was moral ascendancy that made her great, and by virtue of the same attribute she will retain her greatness. This greatness just at present is jeopardised by a line of diplomatic conduct, which for fear of indulging in a harsher term I will simply describe as un-English.

John Bull, as we Indian Muslims understand the brawny old gentleman, has always been a protector of the weak, an emancipator of the oppressed, a redresser of wrongs, an impartial judge, and above all a stern and inflexible holder of the ring during a combat. But of late he seems to have fallen into questionable company. His "splendid isolation" kept him unsophisticated and therefore Nature's Western masterpiece. Now he has taken to alliances and ententes and the foul environment is beginning to tell upon him. "A fair field and no favour" which used to be the guiding principle of his conduct is now being expunged from his moral code. His quondam friend and ally the Osmanli is in the grip of four assailants, but instead of holding the ring to which he was pledged by his oft-repeated protestations of neutrality, he makes common cause with a number of hooligans who show their cowardice by taking up cudgels on behalf of four sturdy allies against the weak solitary adversary. Will John Bull make one supreme effort to annul the unholy alliances that he has contracted and become his pure self again?—I am, Sir, Yours &c,

The Atrocities and the House of Commons.

MR. WALTER GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds Opp.) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the 18th Feb. whether he had any official information showing that after the occupation of Prierend the Serbian troops set houses on fire and shot men, women, and children as they ran out, and that the massacre was estimated by various refugees to have amounted to between 500 and 600, whether he had any official information showing that when the Serbian troops occupied Lyuma they tied women and children together, saturated them with petroleum, and set them on fire, besides stripping many men and stabbing them to death with bayonets, and that the total number who thus perished was estimated as between 500 and 600, whether he had received any report from the Consul-General at Salonica as to the statement that the Greeks tied together 75 Turkish prisoners of war and drowned them in the River Vardar, whether he had any official information showing that the Greeks massacred many Albanians at Prishtina and executed many of the most prominent Albanians and Kutzo Vlach inhabitants of Karafena after so-called trial by Court-martial; whether his attention had been drawn to the report of the Comité de Publication des Atrocités des Coalisés Balkaniques, which gave particulars of a massacre at Serres in which at the lowest estimate, 1,700 Turks perished; and whether his attention had been drawn to the report of the Comité de Publication des Atrocités des Coalisés Balkaniques, which stated that, during the first 48 hours of the occupation of Strumitza, by the Bulgarian troops, 84 Moslems were massacred, including two old men and five children; that after the departure of Colonel Mitoff, the Bulgarian Lieutenant Volcheff, the Serbian Commandant Ivan Gribitz, the Komitadj Chief Tshacof, and four others, were constituted as a tribunal, and condemned and executed 521 persons during 23 days, in most cases by bayonet stabs or after some horrible mutilation; whether he had any Consular reports confirming these statements; and whether he had any information as to the punishment of those responsible for such atrocities.

SIR E. GREY—I would propose to take the six questions standing on the hon. member's name together. As regards the first four, concerning events alleged to have occurred at Prierend, Lyuma, on the Vardar, and at Prishtina and Karafena, I have received no information from any official source bearing out the statements made. As regards the last two, relating to outrages alleged to have been perpetrated at Serres and Strumitza, the report of the committee referred to has not come under my notice. I have, however, received Consular reports containing statement substantially the same, though naturally not based on personal knowledge. The hon. gentleman is already aware from replies returned to him on the 16th, 21st, and 28th of the action which I took on these reports I shall take similar steps in the case of any further reports of the same kind which may reach me when there seems to be foundation for them, but in this connexion I would recall attention to the remarks I made in replying to the hon. gentleman on the 28th ultimo.

MR. GUINNESS—Could not the right hon. gentleman reassure our Moslem fellow-subjects in any case by expressing the horror which he feels at the well-authenticated cases which have reached him and by expressing his hope to the allied Governments that they will take steps to prevent repetitions?

SIR E. GREY—Of course statements of this kind which appear, from whatever quarter they come, must be most painful and distressing reading. As far as I am concerned I must repeat again the hon. member never seems to attach the weight that ought to be attached to the action we have taken. (Hear, hear) Whenever a report has reached me from a Consul, even though not based on personal knowledge or first-hand information, and there appears to be foundation for it, I have brought it to the notice of the Bulgarian or Serbian or Greek Government, whichever might be concerned, and I have expressed the expectation that they would take steps to put a stop to anything of this kind or to prevent it happening. The replies have been roughly that the Bulgarian and Serbian Governments stated that any outrages of this kind would be punished and that the outrages which had occurred, so far as their information went, had been committed by irregular bands.

The Atrocities in Macedonia.

The following reply was received from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the representation submitted by the London Moslem League on the subject of the Massacres of Macedonia:—

FOREIGN OFFICE,

Feb 17, 1913.

SIR,—I am directed by Secretary Sir Edward Grey to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, complaining that no adequate action has been taken in the matter of the atrocities alleged to have been perpetrated on Moslems by the forces of the Allied Balkan States during the present war and asking that His Majesty's Government will take steps to secure an independent international enquiry into the question with a view to demand reparation for the sufferers.

You are already aware, from the letter of the 14th ultimo from this Office, of the action taken by Sir E. Grey to bring the reports in question to the notice of the Governments concerned, and I am to inform you that similar steps will be taken whenever information of such a character is received.

I am to refer you in this connexion to answers returned to questions asked in Parliament on the 28th ultimo and the 13th instant.

I am to inform you that the Commander-in-Chief of the Bulgarian forces has issued stringent instructions that the severest measures are to be taken to investigate all such acts as are reported in the occupied territory, to punish those guilty of them and to prevent their recurrence, while the Serbian Government have stated that any cases of the kind which have occurred have always been treated with the utmost rigour of the military law.

I am to add that an enquiry such as you mention is not practicable in present circumstances.

I am,
Sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,
(Sd.) EVAN A. CROWE.

"The Will of Allah."

By "ONADOKER."

KUPELIT is in a turmoil. Down the steep streets and across the bridge over the swirling Vardar troops are marching towards the station. War has been declared, and the Osmanlis are to pour over the Serbian frontier and teach a lesson to their Christian neighbours that will silence them for good.

About two miles north of the town, at no great distance from the railway line, there stands an old Turkish chiftlik. The owner, Hassan Aga, sits in the courtyard puffing slowly at his nargileh, his eyes intent upon vacancy. Petrof, the Serb farm hand, is leading in the bullock waggon, while in a sunny corner the old Dedeh (grandfather) squats cross-legged in a half-doze, leaning against a pillar. Hens and chickens fidget around, pecking at small odds and ends, and a large cur starts up and barks angrily as Mehmed, Hassan's second boy, canters in over the cobbled entrance.

"I saw Kiazim leave," says the boy. "The regiment will be to-night at Uskub."

"Allah selamet versoun (May Allah keep him in safety)," replies Hassan Aga, withdrawing for an instant the amber mouta-piece of his water-pipe.

The scene has relapsed into a patient, breathing silence, when the clatter of small feet in patterns breaks its stillness, and little Serdeh and Ledah with their twin brothers, Kiamil and Hussein, run in, calling:

"Ana, Ana, we stood close by the line when the vapoor rushed past, and Kiazim waved to us from the window."

Their mother, the Hannum Effendi, comes from the house and sends all four off, with Melek, the negress "Kodja Kari," to get some milk and bread and call the goats in. Anon comes up a rayah tenant of the farm with a small portion of his rent, and towards evening the whole family, including the daughters Burah and Samieh and the Duyuk Valideh (grandmother), come out to see the horse that Hassan Aga has just purchased.

One by one they disappear into the rooms and outhouses that flank three sides of the courtyard; the watchdog roams in the big deserted yard, till a distant bark arouses him, to which he answers with a hurping, rasping call. The sounds die off, and peaceful darkness settles down over the chiftlik.

Two weeks have passed, and the autumn sunset looks sinister, but Hassan Aga stares at it placidly, while from time to time the low, deep gurgle of his bubble-bubble gives out that pleasant sound of comfort that the "teriyaki" of the hookah understand. Mehmed appears driving the goats before him, and as Petrof is strangely late in coming from the town, Hassan Aga calls his son to go and see if he is yet in sight.

"I can't see Petrof, but there are soldiers hurrying down the Uskub road going towards Kueprila. One is turning off here. He is coming across the big field, but he's got no rifle, and he's running. No, it can't be, but it looks like Kiazim. Who can it be? Why, yes, it is brother Kiazim, sure enough! Kiazim, Kiazim, is that you? Why are you stumbling? What! are you wounded? Quick, I'll come and help you."

As Mehmed reaches him, Kiazim stumbles, and sinks down fainting. His hair is matted in a huge clot of blood, and a deathly pallor overlies his cheeks. Everyone is around him, when at last he speaks: "We have been beaten at Kueprila, and Uskub is taken. The Serbs are following at our heels, and komitaji are everywhere; they have wiped out whole villages. Escape now, at once, before it is too late; in half an hour these butchery may be on you! Fly to Salonica, where is safety. Go while there's still time. And God save you from those awful bands!"

The Turk hears his dying son's words—the message of ruin and exile—and his face assumes a look of passive resignation. He replies almost without emotion:

"My son, this is the will of Allah. Olajak shu olour. What is to happen happens. Let us set forth at once."

From the town beyond, the voice of the muezzin calling to the evening prayer floats up as Hassan Aga leads forth his family from their home. His ancestors have dwelt on this land for nigh six hundred years.

In the lumbering bullock waggon are those too old or too young to walk, and, faintly moaning, Kiazim lies in their midst. The others trudge along while Mehmed and the Aga ride ahead. They carry some eighty pounds in gold, and in the waggon are yorghani coverlets and clothes in plenty. Entering Kueprila at nightfall, they find the streets full of loaded waggons, arabas, the talikas; everywhere bustle, confusion, darkness, and growing panic. The Christian portion of the population scarcely hides its joy at the discomfiture of its erstwhile masters.

Before daybreak Kiazim breathes his last, and, dumb and despairing, they set their faces southward. After some three hours' journey the bright sunshine begins to warm their stricken hearts. Then suddenly a band of armed men appears hurrying north-westwards. Their leader, a Serb komitaji, calls out, "Bring us your two horses quickly, and you may pass unharmed."

Hassan Aga complies without demur, and on the party told. That night is spent in a peasant's hut, and though next day they have to sleep beneath the sky, they feel that they have at last outdistanced all the bands.

But on the morrow rain is falling, and the roads are well nigh impassable. The waggon stops fast time and again, and only towards evening is the big bridge reached. They find it broken and at the ford a sea of pasty mud. The bullocks wade, squealing, splashing in, but the waggon is imbedded to the axles! Darkness falls, and another night in the open with a driving storm and four of the fugitives in high fever! At last the morning light breaks, but to bring what? This time a Bulgar band comes right upon them. The ruffians, twenty strong, cover the wretched family with their loaded rifles and summon them with oaths and threats to hand over all they have. Fearing the worst, Hassan sullenly pays out his store of gold. Delighted with their easy hand, the kumtays decide that more is to be had. The veils of the two young Turkish maidens are roughly torn aside, the girls themselves dragged screaming from the waggon. Brother and father try to wrench them free, and are felled quickly to the ground.

When the two men recover consciousness some hours later they find around them a troop of Bulgar regulars. The officer, seeing the fugitives have been stripped of all they had, gives them a little food and money and sets them on their journey. The waggon is perforce abandoned, and they now all trudge afoot. At Gradaka another kindly Bulgar befriends them for the night, and in his dreams Hassan is once more smoking the cheerful bubble-bubble while his Serb hand, Petrol, drives home the cattle in the glowing sunset. But a moan arouses him, the Dede, in a delirium of fever, is crying out, "Save the young girls, save them." Sleep flies and the black present hovers desolate.

How trace the weary pilgrimage to Salonica, to the great Turkish capital where safety and shelter will, they think, be found. Each day the dragging, plodding, loping, tramp along bleak ways, exhaustion, starvation, death, threatening and pulsed. Awful tales from Avret Hissar oblige the wanderers to make a further detour among the hills to escape the clutches of the kumtays. At last the patient little band descry the minarets of Salonica standing out on the horizon. But two of the small family have closed their eyes for ever. The fever-stricken Dede and the frail Leilah have ceased their struggling flight.

At dusk one evening Hassan draws near the town and sees the first patrols. They are Greek outposts in possession? All emotion has long been killed within him: his heart is dulled so utterly he can only stumble onwards in a deadened stupor.

Before midnight the exiles are all lodged inside a mosque, and a relief society is ministering to their physical distress. A European worker, pitying their awful plight, gleams something of their story, and offers words of comfort and of hope. Hassan's sublime reply falls on ears that cannot understand. "Allah istek - God has willed it so!" - The New East.

The Mosques of Adrianople.

P. M. MATTHEWS, in the course of a letter to The New East, says:—

The most popular story regarding the building of this magnificent mosque and its architect, Sinan, said to have been a Bulgarian, and how he was threatened with death, and how he escaped, is the following:—

The architect Sinan built the mosque of the same name in Constantinople. One day he received the Sultan's (Sultan Selim II., 1566-1574) orders to go to Adrianople and there build another mosque of the same size and grandeur, but it must contain a thousand windows. The architect was allowed unlimited credit. When the architect reported that the mosque was completed, the Sultan demanded whether his order regarding the number of windows had been obeyed. The architect confessed that he had placed in the building only 999 windows: on this he was ordered to be executed. On his way to execution he succeeded in obtaining a last audience of the Sultan. He begged of the Sultan to appoint a commission of architects, in which might be included even men known to be at enmity with him, declaring that he would die content should this commission report that it had been possible to add another window to the 999. The commission reported in favour of the architect. The Sultan, however, asked the architect why he had not carried out his orders and placed in the mosque the full number of windows he had desired. "Sire," the architect answered, "I fully understood the significance of your command, and by limiting the number of the windows to 999 I have secured your wish. Your desire was that the number of windows in (Turkish) should strike the popular mind with its immensity. Now the number of 999 will produce that effect far more than a 1,000 (bin). Nine hundred and ninety-nine is more impressive than a thousand (bin)." The architect's opinion as to which of the two mosques, the Constantinople one or the one of Adrianople, was the finer, and received the answer "Both are of equal grandeur, but the one in Constantinople is more appropriate for the purpose of prayer. In the Adrianople one there is too much light." This fact strikes the visitor.

The oldest mosque in the place and the most sacred for prayer is the Eski Jami (the Old Mosque): next to this one in sacredness comes the Youth Sherifi Mosque (the three minarets) or the Bourmala Mosque, because of the spiral construction of its main minaret (bourma, screw). There is not much of special sacredness about the Sultan Selim Mosque. The Eski Jami was built before the Turks took to copying the one-domed St. Sofia of Constantinople, and it is roofed with a number of domes of the same size. The Youth Sherifi Mosque is undoubtedly a converted church, the imam going up the minaret to call the Faithful to prayers invariably carries a sword. The is done only in mosques which had been churches.

Adrianople is crowded with mosques and cemeteries attached, there are at the least sixty, the greater part more or less in ruin, and no trace left of the revenues attached for their maintenance.

In Adrianople, as in all the chief centres of Byzantine rule, there was a church, St. Sofia. I possess a photograph of its ruins taken twenty-five years ago, part of the roof and a tower was still standing. Ten years ago, when I visited the spot, these ruins were still standing in a square surrounded by Christian houses, with no public way to them. I had to pass through a private house and a back door to get to the square. The square was the children's playground and the common yard for drying clothes. A great fire has since occurred which destroyed the whole quarter, and I learn that the ruins have disappeared. Whether this church, St. Sofia, was ever converted into a mosque I failed to ascertain.

Press Censors and War Correspondents.

And what of the position of war correspondents with the Bulgarians? No insulting diatribes against the Bulgarian authorities were ever despatched from Sofia, nevertheless the journalists were treated with a severity compared with which the lax control of the Turks was simply child's play.

The correspondents' camp at Echolu was within easy distance of the fighting on the Turkish left, and one or two correspondents contrived to ride as far as the actual firing line, one of them equipped with a cinematograph camera. The gradual retreat towards Tehtaldja furnished the journalists with enough picturesque 'copy' for weeks, and even after their withdrawal to San Stefano they were within fifteen miles of Bivuk Tehekmedje. I have already described the go-as-you-please freedom of the journalists from, say, the 16th November to the 20th of November, during the critical period of the Tehtaldja fighting.

The Bulgarians, on the other hand, never permitted the correspondents to get within fifty miles of the actual fighting. Their staff regarded the acceptance of the pass as acceptance of the censor's rules, and in the case of any violation of these rules punishment followed swiftly. Three of the journalists on one occasion were placed under strict arrest for simply going as far as the railway station at Stara Zagora without permission. On another occasion we are told that thirty correspondents were sent back for various breaches of the censor's regulations. This severity was, however, accepted by the correspondents at Sofia, Mustapha Pasha and Stara Zagora in a very different spirit from that which animated some of their colleagues who enjoyed the indulgence and liberty of the Turkish répne. "If a censorship is necessary—as of course it is," writes Mr. Philip Dussy, of the Westminster Gazette, "it could not be possibly more stringent or less objectionable than I have found it here in Sofia."

During the progress of the Russo-Japanese war several correspondents who were found to have violated their pledges by sending uncensored news over the Chinese frontier for telegraphic despatch were instantly expelled from the country. On the other hand, Reuters correspondents, who honourably observed the censor's rules and 'played the game' throughout, was allowed to be present as an exclusive eye-witness at many striking operations of the campaign, and was thus enabled to transmit news of signal interest and value.

Several interesting results may follow from the general experiences of the press censorship during the Balkan campaign of 1912. One of them is that the days of the war correspondent, properly so-called, are probably numbered. It has become quite evident that no modern army can tolerate in its neighbourhood the presence of a crowd of journalists who are at best an abominable nuisance and at worst a real danger. The amazing liberty enjoyed by the correspondents in Turkey during the month of November is simply the exception which proves the rule. No effective restraint could be imposed on individuals who treated their written engagements as waste-paper and were enabled by the conditions of the postal and steamboat services to evade the censor's regulations—nothing could be done, that is, except the forcible detention under arrest or the summary execution of the offenders, and this course of action was distasteful to the Ottoman authorities, and more especially at a time when their hands were full of large concerns in every direction.

The owners and editors of newspapers have been seriously asking themselves for some years whether the modern game of war correspondence is really worth the candle. The only news from Turkey of sufficient interest or piquancy to produce a special edition or satisfy the eager expectancy of the public was probably news sent by illicit means, and it is evident that no other country except Turkey would tolerate the continued sojourn in its midst of press men who were guilty of such behaviour. Think of the jejune paragraphs wired home from the Bulgarian side by 'war correspondent' sixty miles from the war! One of the most experienced of them wired from Sofia with reference to the invisible siege of Adrianople that the houses must have been damaged by the bombardment, but that some of the inhabitants will probably seek refuge in underground cellars.

The preposterous telegrams about the 'crumpling up of the Tchataldja defences' and the 'fall of Adrianople,' and the description of a battle several days before it took place—all this serves, no doubt, to sell newspapers, but there is, after all, a limit to war news based apparently on second sight and complete freedom from the fetters of time and space. Even in the Turkish capital, under conditions of practically complete freedom, some of the news collected by the correspondents for home consumption was remarkable enough. When I returned Tchataldja, about the 22nd of November, I found that one of the best-known journalists had 'obtained information' that the Bulgarians had captured all the Turkish forts except seven! On the 15th of November the following statements were made in telegrams received from Sofia and Constantinople: that the Turkish centre at Tchataldja had been broken, that Nazim Pasha had surrendered, that Hademkoni was occupied by the Bulgarians, that Adrianople had fallen. On the 6th of November we were informed that 'Derkow had been occupied and the water supply of Constantinople cut off! Large sums of money were spent on hairless descriptions of how the correspondent's account broke down—this was the crumby repetition of many messages. Is it really worth while to spend hundreds of pounds—a correspondent told me that he had already expended six hundred pounds on the campaign—in order to provide such journalistic rubbish as this? An editor once remarked to me, 'We don't want to spend money broadcast in order to hear that our correspondent left his pyjamas in one village, or couldn't get a drink in the next.' In the campaigns of the future it seems probable that the military authorities will permit one or two accredited representatives of the great agencies like Reuters to accompany their staff and be duly sponsored with suitable information. Soldiers are almost universally opposed to any admixture of correspondents to the theatre of war, and the general conduct of the journalists on the Turkish side has certainly furnished a strong argument in support of Lord Wolsey's conviction that correspondents are 'the curse of modern warfare.'

I have written these lines because I believe that the press censors of the Turkish army have been unjustly criticised in the columns of certain English and Continental newspapers. But there is also a much larger question involved. The Turks have never adequately realised the immense importance of the press and its influence in shaping public opinion.

Let me give an example of this. In the first week of November a series of alarmist paragraphs were telegraphed via Roumania to the effect that the Christian inhabitants of Stambul and Pera were menaced with massacre and outrage at the hands of incensed Moslems. Lurid pictures had been drawn of widespread terror; we were told that 'men's hearts were turning to water,' that '25,000 Kurds were marching on the city,' and so on. This sensational 'copy' ran riot through the European press, and even journals with high traditions were led to accept news which was based on little else than a priori scare-mongering. So utterly disgusted were many of the regular residents in Pera that a number of well-known Englishmen, including Sir Adam Block, Mr. Graves, Sir Richard Crawford, and Sir Henry Woods, despatched a strongly worded protest against this mischievous abuse of journalism. Here, then, once more Turkey suffered at the hands of a reckless journalism, without any effective means of influencing a press which continued to urge upon the Powers the despatch of warships and transports at considerable expense to the taxpayers at home. These highly coloured pictures of death and destruction were composed by gentlemen sitting in the saloons of the Pera Palace Hotel, who could walk from one end of Stambul to the other by day or night without the slightest discourtesy or interference, who ignored the fact that order was being well maintained by military patrols, and forgot that during the progress of Italy's brigand-campaign in Tripoli not a hair of a single Italian head was touched in Constantinople.

During the recent crisis the entire absence of excitement or violence among the Moslem inhabitants of the capital was very striking. Amid the horrors and humiliations of October and November, the thinly disguised jubilation of the Greek residents, and the ungenerous speeches of foreign statesmen, the Muhammadan populace displayed a restraint and dignity which was really phenomenal. The national misfortunes were deeply felt, but no angry words were spoken in public, no bitter re-eminations took place in the streets, no single act of violence was directed against any of the helpless communities of Christians isolated here and there in the network of the Stambul streets. Could the authorities of any other European capital, with the enemy within thirty miles of its gates, have guaranteed a similar freedom from outrage and violence?

In the dark hours of Turkey's recent misfortunes, amid the accumulated miseries of war and pestilence, scarcely a single note of sympathy for the stricken nation could be detected in the European press. Treaties solemnly signed by the nations of Europe are violated without a word of protest from the Churches of Christendom, which have to a large extent bestowed their blessing and approval on a war of conquest, prompted by sheer lust of new territory.

This general trend of feeling is due in some slight measure to religious bigotry, but in a much larger degree to the influence of the European press, carefully led on every possible occasion by the press bureaux established in Europe by Turkey's more especial adversaries in the Balkans and elsewhere. In short, the Turks have always been badly handicapped by their inability to make effective reply to the criticisms and attacks of the foreign press. Ever since their honest attempt to establish reforms in 1908 they have never been allowed any of that rest or leisure without which no nation can bring about far-reaching changes in government and administration. Who could reasonably expect adequate reforms during three years of almost incessant conflict in Arabia, Tripoli, Albania, Macedonia, and Thrace? How long has it taken us in England to grant some measure of self-government to Ireland? But in the Christian nations of Europe are sincere in their desire for better government in Turkey, let them now grant her ten years of freedom from Christian aggression. On the other hand, in the building up of her new national life, full of immense possibilities, let Turkey remember that she cannot afford to allow her enemies the virtual monopoly of exercising influence on the powerful press of Europe, the creator of that public opinion which no statesman of the twentieth century can afford to ignore.—E. N. BENNETT, in the Nineteenth Century.

Persia.

M. Constant, the Belgian Director of Customs at Bushire, and his wife were driving home from dinner on the night of the 7th when an unknown Persian ran alongside the carriage and fired repeatedly at the occupants. Madame Constant was killed, while her husband was seriously wounded.

It is reported locally that the attack on M. Constant was due to personal animosity possibly on the part of a dismissed servant but the Government has promised a most searching investigation.

The latest information about the assassin of M. Constant is that he is dismissed a Customs employé who joined the Gendarmerie. It is reported that the newly recruited force of gendarmes at Bushire is proving somewhat unruly.

Fears are entertained in official circles at Teheran that the ex-Shah, who was reported recently to have left Odessa for western Europe, contemplates returning to Persia in the spring. Colonel Bjalmarsen, Swedish head of the Gendarmerie, has left for Shiraz in an automobile accompanied by the French Minister who is going on an archaeological tour in Persia.

The Russians are still maintaining some of their plague stations on the Afghan and Persian frontiers, though no cases of the disease have been actually reported. Rumours are current in the tribal country of an Afghan caravan having reached the Mekran littoral to receive a large consignment of arms, said to have been landed from Muscat. It appears doubtful, however, whether anything more than a small number of rifles has been got through owing to the strictness of the naval blockade.

A Teheran message states that the Russian Chargé d'Affaires has offered Government two hundred thousand sterling to be repaid in three years from July 1914. A similar British offer is expected.

A Teheran telegram says that according to information from Bushire two hundred Bahrloo raiders have entered the district of Bunder Abbas, plundered villages and attacked a British survey party at Behman. They appear, however, to have been driven off after severe fighting.

Reports from Lingah indicate that a large force of tribesmen is contemplating an attack on Bunder Abbas.

A Teheran message says that one hundred and sixty-eight gendarmes at Bushire have been paid and disbanded.

A British warship is now at Bunder Abbas where the survey party has arrived safely. The town and vicinity are reported quiet though raiders are still in the district.

China.

China has informed the Ministers of the Six-Power Group that she does not agree to the scheme recently submitted with regard to adviserships in connection with the Six Power loan. China suggests a return to the original list, which includes Herr Roup, the German for the Audit Department, to whose appointment France objected.

The Nieder Oesterreichische Escompto Gesellschaft has granted China a loan of three hundred thousand pounds sterling, China undertaking to give the Poldihnette Cast Steel Works for the next ten years orders for tool, steel, rifle-barrels, and gun parts to the same amount. The Poldihnette Company will establish a branch in Peking.

Moslem College for Poona.

It is understood that a scheme for a Muhammadan college at Poona on the lines of the Aligarh College is being matured and that a Muhammadan gentleman has expressed his readiness to make a donation of ten lakhs of rupees for founding the college. If the scheme is matured it is proposed to extend the Currimbhoy Ebrahim Muhammadan school, the foundation-stone of which was laid by the Governor in November last.

The McCormick Case.

Mr. Hanlyu, Mr. Arnold's counsel, is returning to Rangoon via Bombay to arrange for the Fatma vs McCormick case to be presented to the Privy Council in appeal. Mr. Arnold's legal advisers have succeeded in prevailing on the India Office to forego security for costs.

À TÊTE À TÊTE

We have received another letter from Mr. Abdul Rahman Saldqi and one from Dr. Naim in charge of the Omerli section. Dr. Naim writes as follows:—

Omerli Field-Hospital, 23rd Feb., 1913.

"I am very sorry I could not write you till now, and especially the last week's report of my Omerli Hospital, as I had to go to Stamboul to discuss certain matters with Dr. Ansari.

"9th Feb.—Dr. Ansari left Omerli on 9th February, 1913, leaving me in charge of the Hospital with half of the Mission. This division of the Mission, though an honour, affected the Mission discipline and work very much. Firstly, it upset the whole work as everything was to be divided and arranged a second time, which meant at least one week's hard labour in mud and snow. Secondly, everybody wanted to go to the front, and the idea of following Enver Bey's Army was too charming in itself. So half of the Mission felt miserable and broken hearted and some of the members were actually crying! So my first duty was to give the members sound advice and put their minds at rest and then to fix their duties. Everything was put in order as the wounded were expected every hour.

"10th and 11th Feb.—These two days were spent in putting the Hospital in order through incessant rain and snow.

"12th Feb.—Ah Ghaleb Bey, the Inspector of Croissant Rouge, inspected our Hospital and was pleased to see it in order, and he informed us that to-day we are to get the first batch of wounded soldiers at 12 a.m. We were very glad to hear this news and our ambulance bearers with stretchers were ready for the first time to receive their wounded brothers. The train arrived at 12 a.m., and we got 9 wounded soldiers out of the lot. It was a great trouble to get them down. The soldiers were put to bed and were dressed one by one and their injuries were noted down. Four of them were very seriously wounded. It was my first experience to see these bullet wounds, and I was surprised to see the way these bullets take in the human body. For example a soldier was shot in his left temple, the bullet passed through his eyeball, then through his plate and, passing through the floor of his mouth, was lodged on the right side of his neck.

"13th Feb.—Weather extremely bad. Impossible to go out of the tents. The rain and hailstorm was incessant. Ishaquddin and Ghulam Ahmad went out yesterday, had to sleep out and came back to-day. After getting permission they went as far as Tehataldja village and slept there in an hotel which was occupied by the Bulgars two days before. They saw the village. The Moslem quarter of the village was all blown up; the railway station was pulled down; but the Christian quarters were safe. In the village itself there were some Christians and only two Moslem inhabitants.

"14th Feb.—Weather extremely bad. I wanted to operate on some cases; but could not do it, as to bring patients to the operation theatre was an impossibility.

"15th Feb.—Hailstorm very severe. I was obliged to operate even in that awful weather. I was very glad that it fell to my lot to perform the first operation and do a mending good for my wounded soldiers. I removed the bullet from the neck of Am Ibrahim, and I was obliged to remove his left eyeball, as it was quite destroyed, and its removal was essential to save his other eye. The operation was done in ordinary lamp-light as the day was quite dark. Dr. Ansari came to Omerli and was much pleased to see the Hospital working. The Mission was doing some useful work after all, and he was satisfied that all this trouble was not useless. To-day one of our most useful and hard-working men—Abdul Waheed—fell ill. He developed pleurisy and there is a suspicion of his getting pneumonia. He was to be sent back to Stamboul which was a great loss to my Hospital.

"16th Feb.—Weather as usual very bad. I went to Stamboul with Abdul Waheed and to discuss with Dr. Ansari the disadvantages of working at Omerli. It was very cruel to keep wounded soldiers in tents in incessant rain and snow when the temperature goes down to 0°C and even below 0°C. The only supplying place is Tehataldja where there is going to be no fight. The difficulties of working under these circumstances and the effect of the climate on our members are very great and I pointed out the advantages of a Hospital in Stamboul, which is the centre where patients come from all sides. The matter was discussed, but the question of expenses was very hard to deal with and so the proposal was dropped, though I was against keeping the Hospital at Omerli, as we won't be able to show our good work to our Indian people.

"17th Feb.—To-day I had to stay in Stamboul as Dr. Ansari was leaving for Gallipoli to-night.

"18th Feb.—I returned to Omerli, and was glad to see my operation case doing very well. It was Maulud Day and we had a good dinner and invited the Bombay Mission people to dinner with some of our Turkish officers.

"19th and 20th Feb.—Nothing particular. We were obliged to stay in tents. I went to Khadimkeny to see Abulus Salim Pasha and told him plainly that he should give us work for the sake of the peculiar importance of our Mission. He promised to send the wounded first to us and then to other Missions.

"21st Feb.—To-day we got 19 wounded soldiers. So our work has begun, and we expect to get more wounded soldiers daily. Our members are very glad and work hard, and the patients are satisfied with our treatment and prefer to remain under tents to staying in any other hospital.

"22nd and 23rd Feb.—Nothing particular. Weather extremely bad. I was obliged to come to Stamboul as I was feeling very bad from severe cold, bronchitis and asthma.

"24th Feb.—I am here in Stamboul. I intend to stay in some hospital for a week or so and go back to Omerli when I am all right. I have put Dr. Mirza Raza Khan in charge there. It is a pity Abdul Waheed had to leave for India. The total admissions in our Hospital were 68 till 23rd Feb."

As for Mr. Abdul Rahman's letter it is a conundrum which we would give much to solve. He refers in it to Dr. Ansari's letter which, however, we have been unable to find in the envelope in which Mr. Abdul Rahman encloses only some cuttings from French papers, which Madame La Baronne Rosen would like us to translate and publish in the Comrade, and a list of Indian subscribers to the Ottoman Red Crescent Society, which we hope to publish in our next. It appears to us that our excellent ex-Manager forgot to enclose Dr. Ansari's letter and succeeded in making his own letter thoroughly unintelligible. As we do not wish to confuse our readers we spare them the trouble of solving this conundrum. But it appears that the Omerli cold has been a source of great trouble to the section of the Mission stationed there as must be evident from the letter of Dr. Naim who has himself been laid up. Mr. Abdul Waheed Khan who, as we had fully expected, had endeared himself to everybody in the Mission and had established an excellent reputation as a willing and hard worker, was unfortunately unvalued with pneumonia, as we published last week, and has been sent back at his own desire. Dr. Shams-ul-Barry and Mr. Husam Raza Beg had returned a week ago, but we have not ourselves heard from any of these gentlemen except for a telegram from Dr. Barry who says he has posted to us a letter from Dussan Omer Pasha, Vice-President of the Ottoman Red Crescent, which has not reached us. It seems that the tents purchased in England have contributed not a little to the troubles of the Mission, and Mr. Abdul Rahman writes that "the dispensary in our Omerli hospital is a tent worth a visit. So poor Waheed got pneumonia and had to come to Stamboul." In the sentence previous to this Mr. Abdul Rahman mentions that Mr. Abdul Waheed Khan is an excellent compounder and a very hard-working man. It is, therefore, not quite clear whether Mr. Abdul Rahman attributes Mr. Abdul Waheed Khan's very unfortunate illness to his own merits or to the merits of the tent. But it is clear that the atmospheric conditions and the state of the roads have provided the severest trials for the members of the Mission. During Dr. Naim's absence at Constantinople owing to an attack of bronchitis Dr. Raza Khan will be in charge, and it is hoped that with Mr. Shuaib Quraishi, who has proved such an excellent worker, he will be able to manage the affairs of the Omerli Field-Hospital satisfactorily. We hope there will be no more cases of various illness among the workers and that the two sections of the Mission will be able to do excellent work. Our patience with the amply of the tents is vanishing with every reported illness and we give them notice that if another member of the Mission falls ill, they will hear something.

MR. HARRY H. LAMB, H. B. M. Consul-General at Salonica, has sent us the following letter, dated 31st January, through the India Office:— "I am in receipt of telegraphic advice through the Foreign Office to the effect that you have contributed a further sum of £500 for the relief of Mussulman Refugees in this district, £500 of which may be devoted to the care of the sick in this place and the remainder is to be placed at the disposal of the Vice-Consul at Monastir unless I consider that the necessity is greater here, subject to my own discretion. As I have to-day telegraphed to the Foreign Office, I have recently ascertained from a thoroughly trustworthy source that there are 4,000 refugees in urgent need of relief in the town of Seres, which has not yet been included in the district of any of the existing relief agencies. The following extracts from my informant's letter, dated the 20th instant, will give you a fair idea of the situation there:— 'There appear to be at the present moment some four thousand persons in Seres who are in real distress. From a list submitted from a reliable source it appears that the condition of 2,562 of these is desperate. The Bulgarian authorities are doing something to alleviate the distress, but their efforts, or the means at their disposal are wholly inadequate. Most of the sufferers are Muhajirs from the villages, but, as might be expected in a town of 28,000 inhabitants which was the headquarters of a Turkish Sanjak, there are a large number of ex-officials whose position is most painful. I am assured that many of these are literally starving in their houses. Many of them have been robbed of all they possessed, all are without means of subsistence. The £100 referred to above has been personally distributed among sixty families of this category which includes three or four local Beys, formerly affluent now absolutely destitute. In the Osman Hoja Medrese, for instance, I saw 84 people crowded together in some eight little rooms. There are three men, 81 women and two children. They are absolutely destitute.' Under these circumstances I would propose to utilize the £400 now kindly contributed for the relief of these very unfortunately situated people at Seres, if I can secure the services of a suitable person to distribute relief. With regard to the first contribution of £100, which I have devoted to Hospital work in our Relief Camp, I enclose herewith a statement of the sums already expended, and I will continue to furnish you with statements of expenditure as it is made. You will please to understand, however, that, as these refugees will probably be in need of relief for several months to come, we have every interest to husband our funds as much as possible. I enclose a copy of the daily report of our Camp Doctors for the 22nd and 23rd instant, which will suffice to give you an idea of the work done. There is a daily average of 90 to 100 sick in the Camp, and the death-rate varies from 4 to 10 per diem, the great majority of these deaths occurring amongst the children under 4 years of age. From January 1st up to January 27th—the only period for which complete statistics are available—the following cases of sickness were treated in Camp.—Men 797, Women 686, Children 607, total 2,095. Of these 44 men, 45 women and 41 children were suffering from small pox and 7 men, 6 women and 13 children from other contagious diseases. The death-rate for the same period amounted to 175, of which 113 were children. To these must be added about 60 deaths which occurred between December 11th, when the first refugees were installed in the Camp, and the end of the month. About 20 of these deaths were due to small-pox, but by far the largest number from any one cause were those of quite small children, upon whom the hardship of camp life in winter with insufficient nourishment naturally has told the most severely. There is unfortunately no means of comparing these figures with those of the refugees remaining in the city, but there can be little doubt that the death-rate amongst the latter has been considerably higher in proportion. About 3,500 refugees, besides 360 convalescent soldiers, are being shipped tomorrow for Smyrna on board the Egyptian Red Crescent steamer Kazil Irakat, and a certain number of Bosniaks have recently been repatriated by the Austrian Government, but the number of people in this town who are in need of relief do not appear to be at all reduced thereby. The Revd. E. B. Haskell, an American Missionary long resident in this country, who has had very considerable experience of relief work and enjoys the confidence of all classes of the population, has kindly consented to proceed to Serres for the purpose of personally directing the distribution of your relief in that town. I therefore propose to purchase at once some £200 worth of flour and send it to Serres as soon as ever I can obtain from the Bulgarian authorities the necessary means of transport. I reserve the remainder of the £400 until I receive his report as to what may be the most effective method of employing it. The need of relief is widespread and increasingly acute, but I do not think that there is any district where the situation can be much worse than it is in Serres, and I do not think that a better agent could be found for its relief than Mr. Haskell. I venture, therefore, to think that you may rest assured that this part of your generous contribution will be well expended."

THE HON. SECRETARY of the M. A. O. College Old Boys Association asks us to request all Old Boys Alghath to join this year's Dinner and 4th Annual Reunion, which are fixed for the 21st and 22nd instant. Apart from the great pleasure of meeting a very large number of old college friends, the college staff and the present students, which should afford sufficient inducement to an Old Boy to visit Alghath on this occasion, the matter is of considerable importance awaiting his consideration which render his presence very necessary. "We have some very important questions before us," says the Hon. Secretary, "which we have got to decide and, we hope, our decisions will result in the raising of our dear old college to a still higher position amongst the educational institutions of India. The time has come when we the Old Boys, should take more and heavier burdens on our shoulders and give such help to our Alma Mater as may be worthy of her and of our own position." We are sure the invitation of the Hon. Secretary will meet with an enthusiastic response. Beside the hard intellectual fare that he professes the Secretary abounds with hints at very big arrangements for the Dinner this year. As we are told that it "will be held in open air on the Cricket Lawn" as "the Strachey Hall would be too small" for the purpose!

WE wish to give to the following letter of the Rt. Hon. Mr. Amos Ali the greatest possible publicity. He writes—"I have read with sorrow the atrocious libel the Watan of Lahore has reproduced in its issue of the 28th January from a Madras vernacular paper concerning the staff of the British Red Crescent Hospital in Constantinople. It is a matter of small moment to me whether the Mussulman subscribers send their subscriptions to the British Red Crescent or not. But the reputation of the men and women, some of them volunteers, who are giving their services and even risking their lives to relieve the sufferings of the Moslem sick and wounded, is a subject of the utmost importance. I, therefore, beg you to extend to me the courtesy of your columns to give an emphatic contradiction to the libellous statements published in the Watan Reports concerning the work done by the British Red Crescent Hospitals have been regularly sent to the Mussalman papers and to the subscribers to the Fund. They must, therefore, know how Dr. Godwin Baynes immediately on arrival at San Stefano, about the third week in November last, when cholera was raging among the Turkish troops, organised a hospital which was the means of saving a large number of lives; and in appreciation and recognition of the efficient and valuable services of the staff the International Board of Health placed its hospital under the charge of Dr. Godwin Baynes. They must know also how the Scutari Hospital ministered to the sufferings of the sick and wounded who were taken there from San Stefano by the admirable sea-transport that was organised by the Director. If, in the face of these facts, any section of the Mussalman people feel inclined to attach credence to malignant falsehoods set in circulation with the avowed object of stopping subscriptions coming to the British Red Crescent for the continuance of its work of mercy, I can only express my regret at their simplicity. The enclosed extract from a letter of the Superintendent-Sister at the San Stefano Hospital will show, in some degree, the devoted service the British Red Crescent staff are giving to humanity. And I am in a position to say that the charges levelled against them by a member of an Indian Medical Mission who has concealed his identity under a pseudonym are a tissue of malicious falsehoods. To take one instance, none of the British Red Crescent doctors get £100 per month. The salary of the principal Surgeon, Dr. Bernard Haigh, who, after serving devotedly and conscientiously in Tripoli for nine months, went to Constantinople, is only £86, and the other doctors receive a smaller remuneration. It is equally a lie that our hospital has lost 390 patients. Notwithstanding the fact that the sick and wounded who came to our hospitals were, when received, in the worst possible condition from exposure and neglect, the death-rate has, thanks to excellent care and patient nursing, been very low. The public may rest assured that the matter will not be allowed to remain where it is. It is a pity that the Mussalman of India should carry even to distant countries on a mission professedly humanitarian the feelings of jealousy, envy and malice which have been the ruin of the community." While publishing this letter we may add that we do not know why anyone should wish to malign the British Red Crescent, and we would like to know who it is that has a desire to make a "corner" in such charity. As organisers of a Medical Mission ourselves, we wish to make it clear that so far as we know, no one connected with the All-India Medical Mission has shown a desire to circulate misstatements calculated to injure the reputations of men engaged on the British Red Crescent work. As a matter of fact, we are aware that Dr. Amari and his colleagues have at all times exercised much restraint in expressing opinions about the work of other... and we ourselves have had to put up with a good deal, we ought to have borne in the way of malicious enemies.

Indians of all communities and creeds who have been in a position to judge his urbanity, and his generous sympathy with Indian aspirations and the Indians' desire to secure for themselves the respect due to them, have been feeling for some time past the sadness of farewell because the time originally fixed for Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson's departure, after a tenure of the Finance Member's office of the customary duration, is fast approaching. Such, indeed, has been the charm of Sir Guy's manner, and the fairness and magnanimity of his treatment of Indian questions, that we were not in the least surprised to learn that his non-official colleagues of H. E. the Viceroy's Council requested His Excellency to arrange for an extension of Sir Guy's term of office by two years. We believe His Excellency, while unable to receive a deputation on the subject, has communicated the wishes of these gentlemen to the Secretary of State, and we trust that Lord Curzon would be pleased to accede to a request which is significant of the growing cordiality between officials and non-officials, and that we shall have with us for a few years longer a kind friend, a sagacious statesman and a public servant who, in spite of his exalted position, has never unlearned in five years of bureaucratic associations that he had learnt in England, namely, that a public servant is nothing more or less than a servant of the public. We hope we shall not have to part with Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson as soon as we had feared; and that, whatever the decision of the Secretary of State, Sir Guy has still before him many years of useful public service and a long and unclouded life of happiness.

In view of the difficulty of obtaining correct information about Turkish affairs, and the meagreness of the news supplied by Renter and its inaccuracies and biased character, we had felt the need for establishing a news service for Turkish news in collaboration with the Turks themselves, and had written to H. E. Mahmoud Sherkat Pasha a long letter explaining the need of such a news service and its benefit to the Turks as well as the Indian Mussalmans. We are glad that our suggestion has at last proved fruitful, and we shall soon be in a position to publish news direct from Turkey if our contemporaries and other well-to-do Indian Mussalmans and Moslem princes who desire to get such news come forward to assist us. The readers of newspapers are sometimes not as considerate as they should be, and, although the readers of the Comrade have been its chief supporters to whose generous enthusiasm we owe so much, we have also had to record the regrettable indifference of some to the financial condition of the paper the dues of which practically one subscriber out of every four or five has neglected to pay. Many people desire to obtain an ideal paper which would have all the best features of English dailies and should possess in addition some special features of its own; but they never consider that newspaper proprietors are not inexhaustible gold mines, and that it is impossible for one paper to be generous to every applicant for all sorts of concessions while it is possible for all of them to be just and even generous towards it without any considerable individual sacrifice. Under these circumstances, it is idle for us to expect that the readers of the Comrade or of the Herald would enable us without outside assistance to realise the dream of many years and establish an agency of our own for the publication of authentic news obtained from Turkey. But if Indian Mussalmans and Moslem princes and newspapers are as anxious to obtain correct information about Turkey as they appear to be, it should not at all be difficult to establish an agency such as we have outlined. To begin with, we may receive daily messages of about 50 words and, as there is no press rate for telegrams sent to or from Turkey, the expense of the cables alone would be about Rs. 75 a day or Rs. 2,250 a month. Other charges may, on a conservative estimate, be calculated at another Rs. 750 a month, making a total of Rs. 3,000. If the Moslem princes paid half the cost, and newspapers and private persons bore the other half, the scheme has every chance of success. A contribution on an average of Rs. 250 from six Native States is not likely to be such a great drain, and when it is remembered that the Government pays very large sums to Renter and to the Associated Press for their telegraphic service for the chief officers of the Government, including Residents in Native States, we do not think that the Moslem princes would have reason to shrink from such an expenditure. As regards the newspapers, some of the leading vernacular papers can easily afford four or five hundred rupees a month for such a service; but if six newspapers could be secured which could contribute Rs. 125 a month, there would be only the balance of Rs. 750 to secure, which is not too large for a community that has many rich men who can privately take the whole service at the same rate as the newspapers. The inland telegraphic charges for newspapers would be small; but they would be too heavy for private subscribers who may not secure any concession such as the Press Message rates; and we think it would be equitable to spread them over all subscribers alike. It must be understood that the rates roughly calculated here barely cover the cable and telegraphic charges, and if many newspapers do not become subscribers, they may have to be raised by Rs. 10 to Rs. 25 a month. But this is because our friends in Turkey are prepared to supply news free of charge. During the war no cots words are allowed, but later on it would be possible to work with a cots and thus curtail the charges immensely. When that is done other rates will be arranged, but at present we offer to our contemporaries and private individuals and Native States the rates which we have mentioned above, i. e., Rs. 125 a month for a service averaging about 50 words a day. If we receive sufficient applications with deposits at least for a month, we shall immediately cable to Constantinople asking them to commence sending us daily telegrams on receipt of our cable. Here is a chance which has never presented itself before, and may not present itself again. And we anxiously await the response to our offer which the generosity and patriotism of our friends in Turkey have made it possible. The only question is whether in a country which has 70 million Mussalmans and a number of Moslem States, and several Moslem papers that have made considerable amounts of money out of the Tripolitan and the Bilcan wars, we can discover 30 subscribers of Rs. 125 a month. Surely this is not too much to expect; but in these days of much clamour and very modest work one cannot be too sure. There is not much time to waste, and we hope His Highness the Nizam would himself subscribe for six sets of telegrams for his vast dominions, and Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal and His Highness the Nawab Sahib of Rampur for three sets each for their ministers and secretaries. Our contemporaries, both weekly and daily, which have large sales, in every case considerably inflated by the troubles of Turkey, should also take advantage of this offer and between them take seven or eight sets of telegrams, leaving four or five for Moslem merchant princes and landowners. Delay would deprive us of an excellent chance and we expect an early and a hearty response from all concerned.

It is a triumph of no inconsiderable significance that the Imperial Legislature has passed the Wakf Bill of the Hon. Mr. Jinnah; and Khan Bahadur Moulvi Mohamed Yusuf of Calcutta, Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk Bahadur, C. S. I., C. I. E., and, last but not the least, Shamsul-Ulama Maulana Shibli Numani who organised the Moslem memorial and the Najaw-ul-Ulama deputation have to be congratulated no less than the author of the Bill on the success achieved. But a word of no little praise is due to the Hon. Syed Ali Imam, the Law Member, whose earlier studies in Moslem Law learnt from Moslem Ulama came to his assistance in remodelling the Bill and removing from it the restrictive innovation to which the Nalwa had objected, but which the Hon. Mr. Jinnah had introduced into his Bill to satisfy his non-Moslem colleagues that the Bill was in no way designed to assist Moslem debtors in defrauding their creditors. The tactics of Mr. Jinnah were sound and have been justified by results, for even the Hon. Mr. Vijayarajendra Chariar, who represents in the Council the ablest lawyers of India, supported the Bill after explaining his position and the doubts that had assailed his mind. The Bill, as passed, is merely a declaratory measure which restores the applicability of Moslem Law to cases of family endowments in British India; and, although we believe that the device of Waqf-al-Aulad is only an exception to the principle underlying the Moslem Law of Succession which removes a harsh rigidity unsuited to legislation for all times and all men, we rejoice in the triumphant vindication of Her Late Majesty Queen Victoria's Proclamation, which guaranteed to her Moslem subjects the regulation of their affairs according to their own Personal Law. In its essence, however, the Moslem Law of Succession is far more equitable than any other law we know of and is more hostile to perpetuity than any Equity. It gives full control to the owner of property to dispose of it as he likes during his life, while he is still in the enjoyment of his power and senses. But after his demise it distributes it among his successors in elaborately arranged proportions according to the dictates of natural affection and social equity, giving to everyone just enough to start in life as he had done from whom the property is inherited, and yet not enough to anyone to remain indolent and unproductive—a month that eats and not a hand that earns. This we have felt constrained to say because during the Council discussions some Mussalmans wisely looked up to the institution of Fardul England which gives to the first-born the greatest share of his ancestor's property without making him to-day as responsible as he was to the State for a levy of feudal troops in the days when military service was demanded in exchange for feudal holdings. The historical sense is a valuable corrective of legislative errors and to our Moslem fellow-countrymen we shall only say: "Beware of imitations!"

It will be remembered that Haji Baksh Elahi Sahib, of Delhi, had given Rs. 50,000 as a thankoffering on the occasion of His Excellency the Viceroy's first public appearance after the outrage. No conditions were attached to the gift, as it was left entirely at the discretion of His Excellency to make use of the sum for any charitable purpose. We are glad to learn that "Rs 30,000 from the sum of Rs 50,000 has been allocated by His Excellency to Lady Lowther's Fund for the relief of Turkish soldiers' wives and children and refugees, and the money will be despatched to Constantinople forthwith." The decision of His Excellency is as considerate as it is in the fitness of things, and it will be peculiarly gratifying to the Mussalmans of India. The existing misery and suffering in Turkey are appalling and no charity can at present be more appropriate than the one applied to relieve them in some measure. The offer of Rs 50,000 by Haji Baksh Elahi Sahib in a spirit of thankfulness to God that He had preserved the life of Lord Hardinge will, through His Excellency's thoughtful and humane decision, be instrumental in saving the lives of scores of his fellow-beings. We understand that the balance of Rs. 20,000 will be spent on some object of utility to the citizens of Delhi.

The following letter has been addressed by Nawab Sir Salimullah Khan, G. C. I. E., Nawab Bahadur of Dacca, to Mr S Wazir Hasan, Honorary Secretary, All India Moslem League:—

"Dear Sir,—As you are aware, my almost fatal illness in October last has left me a complete wreck, utterly incapable of being of any service to my community, and before I had been sufficiently convalescent, to fill the cup of my miseries God was pleased to wrest from me my most beloved son, the pride of my family. I have again fallen a prey to my old maladies Diabetes and Albuminuria, and the unanimous opinion of the local medical experts is that it will be suicidal if I do not keep myself aloof from business and take absolute repose. It is due to this impaired health that I had to take leave of absence from the Council for the remainder of the present season. I have received your printed letter of the 17th February last, and the fact that I am addressing a reply to you, even in this deplorable state of my body and mind and in spite of the doctors' warning, will, I am sure, convince you of my unabated love for my community. In this predicament I am compelled, in spite of my strong personal inclination to the contrary, to observe strictly, in the interest of my health, my family and also perhaps in the interest of the community, the injunctions of my medical advisers and to abstain from participation in the discussion of the burning questions of the day affecting us, the Muhammadans. I venture to hope that the community will forgive me the enforced aloofness which I deeply regret, and that I shall have the benedictions of my brethren for the speedy restoration to health and peace of mind to enable me to resume public duties. In view of the supreme importance of the coming Annual Session of the League I could not control the temptation of going through the draft resolutions enclosed with your letter under reply. I find that they involve changes of the most momentous nature, marking a distinct departure from the established principles of the League, founded on the lines chalked out by Sir Syed Ahmed, and as I claim no small share in having brought this institution into being, I cannot, at this juncture, help offering my humble suggestions. Although we may look for justification of the spirit, which underlies some of these resolutions, in the general advancement of the Muhammadans, any precipitate action on our part may land us in difficulties which it will not be easy to overcome. Well, it might strike you as an unjustifiable dependency, but judging from the course of events I fear the star of Islam is now on the wane; and with the political horizon overcast with such dense clouds and untoward circumstances likely to fetter our hands, we should proceed with proper forethought and caution. I wish all our leaders to consider whether or not it is advisable to wait a while with patience, watch further developments and then initiate movements calculated to truly benefit the community, should circumstances and the situation justify it. We should not be carried away by the excitement of the hour, bidding adieu to that calmness of judgment which is the key to all success of human endeavours. I beg that you will kindly lay this letter before the Council of the League before those resolutions are put to the meeting." All those who know the Nawab Bahadur and the love he bears to his community, for which he has worked arduously, and which he has assisted with lavish generosity, will pray to the Almighty to grant him health, happiness and a long life of usefulness to his people. We note with satisfaction that there is no desire on his part to dictate to his people, but at the same time he is anxious that the horses which drag the coach of the Mussalmans should not be whipped at a crossing. We admire the spirit of the letter and commend it to the serious consideration of a community that should be able to combine a cool head with a warm heart if it is still true to its historic traditions.

WE HONOUR we have not been able to announce earlier that £8,000 have been sent on various occasions to the Grand Vizier in Constantinople out of the Comrade Turkish Relief Fund, in addition to a draft for £123-16-13 (Rs. 1,850-0-0) which was received by us from Haji Karam Elahi and Hafiz Abdul Rabb Sahib, and was sent to the Grand Vizier on the 26th December, 1912. £2,000 were sent through the Bank of Bengal between 21st and 25th December, and £5,000 through the National Bank of India on the 25th January. We received two cablegrams on the 30th January from Marshal Mahmud Shauket Pasha, Grand Vizier, acknowledging with thanks the receipt of £5,000 and of £2,100 respectively. The cablegram, however, errs about the latter figure inasmuch as our own first remittance of £2,000, together with the draft of £123 16-3, obviously amount to £2,123 16-3. We think it was with a view to avoid unnecessary cabling expenses that there was no mention of £23-16-3 in the acknowledgement of the Grand Vizier. We may state that we have also received an acknowledgement of our latest remittance of £1,000-0-0 despatched to the Grand Vizier, through the Alliance Bank of Simla, on the 14th February. We hope one of these days to publish the facsimiles of the Grand Vizier's cablegrams. Of course, these sums are in addition to the £1,000 sent during the war in Tripoli and £1,000 sent now to the British Consul-General at Salonica. The total amount altogether sent to Turkey, exclusive of contributions to the Mission, is Rs 1,51,850.

WE HAVE received a cheque for Rs 550-0-0 from the Officer Commanding the 15th Lancers, on account of subscriptions towards the Turkish Relief Fund contributed by all Indian ranks of the 15th Lancers (Curzon's Mullania).

While it is only natural that our soldiers should feel sympathy with the victims of the Balkan War and desire to contribute their mite towards the relief of suffering, we cannot but feel gratified that their Commanding Officer should have regarded the desire with sympathy and, after collecting the subscriptions, forwarded them himself. We have no doubt that among all Moslem soldiers of the Indian Army such desire exists, and we trust the Officers Commanding other Indian Regiments will follow the admirable example set by Colonel H. M. Johnston. We could have taken the lead in this matter ourselves and gone to collect subscriptions to large Cantonment Stations. But we did not wish to be misunderstood and have waited for the C. O.'s to initiate the work. We think we know the temper of our people better, and we can confidently say that such action as Colonel Johnston's would increase rather than diminish the loyalty of our troops.

ON ACCOUNT of the Annual Reunion of the Old Boys at Aligarh which is to come off on the 21st and the 22nd instant and the meetings of the All-India Moslem League and the Moslem University Committee to be subsequently held at Lucknow, it would be difficult to issue the Comrade on the 22nd March. We are naturally averse to taking leaves especially in the case of weekly journals, and we have never departed from the principle except on the occasion of our transfer from Calcutta to Delhi when it was obviously impossible to issue the Comrade till an entirely new press had been set up. On this occasion, however, we feel that we may legitimately claim a week's leave, not as a holiday but to enable the editorial staff to take part in communal discussions likely to lead to important results. We trust our readers will not grudge us this concession. We hope to make ample amends by making the next issue of the Comrade, i. e., of the 29th March, much larger than usual.

The Comrade.

Bonds or Boycott?

It was not so long ago that among the Mussalmans of India free expression and the indication of courage and independence were deemed the greatest of political sins, and expediency was the one commandment which had usurped to itself the respect due to the entire political decalogue. When the Comrade made its bow to the public a little more than two years ago it had to conquer many prejudices, for on the one side it was suspected of Muslim fanaticism, and on the other it was looked upon as a political fire-brand that would set the Ganges and the Jumna and the five rivers of the Punjab on fire. It is true that we had strong convictions, and, whatever our convictions, we were in no way afraid of expressing them strongly. But our ideal was political purity not political prudery, and, if we had no desire to earn a reputation for loyalty at the expense of independence, we had no ambition either to achieve popularity with a section of our countrymen who looked askance at Muslim political aspirations, by the simple expedient of sacrificing the interests of that section of the public which constituted the Muslim community. In navigating the perilous seas of Indian politics we were not foolish enough to ignore the existence of Boylla in trying to avoid Charybdis, and, following the course indicated by that seasoned mariner of Aligarh, Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, we marked out for ourselves a course equidistant from servility and sedition. We were determined to give unto Caesar what was due to Caesar, and to give unto God what was due to God. And, although we were conscious of the fact that we could not please all at all times, we felt that we would be able to formulate a policy that would achieve in the long run the mood of approval from the bulk of our people. Two years is indeed too short a period wherein to judge of one's work; but if we survey to-day what we have done, and measure the public approval of our policy and action, we feel assured that after all we have not done so badly, and that in return for that we have not been so poorly rewarded by our numerous constituents. It is not for us to judge our own merits and demerits and imitate the Creator who saw His own handiwork and beheld that it was very good. The verdict must rest with the public, but we have no anxiety about that verdict so far as our own safety and welfare is concerned.

But we are getting anxious about the safety and welfare of our constituents, for a change has come over the surface of things. If it is true that the unparalleled sufferings of the Indian Mussalmans have led them to revise their political charts and reorganise the service of their seamen and their command of the ships, it would not be wholly unpardonable if we took some credit to ourselves for indicating to them the perils of the sea, and initiating them into this new navigation. But it is not wise seamanship to turn the head of the ship from the direction of a shoal near the seashore, which a timid helmsman was hugging all the time, towards a submerged rock in the contrary direction; and, if we desire to claim any credit for the revision of the political chart and a change of direction in the ship's voyage, we cannot disclaim all responsibility if the ship begins to drift towards a new danger. That responsibility we unhesitatingly accept, and we are prepared to face every difficulty that such a responsibility entails.

In the early monsoons, when after a period of drought the thirsty and parched land is flooded with welcome showers, every gargyle begins to spout forth the water of heaven. But that water is not unmixed with the silt and dirt of thirsty days. In the summer the voice of birds is hushed in the garden; but with the first rains every noisy toad and vociferous insect fills the air with a din and clamour that make quiet and rest impossible. In politics also this rule of the rains holds away, and the bursting of the political monsoon heralds the spouting of gargyles and the noise of loads. It seems to us that the Muslim monsoon is on us to-day, for many gargyles are spouting mud and many a toad that was not heard of before is loudly clamant. Nothing is cheaper at the moment than independence of thought and freedom of expression, and the slave of yesterday is the slave-master of to-day. Well may Ghali say:

(Every man of lust has become a worshipper of beauty;

The honour of the cult of beauty's connoisseurs is now gone.)

Our columns which were at one time deemed to be too tempestuous are now regarded by some as stagnant, and what was once an ever-bubbling fountain head of enthusiasm is to-day insufficient to satisfy the thirst of these Falstaffs.

If it be so, so be it. Whatever the outcome of this, we shall at least satisfy those of our opponents who thought that the applause of the crowd was the breath of our nostrils. We have been, and are to-day of the crowd, and for the crowd, and, whatever the crowd may think of us, we shall not give it up in despair. In fact, we think it is as sensible and orderly a crowd as ever existed, if we do not neglect in the comparison the fact that the classes, which consider themselves so superior to the masses, are themselves far from well-informed and disciplined. But, although we regard them as our only final tribunal, from which there is no appeal except to our conscience and to our Creator, we shall not flatter them with the belief that they are at all times able to discriminate between wisdom and ignorance, sincerity and cant. We shall, therefore, unhesitatingly come forward to bar their way whenever we think they are treading the path that leads to destruction; and shall not for a moment waver in our resolve to rescue them from those who, whether through ignorance or selfishness, mislead them. It is sometimes amusing to recollect that we who initiated the Muslim University movement, and who have been, and still are, a very dragon in the path of everyone who would like to capture that institution or its present nucleus at Aligarh, are pointed to as the wreckers of the University by some Muslims and non-Muslims at one and the same time, and that, in spite of having led the way in organising in a practical manner the movement which gave a point and a purpose to the bogey of Pan-Islamism—a bogey that was deemed sinister when it was only a vague aspiration floating in the atmosphere, as devoid of danger as of practical utility—we are considered by some to be a weakling who shrinks from the least effort and sacrifice in the cause of Islam. But our own reputation is an insignificant thing which can be left to take care of itself, and we shall not waste a minute of our time in vindicating it when there is much else to be saved from what threatens, if not prevented in time, to be the universal wreck. It is enough for us to remind our people that

کہتی ہیں لدیہی جسی میں پارہوں تیرا

زہیں بھی نہ تھیں تپسی گرفتارہوں تیرا

(I am he whom they call thy ancient lover, for I was thy prisoner even before thou hadst these curly locks wherewith to imprison me.)

To-day the situation is this. Apart from purely Indian questions—for which a policy must be discovered after consideration of the circumstances surrounding us here in India or in the country that sends to India a majority of its administrators, and not in Turkey or Persia, Morocco or Tripoli—there is the question of Turkey and her fate. Indian Mussalmans shouted themselves hoarse—and not unnaturally or unwisely—when Kiamil's Cabinet seemed determined to sell the birthright of his country and the honour and prestige of Islam without being even assured of the mess of pottage, and appeals were sent to Turkey to desist from the pursuit of such a craven and treacherous policy. But the only justification for such appeals was that the Mussalmans in India were prepared to sacrifice something when they called upon the Mussalmans of Turkey to be prepared in the last resort to sacrifice all. The Turks have shown that they are capable of the sacrifice demanded of them, and it is now for the Mussalmans of India to show that they are prepared to do something to prove their fraternal feeling and love of Islam in a manner beneficial to Turkey and her Muslim population. To us the best and the only practical proof of the sincerity of Indian Mussalmans is the investment of as large a proportion as possible of their ready cash in the Ottoman Treasury Bonds; but to some others it appears that all that is necessary is to preach an impracticable boycott of European goods, and we accept the challenge to prove that the Bond-slaves are after all not so servile as the would-be boycotters would make out.

A good deal has been written about boycott and Swadeshi in the Muslim press, but we shall refuse to consider the economic aspect of the question unless it is contended that the boycott is not a political weapon. Our friends may write as they like to convince Sir James Meeson, but we fear it will not do for us. We are prepared not only to discuss the merits of Swadeshi—and they are many—but also to advertise them; but we must know whether the temper of those who have become Swadeshi is suddenly the temper of the pioneers of commerce and the captains of industry. If, however, boycott is being preached—as at times it may legitimately be preached—as a means of hurting the economies of the people who are otherwise invulnerable, then we can discuss its political effectiveness only as a weapon for hurting the people's enemies.

Now it is clear that the Balkan Allies are the direct cause of the troubles of Turkey, and the boycott must be designed to hurt them in the first instance. Commercially speaking, practically the only important ally is Greece, and the Mussalmans of India have to see wherein they can hurt Greece. So little did they know of matters commercial that, during the Turco-Italian war, beyond boycotting Palli's banqueting hall at Calcutta and Italian cloth which, contrary to its name, is often manufactured elsewhere, the Mussalmans could do nothing to injure Italy, and we do not know if that country felt the sting of the mosquito through its rhino pachyderm. Perhaps all that they know of the commercial activities of Greece to-day is that Greeks are the biggest dealers in Egyptian and Turkish cigarettes, and that Messrs. Ralli Bros. are the leading firm in the export trade of India's agricultural produce. Which of these are Indian Mussalmans going to boycott, and how far do they hope to succeed? We do not for a moment suggest that there should be no boycott of Greece and the Greeks; but the question is whether that is all that can and should be done, if even that can be done with any success.

To us it appears that such a boycott will prove wholly ineffective, and, although it is more likely that the rest of Europe can be hurt a little more grievously, the statistics of European imports into India clearly show that it is England which would be the chief sufferer so far as any suffering is entailed. But England—even the England of Sir Edward Grey and of the Liberal Cabinet—is not the greatest sinner, and unless Russia incurs sufficient loss by the Indian Moslem's boycott the biggest fish will escape through the net. As for England herself, she was the only Power concerned in the boycott preached in Bengal by a community that was united and used to united political effort. But what was the result? The boycott itself failed and not even Lancashire was impressed sufficiently to induce the British Cabinet to alter the policy of the Indian Government. Those highly patriotic gentlemen who are preaching from the text of Bengal have hitherto only shown their absolute innocence of all knowledge of commercial statistics, and were they closely examined on the subject of Bengal's success in boycotting British goods, their dupes would discover that they know no more about trade matters than the veriest tyro who has not yet learnt to hup in commercial numbers.

To turn to the policy of boycott. Unlike the Partition question, at present whatever offence there is lies at the door of the Liberal Cabinet, for the Government of India, led by H. E. the Viceroy, have throughout acted in an irreproachable manner. We have not the faintest doubt that Indian Mussalmans will impress Lancashire with their own futility, but, worse than that, they would set the face of the Government of India against them. For it would be the Government here that will reap the whirlwind for the sowing of the wind by Sir Edward Grey and his colleagues. To put it on the lowest plane, these are mistaken tactics and betray a lack of the sense of proportion as well as of a sense of propriety. Whatever influence the Government of India can exercise in the international relations of England—and those who know the inner history of the Persian crisis know that it has not been a small one—would be lost, or rather the Government of India will be tempted to exercise it against rather than for Indian Mussalmans, and whatever goodwill Indian Mussalmans possess would be lost. It may be said that this goodwill is an asset of no value and that its opposite, namely, the ill-will of the Indian Government, is a liability which the Indian Mussalmans are not afraid to incur. Even if this were true, it must be remembered that the only justification of boycott as that of diplomacy, is its success, and unless that were assured there is no gain to be had out of the boycott, whereas the loss, however patiently borne, would still be a loss.

Under these circumstances we are convinced that those who preach the boycott of British goods are the misguided guides of the people, and, what is far worse, some of them are charlatans who wish to make capital out of the troubles of a distressed community. They think that when once the wine which a Moslem was taught all his life to detest has found a way to his unaccustomed head, and his unconquerable detestation of this fiery liquid is at last overcome, the only way to win his approval and secure his money is to give a more potent potion, and thus each draught that is presented to his lips is fiercer than the last. This political alcoholism is indeed such a dangerous menace to the sobriety of Moslem society that we are determined to stake everything on combating it, and we are prepared to face every suspicion and calumny, for we follow him who had said to the preacher from the text of popularity: "If the sun is placed on my right hand and the moon on my left, by God I will still say only that which I believe." We have ourselves set a new value on distinctions and recognitions which have not the solid basis of popular respect and affection, and it is a secret to some that any such recognition would embarrass us more than please us. As for our safety, that is in the hands of God, and not of Governments; and, although few may have known it, we have not been unaware of the slender string which has sustained our liberty during the last six months. But we have never desired to parade our readiness for every fate that may be ours, nor do we wish to show our wounds like the candidates for the Consular honours of Republican Rome. All that we may, however, say at present, by way of apology for any timidity that may be detected in our conduct and expressions, is that we still regard it a higher honour to be the Ghaazi than the Shahed, the victor rather than the victim of despotism.

All that has been said before has been concerned merely with the merits and chances of success of the boycott as an absolute factor. But the boycott is not an absolute factor, for at present it is certain to clash with the activity necessary for an early sale of the Ottoman Treasury Bonds. In fact, we have reason to believe that some at least among the prominent preachers of boycott are those who wish it to be a substitute for whatever sacrifice there may be in purchasing the Bonds. It combines the minimum of sacrifice with the maximum of fame, and it is its worst condemnation that, although it may lead in certain not impossible contingencies to the sacrifice of many innocent Moslem lives, it will provide powder and shot for the death of not a single soldier of the Balkan Allies. If Turkey was asked to-day whether she would rather have a futile boycott of European goods by Indian Moslems, for which they may have to pay grievously, or a million sterling as a loan for which she is prepared to pay them a handsome bonus, and which may assist her to tide over her difficulties at the most serious crisis in her national life, we have no doubt whatever of Turkey's answer. That answer and the welfare of our own people in this country are the only answers for which we have an ear, and the din of unpopularity and the hisses and the hootings of any section of the Moslem community in India will be as entirely lost upon us as the whispers of interested officials who may wish to use us for any purpose of their own. This is the path we have carved out for ourselves, and with God's help we shall not waver from it a hair's breadth. Those who may choose to go with us will find in us a fellow traveller and a comrade. But those who choose to follow another path may do so without waiting for such an insignificant thing as our approval. To them we say:

لَكُمْ دِينُكُمْ وَلِيَ دِينِ *

(To you your faith; to me mine.)

It has been suggested to us by those who are convinced of the inwardness of our convictions that while going our own way we need not point the error of their ways to others that go in another direction. They suggested to us that there should be two wings among the Mussalman, each respecting and tolerating the other. To this suggestion our answer is that, although in political creeds compulsion is no more possible than in spiritual convictions, yet it is subversive of all that we hold dear in the faith of Islam to encourage castes and sections and we cannot tolerate such toleration of political schisms and castes as has been suggested. There are no Sudras and Brahmans in Islam. All Mussalmans are one community and one caste, and whatever the path they choose for themselves the highroad or the lower road, Mussalmans must ever travel together. Therefore, so long as there is strength in us, we shall not cease to point out the virtues of the one and only way, and shall never consent to a compromise which was rejected more than thirteen centuries ago by one whom we humbly follow, who refused to concede that the idols of Ka'ba had any share of the divinity of the God of Ka'ba.

Is there really such a plethora of earnest workers among Mussalmans in India that they can afford to split their society into wings and sections? Will they dare to look at their political and educational organisations and say that they are fully and properly manned? The Secretaryship of the Aligarh Trustees was the most important office in the communal organism, and yet when failing health and infirmities incidental to age compelled Nawab Viqueer-ul-Mulk to retire, the office went literally begging, and was offered to the only Mussalman who could afford to live at Aligarh and devote his time to the work.

The Secretaryship of the All-India Moslem League captured the fancy of the younger generation, but its first Secretary could not remain in the country; and its second Secretary looked for its sake the work at Aligarh for which he was better fitted, and at his death left the League almost as moribund as he had found it. Since his sad demise the office has not yet been permanently offered to any one, for the simple reason that no one is prepared to spend even a couple of hours a day on the duties of this office. The officiating Secretary is the only one who seems prepared to do even that which is being done, and while we are ready to criticise him as moralesly as any of the New Patriots, they are no more ready with a substitute for him than we. Even the members of the League and its Council are indifferent to the League's fate, so that we shall not be unjust to Mr. Shafi if we say that he was elected President of the forthcoming session chiefly because no other name was proposed. But is the Moslem community at large any more mindful of its duty than its much-abused representatives? The League is supposed to have been sold to the Aga Khan; but we ask if the community made the least effort to renew it from the auctioneer. Even Rs. 20 a year is, it seems, too high a price to pay for the League's financial independence, and the roll of membership, and even more than that, its list of arrears of subscriptions laughs to scorn the loud claims of the New Patriotism. When the League's Constitution was first framed we took a considerable share in the work, and it was our anxious care to make it a really representative assembly broad-based on a system of delegation from Town and District Leagues to Provincial Leagues, and from Provincial Leagues to the All-India League. But so indifferent has the community been to the political work that in the last six years only a few District Leagues have been formed and practically every District League and Provincial League—and particularly the Behar League of Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque—have been rotting carcases rather than living institutions, and to-day it is financial reasons rather than political sagacity which have suggested the complete reversal of the League's Constitution.

The Educational Conference is the special perquisite of an unchanging and unchangeable Joint Honorary Secretary, who has seen to it that, whosoever may come or go, he goes on for ever. And yet, even if he had upset this Permanent Settlement of the office upon himself by more equitable and reasonable rules, we do not know whether we could have found a substitute for him if he had elected to resign.

Even the recent activity of the community is the result of a more active journalism; but we do not know of many Moslem journalists who have taken the least share in the practical every-day work of education or politics. Pharisaical as it may sound, we must say we are the only journal that is represented in this work. But we have been able to offer this vicarious sacrifice for our confrères only by neglecting domestic duties, which is a sin, and ruining a once robust health, which is a crime. What is far worse, our journalistic work has suffered more than our most merciless critic could say, and our finances are in a state of utter chaos. But this cannot last, and we must shut shop and declare ourselves insolvent if to our multifarious duties we have to add the exhausting task of defending ourselves against every lapse of memory and deliberate misstatement merely to bank a Behar stalwart, who never neglected to represent the wishes of his community on Mr. Banu's Bill and Separate Electorates, of the dignity of a resignation proclaimed to his beloved co-religionists by the town-criers. We are asked to speak out; but we believe we are yet capable of a sacrifice as great as silence at this juncture demands. Those who know us must also know that silence is not our habitual sin; but

ورنہ کیا بات کر نہیں آتی

This state of affairs is in all conscience bad enough, but the main responsibility must be that of the community which has tolerated it so long. The sleeper is at last awakened, but he has not yet been able to collect his senses and his somnolence seems worse than his sleep. In the work of destruction we willing to lend a helping hand, but only if out of the materials something else is to be constructed. We respect the strength of our Samsons who can pull down huge fabrics; but we are afraid of the blindness which would crush under the debris of what they pull down both friend and foe. The idols must be broken, but the human mind abhors a vacuum and craves for some object of worship. The question is who is it to be. If for Ltd we only substitute Manat, idolatry would still defile the House of God. And if a choice was left to us we would worship the bones of a Syed Ahmad rather than the living body of his best ruler, and even the Satan of Bombay may not compare unfavourably with the Satan of Calcutta. Let us not be too sure that the idols would leave our Ka'ba peacefully. The effort that failed at the Lucknow meeting is a portent of sinister significance.

The Executive and Judicial Functions.

At a meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council held on the 7th March, the Hon. Mr. Surendranath Banerji moved that grants made to local Governments be increased by such allotments as the Government of India may think fit, with a view to carry out the experiment of separation of Judicial and Executive functions in the administration of criminal justice in areas to be selected by local Governments with the approval of the Government of India. Mr. Banerji said that the experiment was to be a tentative measure which was not to be incorporated into the regular administrative machinery until it had been tried and found successful. In the second place, he declared, the experiment was not to be tried all over the country or even in all Regulation provinces, but in selected areas. "What the Resolution sought to do," he explained, "was to secure the acceptance of the principle in a definite form, leaving its application to such parts of the country as the Government might in its wisdom decide upon." All the Indian members of the Council that took part in the debate gave the unqualified support to the Resolution. The Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock, however, urged the Council to reject it and accordingly it was negatived by 37 votes to 25.

There are two points of the utmost significance that the debate initiated by Mr. Banerji has brought prominently to light. All enlightened and responsible opinion in the country, irrespective of race and creed distinctions, has grown unanimous and resolute in its demand for a great administrative reform. The Government attitude is, on the other hand, still evasive and irresolute, though we doubt if official catchwords and formalities can render the demand less insistent. To the Home Member, who lightly dismissed it as "vague," the remarkable vote of the non-official minority must afford some food for reflection. His speech is the Council has naturally caused immense surprise and disappointment in the country, for he seems almost to have receded from the position that Sir Harvey Adamson as Home Member defined a few years ago in his famous pronouncement on the subject. The Government had then practically committed themselves to a formal acceptance of the principle, and they had promised to initiate a limited experiment in selected areas before evolving a definite scheme for wider application. The Hon. Mr. Banerji's resolution was merely intended to remind the Government of their promise and ascertain the manner in which they were going to redeem it. The attitude of the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock has made it painfully clear that, so far as the Government is concerned, the separation of Judicial and Executive powers in the administration of the country is still an open question. His fugitive reference to the pledge given by Sir Harvey Adamson, and the special emphasis he laid on "the difficulties," discovered through correspondence with local Governments, would seem to indicate the kind of official sympathy with which the "question" is likely to be considered.

We need not solemnly set about in this year of grace to discuss the desirability of the reform in question. A primitive society may have its policeman, its judge, its revenue officer, and its military leader rolled into one. But as soon as a certain standard of civilisation is reached, the need for the division of functions becomes imperative. It can no longer be maintained with reason that conditions in India to-day still permit nothing better than a primitive type of administration. Indeed, the case for reform is so obvious that Government has never seriously questioned its merits. Official objections have been mainly urged on financial grounds and sometimes the never-failing theory of "Prestige" has been called into requisition. It has never been effectively denied that the separation of Judicial and Executive functions is desirable on principle. All we have heard in opposition to the public demand is that the reform would be too costly and that it might impair the efficiency of the administration by divesting the district officer of much of his dignity and prestige. The latter plea is based on a curious doctrine of statecraft. We are, in effect, asked to believe that the efficiency of administration in India can only be attained by keeping the mass of the people in a state of perpetual awe. Such a theory of governance would have never come to grief in the history of the world if Providence had ordained that the sheep existed solely for the sake of the shepherd. In that case, an ideal State would be a hierarchy of irresponsible gods controlling the lives of mere men with a simple gesture or a frown. Why does an Indian district officer need his prestige? To maintain the peace and the authority of the law? These are, of course, the primary duties of an executive officer, but they can best be discharged by inspiring confidence in the hearts of the people.

As for financial difficulties, we have not yet been definitely told that they are insuperable. Let us, however, assume that the cost would be enormous and that it would put a severe strain on the finances of India. Even this consideration cannot be held to justify the forbidding attitude of the Government. The Indian people are already paying a huge price for a costly administration. Every now and then its efficiency is called into question, and every now and then an improvement in efficiency is secured by an increase in annual expenditure. We are persuaded, for our part, that while much of the existing expenditure is necessary, a considerable portion of it is wasteful and could be reduced appreciably by a wise policy of retrenchment. But even if the Indian Government could not spare a pie by a skilful husbanding of its resources, we would urge it to resort to further taxation for the sake of urgent administrative reforms. Money must be found for the purpose of separating the Executive from the Judicial functions as it has always been found for the Army and the emoluments of the Civil Service. The reform does not aim at an administrative Utopia involving incredible outlay. We have yet to know of a civilised country in Europe or elsewhere that has been driven into bankruptcy on account of its having made a clear distinction between its judiciary and its police.

The Council.

BY THE HON. MR. GUY.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It

On the first of March began the real business of a feeble session with the presentation of the Financial Statement. Sir Guy no more in the chair, for H. E. had returned a few days ago from quiet and rest to the din of politics and the business of his high office. But Sir Guy still happier as the bridegroom than as the King presiding over the ceremony. For the first of March a special day of Sir Guy's very own, and to-day he was the monarch of the empty benches he surveyed and the patentee of the day's eloquence. He began with reminding the small audience that this the fifth year of his office and the third of the material well-being of the country since his advent to India. "Sixty per cent.," said the statistician who revels in averages, and "First Division!" said the schoolboy who was himself content with 88 per cent and would be content with 80 or even 25 if he could scrape through examinations. Nobody happier than Sir Guy when proved a false prophet, and sure enough he takes a shaking pleasure when Hon. Members condemn his caution because his financial prognostications are falsified by the steady glare of June when the weather prophet calculated that there would be heavy April showers. Why, the critic himself comes abegging to the falsified weather prophet for a dose of the heaven-sent sunshine of prosperity. Having calculated many thorns to a few roses, Sir Guy still outwardly grumbling that the gardener had given him for a buttonhole a flou harvest rose simply because of a single thorn called Kathiawar. However, acknowledged that no monsoon ever behaved or could behave as she was expected to do, so that disappointments were only make-believes and excuses for not taking off taxes dictated by draughts and deficits.

After a survey of the rainfall he came to a survey of the windfall of five millions from Opium and Railways. Bottom the Weyer wanted to play both Pyramus and Thisbe, and Railway Sleeper no less anxious to take credit for both. Railways are of course Railways, and as for Opium, not even DeQuincy could claim it as his own, against the Sleeper who represented Papaver Somniferum throughout the Council Session. Somehow the drug proved as persistent in the case of Sir Guy as of China and year after year Council regaled with copious draughts from the produce of Malwa and Bikaner. Last year China was very very good, but this year she almost became horrid, and Sir Guy sorely tempted by her to break the pledge and take to the drug again. Bombay merchants watching for every sign of backsliding ready with a lump and a pipe and the smoking stick with which to light Sir Guy's path to financial nirvana, but he only threw them some of the money he had saved for this moral relaxation and kept the pipe still at arm's length. Read a lesson to China and skillfully flattered John Chinaman whose word was his bond, and whose reputation for probity stood high among the nations. Sir Guy, cautious prophet in finance, still more cautious prophet in morality, whispered doubts whether China had not bitten a bigger morsel of morality than she could chew, and almost seemed to hope that the bad old days of prosperous Malwa merchants and Bagdad Jews would come again, and John Chinaman would be another Coleridge going to the opium den in spite of the efforts of his own hirelings appealing to him to think of his wife and children and desist from the black draught.

One and a half million surplus from Opium was matched with three and two-thirds millions net receipts from the Railways, and two and a half millions came from other sources to reward the caution of Sir Guy. Anxious to make his Provincial Harem a sharer in his good fortune, Sir Guy loved nothing better than sitting in the midst of this bunch of beauties giving much anxious thought to the distribution of his surplus. Once more Education and Sanitation proved the favourites, for if their official spouses loved them, their non-official admirers were even more madly fond of them.

Turning towards expenditure, Sir Guy found that the parsimony of the Provinces was balanced by the prodigality of a spendthrift Imperialism, which swallowed exactly as much again as the Provinces had saved. But even then some departments had robbed the hen-roosts of others, and if truth be told, the robbers were not more willing to rob than the robbed themselves to get rid of their belongings. One of the robbers was the Civil Works and the other and bigger, of course, Military Services.

Sir Guy pleaded guilty to the heinous charge of a feeling of surprise and some indignation that calculating Calcutta should have suspected him of financial legerdemain in making the 'four' millions of Delhi expenditure fourteen millions without Calcutta's detecting the trick. He assured Hon. Members with the help of a comprehensive pro forma account, which Calcutta may still call an account rendered incomprehensible and merely for form's sake.

After detailing the revised estimate for the last nine months, Sir Guy came to a new page in India's financial history and opened the budget for the next year. But it is a moot point whether he turned a new leaf in attending to the need of that heavy-laden beast of burden, the ordinary taxpayer. Once more his burden just the same, and in view of the disappearing Opium who could complain of the still appearing Silver, Tobacco and Petroleum taxes that disappear into Sir Guy's hands?

Dealing with the provision for next year's revenue, Sir Guy announced the total disappearance of certified Opium and thus the decrease of three and two-thirds millions sterling, and shrewd eyes could at once detect in the confession of this totalism a world of watery eyes and a million chasms of yawns. As for Railways, it is easy to be wise after the event, and Sir Guy refusing this cheap wisdom once more became the prophet of caution. The Railway curve had gone up from a surplus of 1½ millions to 2½ millions, but Sir Guy asked whether the curve was going any higher. May the upward gradient still continue, and may the Railway Sleeper never have to say in reply to the challenge "Halt, who goes down there?" "I, Sir, rolling rapidly."

Coming to expenditure, it was the turn of the non-officials to ask whether the curve was not going higher for ever, for with no Opium and a downward Railway gradient there was still an upward jump of 4½ millions. The Provinces intended to make up for their parsimony by spending 8½ millions more, while the Imperial Government wanted to follow at a distance with a million more, half of which would go to purchase the drowsy juice of Malwa and please the Baghdad Jews and Central India Princes at the same time.

Before turning to Provincial Grants, Sir Guy surpassed his former caution by budgeting on the basis of a two crore Imperial surplus, and this, after having taken the pledge about Opium. He took up his sleeves, and shook his garments and showed his hands. There will be no new tax, and, yet, lo and behold! there was to be double the usual surplus. And those who saw the sleight of hand wondered at the marvels of Sir Guy. There was no Mild Hindu to whisper that the Finance Minister had been a caution all along and had kept on through fat years the additional taxes imposed only after a lean year of deficit. But if anyone had suggested even distantly the lightening of the load, Sir Guy would have pointed to Education and Sanitation, the twins of a phenomenal development—only children a few years ago, and now full-blown flappers, and the Lights of the Imperial Harem. If their numerous admirers were inclined to grudge them additional expenditure, Sir Guy could always trot out the most fetching person of the lot, Swarajbhai, to whose development every youth in the country was longingly looking forward. Even the Mild Hindu could not grudge her anything and this year Sir Guy had bought her freedom from her Provincial owners by paying nearly 80 lakhs. The Mild Hindu's tactics were of the Mango-tree juggler; but here the Government Mal-a brought a goodly basket "from our own gardens"—the first dah from the rulers to the ruled in return for millions of those visiting cards which take the place of meagre paste-board in the gorgeous East.

This, thought Sir Guy, the best introduction for the excess of more than half a million in Military Expenditure, which as originally estimated was pompously proclaimed to have been fixed at a figure below that of any year since 1908-9. But Sir Guy proposes and No-More-Kay and Napoleon B. Haldane dispose; and they were disposed to humble the pride of Sir Guy for Military economy. So they saw to it that unforeseen demands were made, and the end of it was that the Military Expenditure of 1912-13 was far the largest of any for many years past. Well may Bootlair Sahib refuse to commit posterity when Nikhal Sain Sahib's Committee's Report, dealing with "the possibility of effecting further economy in Military Expenditure," is shortly expected. Surely there was a misprint, as poor Sandow H. would have said, when "impossibility" was turned into "possibility." The Report of the Committee which examined the question of Marine Expenditure is "still under consideration," and well may the people fear and tremble, for the final result even now is an increase of the net Military Budget by more than half a million as compared with the current year's budget. Would that there was a Committee to deal with the possibility of effecting further economies in Bootlair Sahib's budget, or something was done to bring the poor taxpayer, to whom nobody is considerate, "under consideration." Calcutta and the Railway Sleeper jubilant. For Sir Guy's inflated balances now entirely at the disposal of the Railways, and the engines are lustily drawing away no less than 12 millions "in spite of the reckless utterances of obviously interested entities." Railway earnings have risen from 4½ per cent in 1909-10 to nearly 6 in 1912-13, but the more modest irrigation gives nearly 9 per cent, or if incomplete works are excluded, 10½ per cent. "But who rocks the Wind when it blows, or loves not the Sun?"

When the Imperial theme was over, Sir Guy turned to Provincial Finance and began to justify the ways of gods to men. He remembered the spitted attacks made on the Punjab Settlements, and no year passes without the patriotic pleadings of the white-robed Pandit on behalf of the Disunited Provinces. "Time brings," said Sir Guy, "the answer," and the Pandit is waiting for time to bring the answer in the shape of gubernatorial pleadings when Orator Meston has had room enough to take the graceful curve and cut the figure of a like him of the Bakery. Even now Beggarly Burma, in spite of the sarcasm of the Mild Hindu, is a veritable Oliver Twist among the Provinces, and little Assam under its Belted Earle, with its representative in the Council, must have a dole. But those grants, said Sir Guy, are in the nature of an investment in the business firm of the armor partner. May the partnership not be dissolved under the stress of paragraph 9 of the Articles of Disassociation?

After a survey of Ways and Means, Sir Guy passed to the adjoining territory of Exchange and Currency where there was some interesting ground to be traversed. The Judicial Enquiry in England has not yet disclosed the true nature and extent of the interest in the purchase of more than seven millions worth of silver by the S. of S. As for the currency, Sir Guy like his Government absolutely neutral in the controversy of rival creeds, but he could express satisfaction at the success of the experiment in currency. Last year he was despondent of converting the S. of S. to turn the Gold Standard Reserve into "liquid gold", which may mean Phil or the latest hair-dye of curly darlings. But whatever it means, Sir Guy has succeeded beyond his hopes. But there was yet another question, namely, the minting of gold in India. The sovereign, he thought, introduces questions of control which are difficult of solution. But—may the Lord pardon us for blasphemy—they seem to have controlled the sovereign well enough on a certain date in the last calendar month of a certain year of grace. Sir Guy chose his position between undue hope and extreme apprehension. He disclaimed the desire for the Midas touch in converting our currency into gold, but to the Drain Theory of English Currency Partisans he put the nasty question, why the gold of India should travel 7,000 miles to get the guinea stamp. Heaven only knows whether this portends the ultimate success of Cromwell House in shutting the doors of England to Indian youth, or only the bogey of Anglo-India, the Silly Simultaneous! Sir Guy thought that in one form or another India would get precisely the amount of gold which she wants and which she is able to pay for. May she pay well for her own, and import not over much of the gilt trash of Great Britain and Greater Humberg. He pointed out that the total additions to the Currency in the three years ending March, 1912, amounted to 65 crores, of which rupees accounted for only 28. All this very good for the gold grabbers, but we trust these figures will not reach Mr Lloyd George's ears. Sir Guy thought it was sometimes forgotten how big India was, and to his mind her growth in the matters with which he was more particularly concerned outstripped the ordinary conceptions of it. Heaven forbid that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may discover the latest fiscal Antipoon for the fat of the land. Our mints may not be the best in the world, but Sir Guy knew of none better. Unlike the Battle of the Sites and the Battle of the Styles, the Battle of the Mints had now lasted for 15 years, and Sir Guy was delighted that the Indian Gold Mint was engaging its opponents in a decisive combat just before he was going to seek the victories of peace and retirement.

Only natural that at the end of five eventful and well-crammed years of work Sir Guy should ruminate over what had been done. When he came towards the end of 1908 India had just passed through a period which in their elaborate distinctions Government call "distressful scarcity." There was a deficit of 3½ millions, but even the next year—the year of hopefulness—which came with a good monsoon, failed to enter briskly into the ill-ventilated Department of Finance. The cyclone of taxation had, however, found many a chink and crevice. Next year prosperity returned, but taxation had found in the Department a bourne from which such travellers never return. With recurring surpluses of enormous sizes Sir Guy felt the need of an apology. But although he was too uncomfortable to remain silent, he remained proudly and defiantly unrepentant. And what was the reason behind which this sturdy but amiable heathen took cover in his last fight with the financial evangelists? Guess, O reader, and guess again, but I trow thou wilt fail if thou guessest till Domesday, and that because thou hast been introduced to Sir Guy's apology, has dined and snipped with it, nay has lain with it till familiarity has led to satiety, and satiety to a desire for a perpetual and irrevocable divorce, in spite of all that the Archbishop of York, the Brahmin's Shastras and Katharine of Spain may say to the contrary. It is none other than that old jail-bird Res Jutcata, alias Settled Fact, alias Final Decision. Sir Guy does not suggest taxation up to the hilt; but, if the Poet Laureate of his land wished to broadbase the Empire on the representation of the people's will, Sir Guy, the Financier Laureate, would broadbase it on the taxation of the people's wealth. But thanks to thee, Sir Guy, that if thou hast broadened the basis of taxation and not reduced the weight of the expenditure pyramid thou hast also broadened the basis of expenditure and has been pushing up Bootlair Sahib's twins to the splendid isolation of No-More-Kay. Perdution catch my soul, but I do love thee. May thou still remain in Delhi, the abode of Deputy-Commissionered Peace and Alipur Road Prosperity.

The War Supplement

News of the Week.

London, Mar. 8.

The King received Hakkı Pasha at Buckingham Palace yesterday and introduced him to Sir Edward Grey.

The reply of the Allies to the Powers' offer of mediation is still awaited. It is stated in Berlin that information hitherto received indicates that the unqualified assent of the Allies is not expected.

An Athens telegram states that General Sontzo has been appointed Governor of Janina which the Crown Prince entered yesterday. The Queen has proceeded to that city also. The Turkish prisoners in Epirus total a hundred thousand.

London, Mar. 10.

A Sofia message states that the Minister of Finance yesterday intimated that representations would be made to Belgrade regarding the expulsion from Monastir of the manager of the local branch of the Bulgarian National Bank by the Servians.

An Athens message says that two squadrons of cavalry reconnoitring north of Janina on Friday captured 2,300 Turkish fugitives.

Five thousand more Servian troops with a number of Turkish Krupp guns have sailed from Salonica for San Giovanni di Medua to help the Montenegrins at Scutari. The rest of a complete division will follow.

The Daily Telegraph's special correspondent at Janina wires that the place is a natural fortress of the first magnitude. He says that Essad Pasha, the commandant, told him that over a million sterling had been spent on the fortifications. The Greek losses in the final battle are estimated at 1,800, but the Epirus campaign, lasting four months, has cost the Greeks 15,000 casualties.

In his speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament to-day the King, referring to the peace negotiations, much regretted that owing to the failure of the delegates to come to an agreement war continues. The possible developments of war and resulting changes are of interest to the great Powers who are neutral and are parties to the Treaty of Berlin. All these parties earnestly desire to prevent war from spreading and to see it terminate as soon as possible. "My Government, especially through the Ambassadors in London, has kept in close touch and co-operation with the other Powers in the endeavours in which all have shared to preserve concerted action and to establish agreement on all points on which differences are possible. Herein a large measure of success has been achieved. Agreement in principle has been reached on matters of the greatest importance. Some points are still under discussion but I am hopeful that the consultations between the Powers will enable them to secure a complete understanding among themselves and hasten the conclusion of war. My Government will continue to co-operate with the other Powers with the most earnest desire to secure the peace of Europe."

In the debate on the Address Mr. Bonar Law said that he would welcome the assurance that the Balkan War would be speedily terminated.

Mr. Asquith said that the deliberations of the Ambassadors had resulted in an agreement on two vital points. The first was the question of the Adriatic littoral and Servia's economic access thereto. Secondly the Powers were unanimous in accepting an autonomous Albania under a European guarantee. With regard to its frontiers agreement on one or two points only, which were not vital points, was required to secure complete concord between the Powers. They were at present awaiting the Allies' reply with reference to mediation. He was glad that Rumania and Bulgaria were in process of availing themselves of the mediation of the Power.

The diplomatic grouping of the Powers had not altered. Neither with France nor Russia were our relations less cordial or intimate. "We intend to retain these friendships." There was change in the relations between the groups which were becoming increasingly cordial. Powers like ourselves less directly interested in the Near East had co-operated earnestly to find a path of agreement for all. "Therein we have worked with a single-minded desire with Germany. Co-operation has not only made the path of diplomacy pleasant, but we trust and believe inspired a mutual sense of confidence which will continue between the two great nations."

Mr. Asquith paid a tribute to the conciliatory spirit of the representatives of all the Powers' Ambassadors at the Conference, and also to Sir Edward Grey's unexampled patience, resolution and sagacity.

In the debate on the Address in the House of Lords Lord Lansdowne's speech followed closely the lines of that of Mr. Bonar Law. Dealing with the Balkans Lord Lansdowne said "I have a certain feeling for an old ally who has fallen on evil day an ally who has fought with gallantry and devotion, whose people are co-religionists with a great body of His Majesty's loyal subjects in India."

London, Mar. 1

A message to the Times from Salonica states that the Bulgarians were refused admission to the village of Nigrita near Seres by the Greeks.

The Bulgarians thereupon bombarded the village with field guns on the 5th instant. The Greeks replied with rifle fire. The attack was continued on the 6th March and was still in progress on the 7th when the messenger left.

Lat

The official despatches show that fighting at Nigrita between the Greeks and the Bulgarians has been very serious. There were numerous casualties on both sides. The Bulgarian and Greek Governments have taken the matter in hand and are sending commissions to the spot.

London, Mar. 1

The semi-official Sofia journal Mir says that the Allies have decided to accept the mediation of the Powers on the basis of the conditions laid down in London plus an indemnity. Hostilities will continue in the meantime.

It is stated in Vienna that Austria has taken steps in London with a view to inducing the Powers collectively to demand from Belgrade an explanation of the despatch of additional troops Durazzo after the ambassadors had agreed to recognise the independence of Albania.

The Austrian minister in Belgrade has protested against the despatch of Servian troops to the assistance of Montenegrins at Scutari and has requested that they be recalled.

M. Pasic replied that Servia was compelled to assist her allies irrespective of the fate of Scutari.

A message to the Times from Salonica states that the fighting at Nigrita continued all yesterday between the Greeks and the Bulgarians.

The Bulgarians retreated at night across the Karasu river. The Greeks pursued them and burned bridges. The Bulgarians hoisted the white flag. The Greek losses were fifteen killed and forty wounded, while 120 Bulgarians were captured.

The negotiations between Rumania and Bulgaria have been transferred to St. Petersburg where they will come within the purview of M. Sazonoff, Foreign Minister, and the foreign ambassadors.

The Austro-Hungarian and Russian Governments have issued an identical communication stating that the recent exchange of letters between Emperor Francis Joseph and Tsar Nicholas have again shown that the events in the Balkans have not affected the feelings of friendship of the two sovereigns, and that the maintenance of peace continues to be their aim.

The two Governments, therefore, have decided that the purely defensive measures taken in the frontier provinces are no longer necessary. Austria-Hungary is accordingly reducing the number of her troops in Galicia to normal, while Russia is dismissing reservists due to be dismissed last autumn.

The semi-official Fremdenblatt (Vienna) welcomes the demobilization of the frontiers as indicating an improvement in the relations between Austria and Russia and the recognition by Russia of the sincerity of Austria's policy with regard to the Balkans which make possible the final obliteration of the sources of Austro-Russian discord.

London, Mar. 13

The Pall Mall Gazette states that a private code message has been received in London from Sofia saying that after desperate fighting the Bulgarians captured the fort of Heitintarla taking 400 prisoners and that they expected to enter Adrianople on Wednesday.

The Turkish warship Hamidiye, whose whereabouts since the 17th February have been a mystery, yesterday fired fifteen shells into the Servian camp at Durazzo, but caused no damage. The vessel then retired.

The Hamidiyeh bombarded San Giovanni di Medua and then proceeded in the direction of the Italian coast.

This action has alarmed Serbia, which is engaged in sending troops and transports to take part in the siege of Scutari.

The reply of the Allies to the note of the Powers will ask, says a Sofia telegram, for a line from Mida to Rodosto as the frontier between Bulgaria and Turkey, the cession of all occupied territories with fortresses, also the Aegean islands, and the payment of a war indemnity.

A Constantinople message says that serious fighting took place at Bulair on the 11th instant, the Turkish fleet co-operating with the troops.

A Cetigne telegram says that after bombarding Durazzo the Hamidiyeh fired at and badly damaged four transports at San Giovanni di Medua, two of which are still burning. The Hamidiyeh then proceeded in the directions of Duleigno and Antivari without, however, bombarding them and then steamed for Italy.

While the announcement of demobilisation is welcomed in Vienna disappointment is expressed that the measure only applies to Gallies leaving thousands of reservists on the Serbian frontier.

The announcement of Sir Percy Scott's impending retirement was made at a banquet of the Association of Chambers of Commerce at which Mr. Sidney Buxton and Prince Lichnowsky, the German Ambassador in London, were among the guests.

Mr. Buxton declared that the war in the Near East had had one considerable result, in bringing together the great nations of Europe in more friendly relations.

London, Mar. 14.

A Belgrade message says that the Turkish warship Hamidiyeh after bombarding Durazzo departed to San Giovanni di Medua where it bombarded the Serbian barracks but with little effect, the artillery returning fire.

As the Hamidiyeh was withdrawing it shelled two Serbian transports. Both were set on fire and considerable damage was done to supplies and ammunition. Fifty men were killed.

It is believed in Constantinople that the additional demands which the Allies will present to the Powers demanding full rights for their subjects in Turkey will prove another stumbling block to the conclusion of peace. It is feared that the attempts at mediation will end in a failure.

Enver Bey's Expedition.

The armistice expired on February 8. On the 4th and 5th fighting took place between Kavakkani and Hexamili, in which the Turkish forces took the offensive, but were repulsed, losing by all accounts some 1,200 men. The Bulgarians then advanced. A feigned retreat on the part of their advance guard drew a Turkish force under an extremely heavy artillery fire to the west of Kavakkani. On the 7th, 8th, and 9th the Bulgarians occupied Hexamili, and pressed down towards Bulair until they were checked partly by a Turkish counter-attack, partly by the landing at Sharkeui of the advance guard of the Tenth Army Corps, of which Enver Bey is the actual, if not the nominal, commander.

The landing, which took place on February 8, was covered by an inshore squadron, composed of the gunboat "Zuhaf" and some torpedo craft and by the heavy artillery of the battleship "Torgut Reis," "Harbarose," and the cruiser "Medjidiyeh." Between 6 and 7 in the morning the fleet appeared off Sharkeui, then steamed north, followed by the transports, which then turned towards the Asiatic coast and finally steamed in towards Indjir Point, west of Sharkeui, while the main squadron returned and bombarded the hills above Sharkeui from 9 to 10 in the morning. The actual landing, covered by the "Zuhaf" and torpedo craft, was effected near Indjir Point. Pontons were towed in by launches and smaller transports. Two pontoon bridges were put into position under cover of fire from the "Zuhaf" by 12, when the advance guard landed, covered by the fire of the main fleet. The Bulgarians seem to have offered no resistance till about half the landing force, which comprised, it is believed, the best part of two divisions, was ashore. They then opened a heavy fire from the woods between Indjir Point and Sharkeui. The fleet bombarded the hills a third time, but it was not till late in the afternoon that the town was actually occupied and the Bulgarian flag hauled down. The hills above Sharkeui seem to have been occupied towards nightfall, the Bulgarians retiring to higher ground inland. Fighting was very sharp at several points, the Bulgarians using hand-bombs. Fighting continued during the night of the 8th-9th. The fleet used searchlights in support of the troops.

The losses incurred in the operations of the two days are believed to have amounted to fifteen officers and 800 men. The sequel is unknown, but there is reason to believe that Enver Bey found the force landed as unable to make headway as were the Italians in Tripoli.—The Times.

Three Days' Battle at Scutari.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Cettigne, Feb. 18.

THE recent attack on Scutari was the Montenegrin Army's first taste of fighting on a large scale. The three days' battle was very heavy, as the several thousands of wounded which fill all the available accommodation here and at Podgoritza testify. The result achieved would seem to amount merely to a tightening of the band encircling the town. Except on the Tarabosh side I cannot speak from personal observation, owing to the practical impossibility of getting from one section of the theatre of operations to another, but in that quarter, according to good information, the Montenegrins lost nearly a thousand in killed and wounded. In the capture of Great Bardanjolt—the Turks, in spite of statements to the contrary, seem still to be in possession of the lower portion of the hill—and in the repulse of the Turkish counter-attack on the Montenegrin trenches in the plain General Vukotitch is believed to have lost nearer 4,000 than 3,000 men. This is a very heavy loss out of a force of about 30,000, but the possession of Bardanjolt has been decided. This is a step forward for the Montenegrins, since the position dominates the town from the north-east.

In the capture of Bushat, and in the attack on Berdica the Serbian casualties are reported—though as to this there is no definite information available—to have been 500 or 600. Scutari, in fact, has proved itself capable, hitherto at all events, of withstanding the attack of 50,000 to 60,000 troops, although it must not be forgotten that, possibly through over-confidence in their powers, the Serbians have not been supplied with anything in the nature of heavy artillery.

The report that the continuation of the attack is being delayed owing to the difficulty which the Serbians have experienced in assaulting Berdica in consequence of the water-logged state of the country is, at all events, only half the truth. The facts would seem to be that they over-estimated their own strength and under-estimated the strength of Scutari. Until by bringing up heavier guns and probably more men—which in the case of the former, at any rate, have to come either from Serbia or from the occupied districts of Macedonia—the weight of their attack has been increased, the Serbian commander has decided to desist. The Montenegrins are also preparing to strengthen their artillery, and, presumably, the completion of these preparations will mark the resumption of the attack. Meanwhile a desultory bombardment is being kept up by the Montenegrin guns, some of which, whether intentionally or from very bad marksmanship it is impossible to say for certain, have succeeded latterly during the night time—according to statements made by Montenegrin soldiers—in dropping a number of shells into the town of Scutari itself.

The immediate failure of the long-postponed attack, accompanied as it was by heavy loss, is naturally a bitter disappointment, more especially as, by the acceptance of Serbian aid, it was hoped that success was assured. So far as the faulty organization permits, efforts are being made on all sides to cope with the flood of wounded men, but the arrangements for their proper transport and housing are most inadequate. It must not be forgotten that throughout the war Montenegro has been almost entirely dependent for medical assistance on foreign countries. The withdrawal of several of these missions, including the British, during the armistice has left the country most inadequately provided with surgeons and skilled helpers. While, therefore, it is impossible not to criticize the manner in which the Montenegrin authorities have failed to profit by experience with regard to the transport of the wounded, such criticism cannot but be tempered by the unpleasant thought that England and other nations, which by sending Red Cross missions to Montenegro, assured this country of help, have by the premature withdrawal of this help left her in the lurch at a most critical moment.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society.

WE have received the following summary of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society's work during the Balkan War. The Society is under the patronage of His Imperial Majesty Sultan Mohamed Rashad V:—

PREAMBLE.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society, although it is a national institution, has passed to a state of an international one, after the decisions taken by the General Convention Act and by the Hague Conference. It is an impartial benevolent Society, which helps even the wounded men of the enemies' armies. Its income is derived from public donations and subscriptions.

The Society's Central Office is composed of 30 members. They are elected by the Society's founders and active members at a general annual meeting. The Central Office is composed of honorary members as follows: one President, two Vice-Presidents, one General Secretary, one Book-keeper, one Treasurer. But during this period of war, when business increased on a great scale, additional clerks were engaged and paid.

The Imperial Ottoman Government may, at any time of the year, cause the accounts of the Society to be inspected.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society is the only institution of the kind in Turkey. Nobody is permitted to found a similar institution.

Notwithstanding its very short existence of 18 months, the Society has done a great deal of good work in Tripoli of Africa and in Bengazi, and has expended about 30,000 Turkish Pounds (1) for the setting up and the maintenance of hospitals.

As to the expenses incurred and work done during the Balkan War full particulars are given below which will be a logical and categorical answer to the malicious attacks and publications directed against the Society and its members, who, gratuitously, are working day and night by setting up hospitals, taking care of the sick and wounded, providing the military and municipal hygienic institutions with medical stores, giving them practical assistance, helping the cholera patients of the army, the refugees and persons affected with various illnesses, etc.

The utility of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society has met with recognition from philanthropists and subscribers in Turkey, in Bosnia, in Egypt, in India, in South Africa, and in other countries who have placed in the hands of the Central Office different sums to be applied for the benefit of this charitable institution. To all the philanthropists and subscribers the Ottoman Red Crescent Society conveys openly its sincere thanks.

A.—HOSPITALS.

On the 20th Eiloul 1328 [4 October, 1912] the Central Office Council held a general meeting under the presidency of His Highness Hussein Hâim Pasha, first President of the Society, in order to advise what to do during war time.

It has been decided:

(a) To appoint to each hospital of 100 beds one chief-physician, 1 operator, 1 physician, 2 assistant physicians, 1 chemist, 1 manager (quartermaster), 1 steward, 2 medical students (stagiaires) of the Imperial Ottoman Medical School, 11 trained nurses, 1 store-keeper, 1 cook, 1 scullion and 3 servants (men).

(b) To provide each patient with four suits of clothes and four suits of bed linen, the whole clean and in conformity with the requirements of modern hygiene.

(c) To assure the maintenance of each hospital at least for a period of four months.

In Constantinople were founded three hospitals, namely, the Cadirga Hospital, with 200 beds, the University Hospital, with 600 beds, and the Wafa Idadié Hospital, with 150 beds. The three are under the direction of the most learned and clever operators and physicians, who have attended many thousands of wounded and patients. The Cadirga Hospital, previously arranged for 100 beds has, later, by building barracks, been enlarged so that it may contain 200 beds. The expenses incurred for this purpose amounted to 1,130 Turkish Pounds.

Besides the arrangements made in Constantinople, the needs of the Army of the East and the Army of the West have been taken into consideration. The Ottoman Red Crescent Society has founded one hospital in Adrianople and another in Salonica with 250 beds each. Both are still doing good work.

One hospital with 150 beds has been founded in Uskub. Its work lasted over a month, till no more wounded remained in it. The continuation of the work of the hospital organized with 150 beds in Lüle Burgaz has been impossible. The material and stores provided for the Society's hospitals of Janina, Monastir, Al-lasonna, Sentari and the medical personnel appointed to them, did not reach their respective places, owing to the closing of the roads.

As to the medical material used in the service of the hospitals of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society, it has been decided that it shall be of the best quality. A great deal of medicine and numbers of surgical instruments have been bought in Europe. Two French hospitals sets of the types "Hôpital de Campagne" and "Hôpital Territorial" have been brought from France, four field hospitals for 100 beds each, from England and five complete sets of surgical instruments from Germany.

A sum of 5,000 Turkish Pounds has been spent for the purchase of medicated cotton wool, bandages and medicines.

Two of the four field-hospitals brought from England for the total price of 4,000 Turkish Pounds have been sent, on behalf of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society, to Sentari and have been placed under the direction of two British operators and two assistant operators, specially engaged for this purpose.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society undertook the necessary expenses for sending to Adrianople a medical mission, kindly organized by the German Red Crescent Society. This mission arrived at Sofia, but the Bulgarian authorities did not allow it to go to Adrianople. The Ottoman Red Crescent Society is still working to obtain leave for the mission to proceed to this town.

A great deal of medical material has been newly sent to Adrianople for use in the Ottoman Red Crescent Society's hospital.

Two hospitals, one in Dardanelles with 200 beds and one in Gallipoli with 50 beds, have been recently opened and provided with all the necessary material.

The Society has further decided to have manufactured artificial legs, arms, hands, and feet for the wounded, who have lost one of these members after a surgical operation in one of its hospitals. This decision is already being put into execution.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society distributes underclothes and clothes to the wounded, who, after regaining health, leave hospital for home.

The persons being in the service of the Society wear the uniform with the emblem of the Red Crescent. Those who attend cholera patients wear boots and special clothes, and are protected against contagion.

B.—REST STATIONS.

The formation in Europe of rest stations being of great importance the Ottoman Red Crescent Society has arranged some of them in order to assure help to the sick and wounded while they halt on their way for the purpose of, it may be, resting for the night, or merely for the issue of food or light refreshments. After taking the advice of the military medical Department, the Society has opened rest stations in Tcherkess-Keuy, in Tchorlon, in Lüle Burgaz, in Kouleli-Bougaz, in Pavli-Keuy, and in Sirkedji, provided them with the necessary provisions and appointed to each of them 1 manager, 1 cook and several servants for the distribution of tea, soup, bread and other refreshments. Among these stations those of Sirkedji, Lüle-Burgaz and Pavli-Keuy started working at first, but the two latter have been transferred to Sparta-Koule and to San Stefano. These three stations, and especially the rest station of Sirkedji, have done a great deal of good work by providing food and refreshments for the wounded and sick who arrived by hundreds. A physician and two men for the purpose of disinfecting have been appointed to each of these stations.

C.—HELP TO CHOLERA PATIENTS.

When this terrible epidemic broke out among soldiers at Hadim-keuy, the Ottoman Red Crescent Society made haste to send to this place tents and medical assistance with the necessary material that the situation required. A hospital settled at first, in tents, and after partly in barracks, has been arranged in Hadimkeuy for 250 beds. Two other hospitals, one with 150 and other with 70 beds, have been arranged in San Stefano and in Sparta, respectively. They have been settled in tents, brought from England and from Germany.

Soldiers suffering from cholera and sent from Tchataldja to Constantinople have been sheltered in the Mosques Sainte Sophie, (Aya Sofia) Sultan Ahmed, Nour Osmanie and Mahmoud Pasha, and on the 3rd Teshrin-ewel 1328 (16 October 1912) the Ottoman Red Crescent Society decided to provide for their maintenance. The cholera patients of the Mosque Sainte Sophie have been, later supported by a commission formed by the ministry of Public Education, to which the Society offered 3,600 kilog. of bread.

According to statistical figures, there has been, on the average, distributed to each of the cholera patients 1 kilog bread per day, soup in the morning, meat with potatoes or peas and rice with meat in the evening.

From the 6th Teshrin-ewel to the 25th Teshrinusani (from the 19th October to the 8th November 1912) 1,251 patients have been treated for cholera, in the Mosque of Nour Osmanie, from the 8th to the 24th Teshrin-ewel 1328 (from the 21st October to the 6th November 1912) 447 in the Mosque Mahmoud-Pasha, and from the 6th Teshrin-ewel to the end of Teshrinusani 1328 (from the 19th October to the 3rd December 1912) 1,200 in the Mosque of Sultan Ahmed.

D.—AID TO THE FOREIGN MEDICAL MISSIONS.

In order to help the wounded and sick several medical missions have been organized abroad and sent here by the foreign Red Crescent and Cross Societies. The Ottoman Red Crescent Society welcomed the members of these missions, made arrangements to assure them comfortable quarters. The "Senayi-Nefiso" School (Fine Arts School) has been transformed into hospital and put at the disposal of the British Red Crescent Mission, kindly formed by Sir Ernest Cassel, founder of the National Bank of Turkey.

The cost of altering and equipping the building for this hospital has been borne by the Ottoman Red Crescent Society, which provides 150 beds and 2,100 articles of clothing.

The School "Rashidieh" at Scutari (Bosphorus) has been also transformed into hospital and put at the disposal of another British Red Crescent Society, kindly formed on behalf of Indian people through the Honourable Syed Ameer Ali, of London. The Ottoman Red Crescent Society bore the expenses for the transformation of this School into hospital, provided it with beds and with other articles.

Two Medical Missions arrived from India were welcomed. The one was settled in the University Hospital and the other in the Cadirga Hospital.

The clothes and the material necessary for the Red Crescent's Hospitals organized by the British Colony and by the French School (Ecole de France) at Moda (Bosphorus) have been given by the Ottoman Red Crescent Society, which also provided 25 beds and all the necessary material for the Convalescent Home, arranged for the officers in the Yachting Club, at Prinkipo (Marmara Sea).

E.—AID TO MILITARY AND MUNICIPAL HOSPITALS.

It happened that about 20,000 wounded arrived at Constantinople in a short time. Hospitals were full. Military and municipal authorities took common measures to help the sick and wounded. Many military barracks have been transformed into hospitals. Municipality founded hospitals in various points of the town.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society besides the 3 hospitals with 950 beds that it has founded, brought help to the military and municipal authorities. It gave to the Municipal Hospital of Demir Capou 7,500 Turkish Pounds in cash and the following articles in kind:

Eighteen hundred articles of clothing, 1,000 blankets, 28 rounds of linoleum, 231 kilog. of sublime, 99 kilog. of Serum Hayem, 175 Turkish blankets (yorgan), 74 beds, 28 drawers and 11 cushions.

The following articles have been given by the Ottoman Red Crescent Society to the military authorities:—

Four thousand and ninety-seven canvas cases for beds, 2,800 straw mattresses, 449 beds, 660 cushions, 1,514 blankets, 559 Turkish blankets (yorgan), 12,500 sheets for beds, 8,930 drawers, 7,570 under-clothings, 3,025 morning gowns (antari), 2,750 woolen under-clothing, 559 night caps, 1,200 pairs of stockings, 1,600 pairs of slippers, 49 physician blouses, 40 aprons, 25 cotton cloaks (hırka), 1,512 cups, 78 doz. of spoons, 110 tents, 2,751 matings, 280 complete stretchers, 43 coffins and 1 auto, which can carry 11 men.

The hospital organized at the school (Conleli Idadiasi) received 2,100 articles of various clothing, the Military Hospital of Maidos 830; the Clinical Surgery's Hospital 4,000 cases for cushions, 4,000 under-clothings, 4,000 morning gowns for sick, 4,125 drawers, 4,000 simple sheets and 1,097 cases for mattresses, and the hospitals organized at Bughan Keny, San Stefano, Kara Donroun and Nisban Tash received several articles of various clothing and medical material and stores.

The following articles have been given to the hospital organized by the Women's Branch of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society, at the Imperial Medical School: 117 blankets, 2,850 articles of various clothing, 100 woolen under-clothings, 200 pairs of stockings and bandages.

The municipal Hospital of Pera received 100 articles of clothing. The Jeremiah Hospital 100; the Tash Kishla Hospital 3,290 articles of clothing, 200 pairs of stockings and slippers; the British Hospital at Candilli 550 sets of clothes; the British Red Crescent's Hospital at Scutari (Bosphorus) 312 articles of clothing, the hospital settled at the Greek Ottoman School at San-Stefano 1,200, and the American ambassadress received 200 for the San Stefano Hospital.

Six hundred Turkish Pounds have been spent to put the finishing touch to the barracks built for the wounded and sick.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society ordered from America 30 carriages for the transport of the wounded and decided to give the same to the military medical authorities as a gift of the Society.

Further, the steamship Cambridge of the Ottoman Navigation Company has been fitted out and appropriated for the transport of wounded and sick in the Marmara Sea.

F.—HELP TO REFUGEES.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society, owing to its very short existence and by absence of special institutions, was not prepared to bring immediate help to the sick and refugees who, flying from the tyrannies of the Bulgarian army, arrived at Constantinople. However, being informed that the municipal commission armed in order to help the refugees could, by lack of means, not afford to do anything useful to them, the Society contributed to this work, the sum of 7,500 Turkish Pounds. Besides the contribution it voted further sums to help and supply with provisions 3,500 refugees, living in barracks out of Yedi Conle, and to feed 800 beasts. Similarly care has been taken of the refugees, sheltered in the Mosques Daoud Pasha and Djarah Pasha, and in the other neighbourhoods. The building belonging to Hashim Pasha, and situated opposite to the Town-Hall, has been arranged for the families of the officers, to each member of whom the Society gave 3 piastres per day and undertook the maintenance of 150 persons.

For its own part, the Women's Branch of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society distributed to 4,011 refugees cotton cloaks, woolen underclothes, morning gowns (antari), stockings and shoes.

The costs for the maintenance of these refugees amount to the sum of about 2,000 Turkish Pounds per week. This maintenance is continuing since the 10th Kianoun-ewel 1328 (23 December 1912).

More than 1,800 articles of clothing, like cotton cloaks, morning gowns, under-clothings, drawers and stockings have been distributed to the refugees living in carts, out of Edirne Capou. Those living in the lodging-house of Sirry Effendi, at the neighbourhood of Edirne Capou; in the Mosques of Zindjirli Coyon, Ihyassin, Atik Ali Pasha, all the three in Zindjirli Coyon; in the Mosque Fetwa Einini, in Kara Gumbuk and in the Mosque Edirne Capou, etc., received more than 1,600 articles of clothing. The refugees of Kutchuk Sou received 1,274, and those living in the Mosque Cahurga, many thousands of cotton cloaks, morning gowns, under-clothings, drawers, woolen under-clothings, stockings, sheets and shoes.

The Ottoman Red Crescent Society's Hospital, which has been founded in Salonica with 200 beds, is still working, even after the invasion of this town and helping sick and wounded soldiers and refugees. But, this work being insufficient, the Society sent to this town important sums to be applied for the relief of the refugees and prisoners, and decided to continue, in this way, to do all in its power.

The refugees, who have been sent to some of the Vilayets and those gathered in Gallipoli did not remain out of mind. The Branches of the Society in the Vilayets of Hud vendiklar, Aidin, Angora and Coma have been instructed to do all that is necessary in order to help the refugees by all means. The Brussa Branch having required money, 600 Turkish Pounds have been sent for this purpose.

Two hundred sacks of biscuits, 20 sacks of potatoes and many other provisions, 1,000 blankets, 3,000 pairs of stockings and 200 Turkish Pounds have been forwarded to Gallipoli through a member of the Central Office.

Besides that, the military commandant seeing the necessity of founding in this town a hospital, the Ottoman Red Crescent Society decided to comply with the request of the commandant. Consequently, the building is already chosen, the personnel appointed and it will be opened in a few days.

G.—WOMEN'S WORK

The Women's Branch of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society has displayed great activity during the war period. The Ottoman women worked continuously and sewed over 70,000 articles of various clothing. They collected subscriptions for the Society, took care of the families and orphans of the martyrs, besieged and lost officers, distributed clothes and sets of beds, provided them with food and gave to each member of each family 3,5 piastres per day. Forty officers' families have been settled in the house kindly arranged for this purpose by Djelal El-Din Monkhitar Bey. Several other families have been sent to their towns and their maintenance assured, and clothes have been given to some others. In short, the work of the Ottoman women has been patriotic, humane, useful and successful.

II.—HELP TO PRISONERS.

In addition to its general work, the Ottoman Red Crescent Society decided to carry out another important duty. It undertook the task to establish relations between the officers and soldiers, who have been taken prisoners, and their families, and to assure the continuity of these relations.

In a report published by Dr. Omer Besnim Pasha, the representative of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society at the International Congress, held last year, in Washington, it is said that one of the decisions taken by this Congress consists in the fact that a special commission shall be formed by the Central Offices of the Red Cross and Red Crescent, with authority to assure the establishment and the continuity of relations between war prisoners and their families. This decision has been lately approved by the International Central Office of the Red Cross at Geneva.

Having been officially informed that an International Committee has been formed in Belgrade under the presidency of the Swiss Consul General in this town, the Ottoman Red Crescent Society formed a commission composed of members of its Central Office, in order to establish a correspondence with the abovesaid Committee, and to ensure regular and continual relations between prisoners and members of their families. Paid clerks have been appointed to help the members of this commission, through which, it will be possible to the public to communicate with prisoners, and reciprocally.

CONCLUSION.

The abovementioned particulars and figures constitute the work of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society during the past two months. Things have been done with a spirit of method and pursued with great zeal, so that public welfare has been protected. The maintenance of its hospitals until the end has been assured, and its reserve capital not touched. But, in order to do much better work, it is necessary that arrangements of all kinds may be made in times of peace. If the work of the Red Cross Societies of other nations is more extensively appreciated, the reason is due to the fact, that these institutions have been longer in operation and had time to make all kinds of preparations, and assure order and rapidity.

The making up of beds and sets of beds and the preparing of medical stores in times of peace, does not mean that the Society is ready for every contingency. It is indispensable that a personnel composed of physicians, nurses and medical officers be ready for this purpose at any time.

Taking these reasons into consideration and after the experience gained during this war, the Ottoman Red Crescent Society is, at present, proceeding to fill up a blank, by enrolling learned and clever physicians, training nurses and stretcher bearers, setting medical material stores in various points of the Ottoman Empire, fitting out a Red Crescent ship, founding "Home-nursing" and if necessary a "Hospital School" and "Aid-stations" and buying stretchers and autos, etc.

The task of the Society will not be limited to working only in the time of war. Following the example of the other countries, it has decided to extend the circle of its activity, in building a great dépôt, which shall contain instruments and medical stores to be employed in case of contagious diseases. It has already purchased for the sum of 1,000 Turkish pounds a field situated on the sea front, near the railway stations and the building of dépôt will be shortly started.

The Society, considering the difficulties it had with the transport of sick and wounded, decided also to purchase 2 autos, 2 carriages and 1 goods auto. Röntgen apparatus, which is so indispensable for the surgical operations, has been ordered from Europe.

People who know the importance of an institution of this kind have appreciated the patriotic, humane, useful and successful work done by the Ottoman Red Crescent Society.

The task of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society is now to work for the future, and it is very anxious to bring this institution to a rank equal to that of similar European Societies, so that it may satisfy the national honour.

The members of the Society are persons in high positions and eminent military and naval medical officers, who may be confidently expected to do good work, especially with aid of national help and public sympathy.

Before closing, the Ottoman Red Crescent Society conveys again its sincere thanks to all the subscribers and others who have so kindly helped.

Albania's Claims.

Interview with Prince Ahmed Fuad.

Among the many questions that have assumed international significance within the past six months, that of Albania's future as a new Balkan State is deserving of a prominent place, and the fact that the delimitation of her boundaries forms the basis for ambassadorial caverges now taking place in London adds interest of a topical nature to the subject, which is enhanced by the presence in England of His Highness Prince Ahmed Fuad, who is attempting to bring Albania's claims to the notice of the ambassadors.

Prince Ahmed Fuad, who was seen yesterday at Claridge's Hotel by a representative of the Near East, thus explained his position.

"The Powers," he said, "are discussing the future position of New Albania. In doing so they consult and debate the desires of Russia, Austria, Italy, Servia, Montenegro, etc., but they do not consult our interests in the matter. Yet surely these are vital. Consequently I have been asked by representative Albanian notables and committees to bring Albania's claims to the notice of the Powers. That is my object: to induce the Great Powers also to consider our wishes and interests.

"Why should they not be considered? We are living in the age of the devolution of nationalities. Servia, Bulgaria, Greece, Italy—and how many others?—regained their independence almost within the memory of living man; and the great nations, like England and France, have always been willing to champion the cause and claims of these budding nationalities. We Albanians trust that these traditions will not be forgotten to-day. Prior to the claims of Servia and Montenegro to soil which is our soil, are our rights, and we must insist on them while we may.

"What are Montenegro's pretensions to Scutari? They are based on the assertion that the plain of Scutari is rich and fertile, whereas Montenegro is poor and cannot live without it. This claim, if recognised by the Powers, would constitute a new right, it would legalise attempts on property by the necessitous.

"Servia's claims to Ipek and Jakova, to the regions between the White Drin and Scutari, and the Drin and Montenegro, are no less unjust. From all points of view these districts and towns are Albanian, and to deprive us of them and of Scutari, our moral capital, must cripple us before our birth, and make us look continually forward to the day of retaliation. I say it emphatically; there will be no lasting peace in the Balkan Peninsula if we are shorn of what is ours. There will always be danger of unrest so long as the members of one race are subject to another. In one word, if peace is to be guaranteed it will be necessary to give Albanians their whole country—that is, where Albanian customs and habits prevail, and where both tradition and history give us exclusive rights.

"The above constitutes our claims. The claims put forward by Austria as to the limits of Albania is the absolute minimum to which the Albanians could agree. Ipek must be our frontier town in the north and Janina in the south. The Montenegrins already possess Podgoritz, Antivari, and Duleigno, with their Albanian population, and have no right to put forward any claim to Scutari."

After expressing his hopes that the Powers would eventually consider Albania's claims favourably, his Highness dwelt on the country and its inhabitants.

"Practically nothing is known abroad about Albania," he said, "and the little that is known is tainted with Servian, Montenegrin, or Greek prejudices, according to the observer's standpoint or that of his guide. The Albanians are a race which has nothing in common with the Slavs, Wallachs, or Greeks. It is frequently claimed that in Albania itself there are so many thousand Greeks or Serbs. The Christian Albanians, who have no Patriarchate of their own, had to join either the Greek or the Servian patriarchates, who claimed them as either Greeks or Serbs, as the case might be. In reality, however, they are and remain Albanians to the backbone.

"At present all is chaos in Albania, its towns having been occupied and its fields overrun by contending armies. But when peace has been declared and Albania has been instituted an independent State, in possession of all her rightful lands, she will rapidly develop her resources, educate her people, build railways and roads, and organise all her economic forces. For the race is an energetic and enterprising one, and one, moreover, that will be grateful to whomsoever advocates the consideration of her claims.

"A final word, however, the Albanians are not pro-Austrians or pro-Slavs or pro-Italians. They are, first and foremost, Albanians." —The Near East

The Balkan States To-Day.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN'S" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT IN THE BALKANS.)

EARLY in the war a colleague on the staff of an important newspaper pointed out that the Orient express from Vienna onwards did duty as a barometer of the importance attached to a Balkan crisis. If he was right, then Europe takes small interest in the renewal of the war. For the express left Vienna on the day war was renewed with a very small complement of passengers. There were a few merchants making for Budapest, an Armenian or two heading for Constantinople, and the usual proportion of Jews. But the special correspondents were noticeably absent. And until the train ran into Belgrade station there was no sign that we were approaching the last act of the drama.

Even in peace-time Belgrade station always calls Ruritania to mind. In the early stages of the war the whole station was filled with uniforms, and the arrival of hospital trains, disgorging their load of mangled humanity, added a gruesome interest. But now Belgrade station is nearly normal again. The railway trucks are emptier than usual. The scrutiny of passengers and their luggage is stricter. The waiting-rooms still bear the flaming Red Cross that marked their conversion into dressing stations, but they are now empty. And round the entrance to the station the officious guides had begun to waylay passengers again with offers to show the places of interest.

The town itself has run through the whole gamut of emotions of the capital of a State at war. During mobilisation the Servians showed small signs of warlike ardour. Neither the army nor the people were confident of the result of the military operations, and the certainty of commercial loss was obvious to all. An observer at the time pointed out that the troops leaving for the front looked as if they were going to an "abattoir." Then came in rapid succession the news of the victory of Kumanova, the capture of Unküb, and the battle of Monastir, and the depression of the Serbian—ever a volatile person—evaporated into immense self-conceit. But at the present moment the Serbians have forgotten alike the charms of military success and the claim of their duty to their Allies. They are heartily sick of war. Their fields are crying for the plough and their pockets are asking for cash. And neither plough nor cash is forthcoming, man and cattle are at the front, and business is at a standstill in the towns. The Serbian feels that the continuation of the war will bring no greater share of the spoils to him. He feels he is being used as a cat's paw by the predominant partner in the Alliance. Already, also, there are ominous grumblings that the original terms of the alliance give Serbia less than her due. Monastir was taken by Serbian arms, and is still held by them, but by the treaty and by ethnographical claim it goes to Bulgaria. Alessio and Durazzo seem unattainable. Salonica is at best a chance. Whatever the eventual terms of peace between the Allies as a whole, and Turkey, there is small doubt but that the settlement among the Allies themselves will leave behind it many a bone of contention for Serbian diplomacy.

The Bulgarian conceals his feelings with greater skill than the Serbian, but Sofia is at present hardly less pacific than Belgrade. The dislocation of the earlier days of the war has passed away in large measure. Most of the shops are open again, the tramways are running and flacres are available. Prices are very little above normal. But in spite of these outward and inside signs of the renewal of ordinary conditions of life the capital still suffers daily, for business is almost at a standstill. And in the country it is the same as in Serbia. The time for ploughing and sowing is very close, and the country is denuded of men and even of boys. The peasant of the Balkan State lives from hand to mouth. He has no reserves collected, and the loss of a year's crops means not merely ruin but starvation to him. Reliable information puts the loss in men capable of work already at 50,000 for Bulgaria alone. If war were to cease to-morrow this in itself would mean a heavy handicap to this young State.

In the club and café men talk openly of the mistake of the armistice. To be effective an armistice with a view to peace negotiations must fulfil three distinct conditions. One party must realise that the arbitrament of arms has decided against it, the scope of the negotiations must be confined within certain definite limits, the period of truce must be strictly limited. Not one of these conditions was complied with in December, 1912. The Turkish nation had not been decisively defeated, the chief portion of its armed strength had not even been engaged. There was no definition of the scope of the negotiations, and there was no time limit. Had the Allies pushed on their military measures ruthlessly instead of giving way to the representations of the Great Powers and to the dread of epidemics, there is small doubt but that they could have pierced the Tchataldja lines and dictated terms of peace with their sword at the throat of Turkey. Breathing space was all in favour of the Porte.

It is an open secret now that in the original terms of the Alliance no mention was made of the fate of Adrianople. It was not considered then of prime importance. Now both Turk and Bulgarian realise clearly enough that without it Bulgaria's spoils in Thrace are of small value. But while for this reason the Bulgarian delegates in London were well justified in breaking off the negotiations on this point, the argument does not thrust itself home into the reason of the other Allies. They have already in their possession all they can hope for, and Turkey is prepared to let them have it. It says much for the predominant influence of Bulgaria in the Alliance that in spite of this she was able to carry her allies with her in the further appeal to arms. But though she has succeeded in doing this the process has left a sore in both Serbian and Greek amour propre which will not tend to the future friendliness of the allied States.

Of Adrianople surprisingly little is known here. The Bulgarians seem to have decided not to risk another assault. Deserters from the fortress come over daily in numbers varying from ten to twenty. But that is a quite inconsiderable number. They speak of short rations, but, on the other hand, the prices which they say are current for food are not abnormally high. The Bulgarian staff seems to hope that the fortress will be reduced within three weeks. On the other hand, the sortie by the Turks on the 8th February cost the Bulgarians some 1,600 men, so that the fighting qualities of the defenders seem to be well maintained. The bombardment seems to have had astonishingly little effect on the defences, and the loss of life in the town is fairly certain to be negligible. For, whatever its moral effect, artillery fire into a town has never yet destroyed much human life. On the whole there seems no reason why Adrianople should not make good its defence for many more weeks.

The military situation can be summed up in a sentence. The Allies have shot their bolt; the Turk has not now, any more than he had at any period, the bow with which to shoot the bolt that is still in his quiver. And so the result is stalemate. What will be the issue? Prophecy is dangerous, but in all probability the war will drag on until Adrianople falls, and then each side will be very willing to accept the mediation of the Great Powers.

Turkey After the War.

MR E. N. DENNETT in the course of a letter to the Manchester Guardian says:—

Students of Near Eastern problems are almost bewildered by the recent happenings in Turkey. Fresh scenes and characters are crowded into the tragic drama, and the final issues can only be vaguely conjectured. The Western critic of Turkish affairs is, indeed, always more or less in a log, for the Ottoman Government has rarely made any adequate effort to elucidate its purposes or justify its conduct in the European press. Foreign press bureaux and similar influences have proved of immense value to the Balkan States, while in many instances Turkey's case has never secured even a bare hearing in the journals of any European capital, with the occasional exception of Berlin and Vienna. As a recent example, what adequate attention has been called to the cruel outrages inflicted on Moslem peasantry by the advancing armies of Greece, Serbia, and Bulgaria? The Balkan Committee has collected large sums for the relief of Christian refugees, who are assured of a safe return to their homes, and the columns of an evening paper are open to the appeal of Bulgarian princesses on behalf of Bulgarian orphans. Where does one ever read of the black deeds which have disgraced the allied armies in Southern Macedonia, reprisals, perhaps, for the savagery of Albanian hillmen, but none the less terrible realities? What of the scores of thousands of unhappy Moslem peasants who fled, in terror, to escape murder and isolation at the hands of the invaders? The misery of these destitute refugees at Salonica (80,000), Komani (26,000), and so on is simply appalling, and unless further aid is forthcoming death by starvation must inevitably end the sufferings of many thousands. The Greek Government gave £6,000, and it is doubtful if it will do more. The British Red Crescent Society has with the money generously subscribed by Moslem subjects of the Crown saved thousands of refugees from starvation, but its funds are well-nigh exhausted.

In other directions the same cloud of obscurity hangs over the affairs of Turkey. The motives and purposes of the Young Turkish leaders who have re-established themselves at Constantinople receive scanty notice or appreciation in the press. Yet it is quite impossible to meet men like Enver Bey or Fethi Bey without being convinced of their absolute sincerity and genuine patriotism. They worked hard four years ago in the face of countless difficulties to secure good government for their country, but Austria, Italy, and the Bulgarian Revolutionary Committee were too strong for them. Nevertheless these reformers have never despaired of the Republic, and if Turkey emerges with honour and some measure of success from the troubles that beset her, she may have to choose between two forms of government—a strong military dictatorship or an effective Constitution on Young Turkish lines.

The loss of territory is naturally galling to a proud and sensitive race, and the surrender acquiesced in during the recent Conference was enormous enough, including as it did the whole of Macedonia and Albania, three-quarters of Thrace, and some of the islands. The statement in General Savoff's appeal to his soldiers that Turkey had been "unwilling to yield an inch of the conquered territory" is ludicrously false, but good enough, one supposes, for the peasant troops under his command. Nevertheless the loss of Ottoman territory may well prove a real blessing to the nation, however painful for the moment. Albania yielded practically no revenue, whilst the enfants gâtes of its mountains have proved a constant source of trouble and expense even under so indulgent a ruler as Abul Hamid. Macedonia, again, despite the fertility of its valleys, was never developed under Turkish rule, and hung like a millstone round the neck of the Ottomans for generations. The best blood and treasure of Anatolia has been poured into Macedonia, and little has come out of this distressful province except strife and bloodshed. Crete, again, has long since ceased to be an integral part of the Sultan's dominions. As to Tripoli, while nothing can justify Italy's mean act of brigandage, the severance of this neglected vilayet has saved the Ottoman Exchequer an annual loss of nearly a quarter of a million. It was an evil day for Turkey when she saddled herself with the Arabian provinces—the conquest of the Yemen only dates from 1872,—for this vast area, like the Soudan in days of old, has long been accursed by the wives and mothers of the Sultan's soldiers. A private record carefully made on the spot has revealed the dreadful fact that in the last twenty years no less than 800,000

Turks passed the port of Suez on their way to the Yemen who never returned!

Lastly, many of the islands are a positive source of weakness to Turkey in the absence of any effective fleet, for their garrisons are exposed to easy capture by any maritime enemy. Outlying islands like Stampalia, Nikaria, or Paara have never done more than barely pay for their upkeep, and their surrender would inflict no real injury on the Ottoman Empire, not even one of sentiment, for the inhabitants of these bleak isles are almost entirely Greek. The retention of islands like Imbaros, Tenedos, Mytilene, or Rhodes stands on a wholly different footing, nor is it probable in any case that the Powers would permit Greece to hold permanently some of her easy conquests, which lie in dangerous proximity to the mutilated but still compact and formidable dominions of the Sultan.

Even after the surrender of nine-tenths of his European possessions, and probably some of the Aegean Islands, the Sultan will still rule over vast territories, three times as large as Italy—territories full of latent wealth. The essential problem will be how to secure repose for consolidation and development. Turkey has learnt by bitter experience the value attaching to solemn treaties in the eyes of the Christian Powers. Will international jealousy and self-seeking allow the harassed Empire ten years in which to order her finance, develop her resources, and re-establish her defences? That is the ever-present anxiety in the minds of Turkish patriots. "Take Tripoli, Thrace, Macedonia, Albania, if you will, but grant us at least the peace we badly need for good government in Asia."

But who at any rate, can find fault with Enver Bey and his friends for their recent action? Those who, like the writer, saw Turkish batteries without shells, troops without food, cholera victims without shelter or treatment, and all the other miseries of a tortured people amid the ever-desponding gloom of military disaster can only be amazed at the moderation of an almost bloodless revolution, the mere change of a Ministry.

Balkan Finances.

THE representative of a Berlin bank, who recently returned from the Balkans, has published his views on the financial situation in the Frankfurter Zeitung. We reproduce the following extracts:—As regards finances, Bulgaria is the worst off, as before the outbreak the country was badly prepared financially. This is proved by its efforts to obtain money in foreign countries, which led to a far greater amount in Treasury bonds being issued than the Allies—40 million francs in France and 25 millions in Russia. Serbia had 40 million francs over from the previous loan, and had also a monopoly surplus of more than 50 millions. As regards Greece, the National Bank is very favourably placed. It holds about 100 million francs abroad. Roumania has suffered from the shipment difficulties; more than 700 million francs worth of corn has remained in the country. On the other hand, the Government has been compelled to lay in stores of war material and to buy steamers, which produced a calamitous situation in foreign exchange. As regards banks generally: In Serbia the results of the banks, in spite of war and moratorium, are favourable and in excess of 1911, so that the dividend can easily be maintained or even increased. In Bulgaria the banks are showing caution, especially as non-payments will be numerous. In Roumania the banks generally seem to have worked well. Salonica deserves a special note, as its future is very problematic. At present this town is the transit station for Macedonia and Serbia. If Salonica is to be internationalised, Greeks and Serbians would each create a commercial interchange town for themselves, so that only a very small Hinterland would be made for Serbia. If Salonica remains Greek, the Serbian Custom would be lost, so that in any case Salonica's commercial prosperity would decline.—The Near East.

Ottoman Finances.

THE Ottoman Government has at last obtained an advance of £500,000, which will permit it to pay the salaries of its employees, says the Daily Telegraph. According to information derived from a good financial source, this advance was obtained from the Belgian group represented by the Deutsche Orient Bank on the following terms:—The rate of interest is to be 7 per cent. The Government reserves to itself for a year the option of selling to the Belgian group for the construction of certain buildings the land of the manoeuvre ground and the barracks of the Armen quarter at Pera, and the buildings of the Bourse de Commerce at Galata. If, after the expiration of one year, a firm concession has not been given the Government must repay the
